the majority, policy formulators may have to court minority party votes; the minority may be developing alternative proposals which become attractive to those affected by a policy problem and thus these proposals may be taken over by the majority party; minority victories in defeating the President may force executive policy formulators to rethink a proposal; minority party research into administration of policy may result in new legislation: and the general expectation that the minority party will oppose with strength and has certain rights, which are protected, to criticize presidential proposals, may induce caution, precision, and careful consideration in policy formulation and administration.

A second major question relates to minority party goal achievement. Do individual strategies in congressional policy-making contribute to the realization of the principal minority party goal of majority party status? If the minority party has a wide range of strategies available, does that result in victory at the polls? On the surface, it appears that the data confirm what every student of Congress knows -electoral success is related to a wide variety of factors, of which the range of policy-making strategies available is relatively minor.39 In this century the Republicans as a flexible minority have scored impressive gains in the next election (1942, 1946, 1952), scored only slight gains (1962), and lost ground (1944). The greatest victories for Republicans in this century, in terms of net gain of seats, have followed congresses in which the minority party was severely restricted (1914, 1938, and, to a lesser extent, 1966). Republicans as a participating minority in the House have never gained in the next election (1912, 1956, 1958).

If electoral success does not follow from a more active role for the minority party in majority coalition building, a rather anomalous situation results. Minority party leaders are generally expected to rely on strategies which presumably will be rational in terms of the overall party goal of majority party status. Yet the impact of their actions on whether the minority party in fact becomes the majority party may be of very little consequence.

³⁹ For a general discussion of the opposition party in governmental decision-making, see Anthony Downs, An Economic Theory of Democracy (New York: Harper and Row, 1957), especially Chapter 4.

A third major question asks: What of the other combinations of variables not discussed here? Are there other types of minority parties when classified by the strategies available? A cursory examination of the congresses in this century suggests that the categories identified here are generally serviceable. But, as was indicated in the discussion of the differences between the 63rd and 73rd Congresses, a great many refinements can and should be made. Thus, for example, some restricted minorities have little immediate prospect of a greater range of strategies. Clearly, there are degrees of restrictedness and flexibility. Further, it is perfectly conceivable that a participating minority may have a strong, rather than a weak, President in the White House. And what of those rare instances when both parties are in the minority in Congress—one in each house? The two congresses of this type in this century, the 62nd and 72nd, represented highly abnormal policy-making situations wherein the majority party nationally was in the process of being deposed.

This research suggests many other questions as well. Are there differences between the minority parties of the House and Senate in any one Congress? Preliminary analysis indicates that there are. Does the analysis provided here apply to the Democratic party as a minority party? Does it apply to a large number of congresses? What happens to a minority party which fails over a long period of time to achieve majority party status? To what extent are goals of individual members functional or dysfunctional for achieving the party's goal? To what extent is "party" important at all in the formative stages of legislation? These and other important questions must be answered if we are to understand the role of political parties in Congress.

THE HOUSE AND THE FEDERAL ROLE: A COMPUTER SIMULATION OF ROLL-CALL VOTING*

MICHAEL J. SHAPIRO University of Hawaii

Much of the business of the U.S. Congress in the post war period has involved issues concerning the size and scope of activities of the federal government. The legislation in this area can be traced, for the most part, to measures which originated curing the period of the New Deal in response to the Great Depression and to measures enacted during World War II to meet the short-run exigencies attendant to rapid economic and social mobilization. From the point of view of the expansion of the federal role, the Eisenhower years are of some moment. While they marked a lull in the expansionist trend witnessed under the Democratic presidencies of Roosevelt and Truman, their significance lies in the fact that despite the change in adminsitrations, there was no reversal of the policies begun during the Roosevelt years. While most of the Republican legislators were on record in opposition to the expansion of the federal role, the failure of the Republican Party to introduce and enact legislation to reverse the trend of federal expansion resulted in a new plateau of federal activity from which the congressional dialogue was to proceed during the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations.

While the 87th Congress, meeting during Kennedy's first two years in the White House, did not enact the quantity of legislation expanding the federal role that Kennedy had called for in his inaugural, In the 88th Congress both parties supported a larger federal role to a greater extent than they had previously. In fact the first sessions of the 88th Congress as it bears on the federal role has been summed up as follows: "At no time did the majority of both parties reject a larger federal role." (Congressional Quarterly Almanac, 1963, p. 724) With two exceptions, the statement holds true for the second session in 1964.

* The author is indebted to Dr. Cleo Cherryholmes of the Department of Political Science at Michigan State University who shared in the design of the simulation model and rendered valuable advice and assistance in its application reported here. The author wishes, in addition, to thank Dr. Harold Guetzkow and Dr. Kenneth Janda of the Department of Political Science at Northwestern University who aided immeasureably in the conception and execution of the research upon which this article is based.

The research reported in this article is based upon a computer simulation study of roll-call voting on twenty-one bills in the 88th session of the U.S. House of Representatives dealing with the expansion of the Federal role. Its purpose is twofold: first, to elucidate and explicate the determinants of the success of legislation resulting in the expansion of the federal role; and second, to develop and test a model that represents a theoretical overview of the roll-call voting process in the House.

I. THE MODEL

This simulation model of roll-call voting in the U.S. House of Representatives focuses on two basic processes. The first is a cognitive process involving the predisposition toward voting on a kill that a representative develops when he assesses his past voting behavior on that type of bill, the individuals and groups in the House with positive and negative positions on the bill, and the substance of the bill in terms of its benefits and disadvantages for his constituency and region of the country. The second is a communication process in which representatives who do not develop strong predispositions on a bill in the first phase of the model confront the President and their colleagues and receive influence.

The Predisposition Phase. The predisposition phase of the model is depicted in the flow chart of Figure 1. In this phase a predisposition score is calculated for each representative, one at a time, as the attributes of the bill in question are compared with those of the representatives.

The first determination made when a bill is ¹ The attributes of the bills were determined from their descriptions in the Congressional Quarterly Almanac for 1963 and 1964. The bills chosen for the simulation study are essentially the same as those identified by the Congressional Quarterly Service as pertaining to the federal-role issue area. A few recommital motions on these bills have been added to provide a larger number of bills for purposes of analysis in general and to allow, in particular, for comparisons between bills introduced by the Demogratic Administration and those introduced by Republicans (the latter having been reflected, for the most part, in recommital motions).

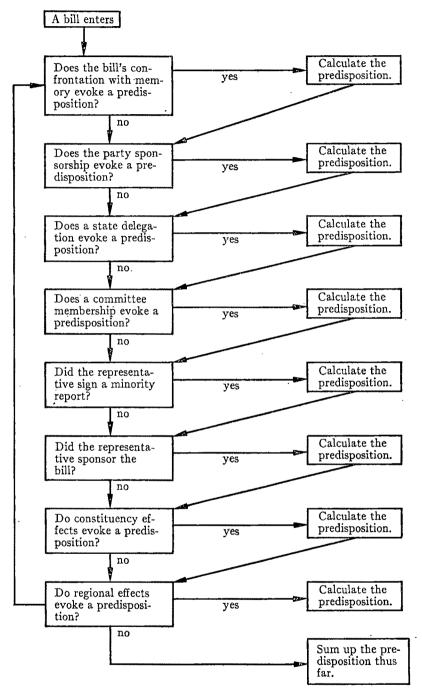

Fig. 1. The predisposition phase of the model.

entered into the model and confronts the first representative is whether or not the representative's past voting on that type of bill suggests a bias or predisposition for or against the bill. This aspect of the model is based upon the notion that representatives have ideological postures that provide cues for their roll-call voting behavior.² The use of past votes on federal role

² For a number of different perspectives on the effects of personal ideology on legislative roll-call voting, see D. R. Brimhall and A. S. Otis, "Con-

bills to determine a representative's ideological position with respect to present federal role bills is based upon the discovery of what constitutes, in effect, a federal role dimension in a in a number of roll-call analyses of legislative voting.³ Thus weights of two or one are added sistency of Voting in Our Congresses," Journal of Applied Psychology, 32 (1948), 1-14; Charles Farris "A Method for Determining Ideological Groupings in the Congress," Journal of Politics, 20 (1958), 308-338; Duncan MacRae Dimensions of Congressional Voting: A Statistical Study of the House of Representatives in the Eighty-First Congress (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1958); and Lewis A. Froman, Jr. Congressmen and Their Constituencies (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963).

³ From the standpoint of face validity, the case for the unidimensionality of congressional attitudes on the federal role is a good one. In recent years it has been one of the few issue areas that has consistently distinguished the platforms of the two parties. This consistency has been reflected by the increasing tendency for both casual observers and systematic investigators of politics to employ this issue dimension as a liberal-conservative index. In one case, the use of representatives' past votes on the federal role as a liberalconservative index has provided an instance of empirical validation of the issue area's unidimensionality (Froman, op cit.). It was found that congressmen from constituencies associated with conservative voting are low on the index (at the conservative end), while those from constituencies associated with liberal voting are high on the index (at the liberal end). This type of validation is not completely satisfying in as much as Froman's criteria for liberal and conservative voting with which the constituencies were purported to be associated are not entirely independent of the factors or bills that make up the liberal-conservative index employed. A better case for the unidimensionality of representatives' attitudes (inferred from voting behavior) towards the federal role is based upon inferences from the results of Guttman scaling techniques applied to congressional roll-call votes. This scaling technique, based upon rank-ordering procedures, was designed to tap the unidimensionality of attitude clusters. See Louis Guttman "The Basis for Scalogram Analysis," In S. A. Stouffer (ed.), Measurement and Prediction (Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1950). MacRae, in his Guttman scale analysis of roll-call votes in the 81st Congress, found what he termed "Fair Deal" and "Welfare State" scales for Democrats and Republicans respectively (op. cit.). Within both of these scales were most of the roll-call votes to or subtracted from the predisposition scores of each representative if he has voted consistently for or against bills dealing with the expansion of the federal role.⁴

The remaining variables in the predisposition phase of the model relate, first of all, to the individuals and groups that support or oppose the bill in question, the parties, state delegations, individual sponsors, committees that have reported the bill out and the elected leadership,⁵ and secondly to the substance of concerned with the federal role. Anderson obtained similar scales in his analyses of four succeeding congresses. See Lee Anderson "Variability in the Unidimensionality of Legislative Voting," Journal of Politics, 26 (1964), 568-585. Finally, a Guttman scaling analysis was conducted on the 21 bills included in my simulation study. When two bills were eliminated from this analysis, a reproducibility coefficient of .90 was obtained. The two bills that did not scale were not coded for a memory effect in the simulation.

4 After some testing of the model, predisposition weights of plus or minus two were assigned to representatives who had voted for the expansion of the federal role either eighty-five percent of the time or more or fifteen percent of the time or less. Predisposition scores of plus or minus one were assigned for percentages between sixty-five and eighty-five percent and between fifteen and thirty-five percent. Predisposition scores based upon past voting were calculated only for those representatives who had voted on at least ten bills in this issue area. In general, our measure of past voting behavior on the federal role issue dimension was based on the previous two House sessions. All other weights for variables in the predisposition phase of the model are plus or minus one. It can be observed, then, that the predisposition phase of the model provides a theoretical framework for combining propositions about legislative voting behavior that have emerged from more inductive legislative studies. This theoretical framework is based upon the assumptions that predispositions are additive and that all the predisposing variables have approximately equal weight. It is important to note that this last assumption relates to initial predispositions and not to voting behavior. As will be noted below, these variables appear in the communication phase of the model where their effects are not equal.

⁵ Two of these types of predisposition calculations require some clarification. On the basis of our knowledge of the pervasiveness of party conflict in legislatures I have constructed the model such that a coding of a bill for party sponsorship which predisposes all the members on one party

the bill. Thus each bill is coded in terms of the region or regions of the country and types of constituencies it might aid or hinder.⁶

The representative in this conceptualization is thought of as developing a predisposition on the basis of his ideological posture, and the audiences he may be expected to perceive as relevant to a bill. This predisposition phase, however, represents only part of this theoretical conception of the roll-call voting process in the House. After predispositions have been calculated for all the representatives for a given bill, the communication phase of the model is activated.

The Predisposition-Communication Linkage. Not all the representatives are influenced in the communication phase of the model on each bill, but all representatives are potential influences in the communication process. Each representative's potential influence over his colleagues on a given bill is a function of the predisposition that he develops during his confrontation with it in the predisposition phase of the model. Only those representatives whose predispositions fall within the range between plus two and minus two enter the communication process to be influenced. The final votes of all others are to vote for the bill (adding one to all their predisposition scores) has the effect of predisposing all the members of the other party in the opposite direction (subtracting one from all their predisposition scores). In the case of a bill coded from committees, all members of a committee through which the bill has passed are predisposed for the bill except those representatives who signed the minority report. These are predisposed against the bill.

6 It should be noted that when bills are coded such that some representatives acquire a predisposition as a result of an attribute of their constituency, it is then determined whether or not their constituency is competitive. If the representative comes from a competitive constituency, he acquires an additional unit of predisposition in the same direction. Competitive constituencies were designated as those that had not returned a representative from the same party in the last four consecutive congressional elections. The constituency attributes included in this study were percent urban, percent rural farm, percent rural non-farm, percent negro, percent foreign stock, percent owner occupied dwellings, percent white collar, and degree of competitiveness. With the exception of the competitiveness variable, the raw data on these variables was obtained from the Congressional District Data Book, Districts of the 88th Congress, 1963.

determined in the predisposition phase of the model.

The decisions on who enters the communication phase of the model are based upon propositions from both social-psychological findings of influence and conformity in groups in general and findings related specifically to the influence on representatives' voting behavior. From the former we get the proposition that individuals with more extreme attitude positions are less susceptible to influence than individuals with less extreme attitude positions, and from the latter the proposition that a legislator with two or more pressures such as party and constituency influencing his vote in the same direction is unlikely to be susceptible to further influence concerning his vote.

The decisions involved when a representative approaches the communication phase of the model are depicted in the flow chart in Figure 2. It can be noted that we have employed the simplyfying assumption that the communication process for all legislators is based upon the predispositions derived before the process is begun. No cycling of the process is carried out to take account of the possibility of a diffusion of influence in which predispositions generated as a result of communications among representatives become the basis for further influence in later communicative interactions.

The Communication Phase. Bauer, Dexter, and Pool have asserted that "the U.S. House of Representatives is above all a communication node which serves to unify a large and heterogeneous land by bringing into confrontation a group of men representing its various parts." It has been observed, on the other hand, that the patterns of interaction in legislative bodies tend to reinforce rather than moderate basic cleavages. In constructing this communica-

- ⁷ For evidence with respect to the attitude extremity proposition see Carl Hoyland, O. J. Harvey, and Muzafer Sherif, "Assimilative and Contrast Effects in Reactions to Communication and Attitude Change," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 55 (1957), 244–252. The proposition on immunity to influence of representatives with two influences predisposing them in the same direction is suggested by Julius Turner Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1951) p. 125.
- ⁸ Raymond Bauer, Lewis Dexter, and Ithiel de Sola Pool American Business and Public Policy (New York: Atherton Press, 1964).
- ⁹ John Wahlke, Heinz Eulau, William Buchanan and Leroy Ferguson, The Legislative Sys-

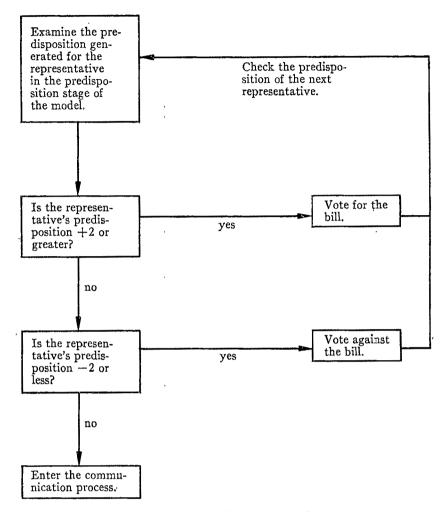

Fig. 2. The communication entry criteria.

tion process I have attempted, based upon investigations of interactions in legislative bodies, to simulate the types of confrontations that a legislator is likely to engage in when, because of either a lack of significant cues or a conflict among them, he has not evinced a strong predisposition to yote for or against a given bill.

The method employed to simulate these confrontations is an adaptation of the method of "pseudo partners" used by Abelson and Bernstein in their fluoridation referendum simulation. With this technique they matched conversation partners on the basis of potentiality for conversation, which was calculated as a function of social network information, a meshing of demographic characteristics and shared habitual loci of discussions about community issues. They based their conversation rates upon the levels of interest in the issue under discussion. I have adapted this procedure to the social network in the House by basing my conversation partner matching decisions on knowledge of the structure and processes of legislative systems in general and the House in particular.

tem: Explorations in Legislative Behavior (New York: Wiley, 1962).

¹⁰ Robert Abelson and A. Bernstein, "A Computer Simulation Model of Community Referendum Controversies," Public Opinion Quarterly, 27 (1963), 93-122.

The variables chosen to represent the structure of the communication network in the House are based upon observations of the frequency of interactions between representatives with attributes of their conversation partners, and the general observations that representatives seek information from certain types of colleagues and that some representatives, particularly those in positions of leadership, seek to give information or exert influence on certain types of bills. For the purposes of communication, then, each representative is described in terms of his party, state, region, constituency characteristics, leadership positions, committee membership, rank on each committee, and seniority.

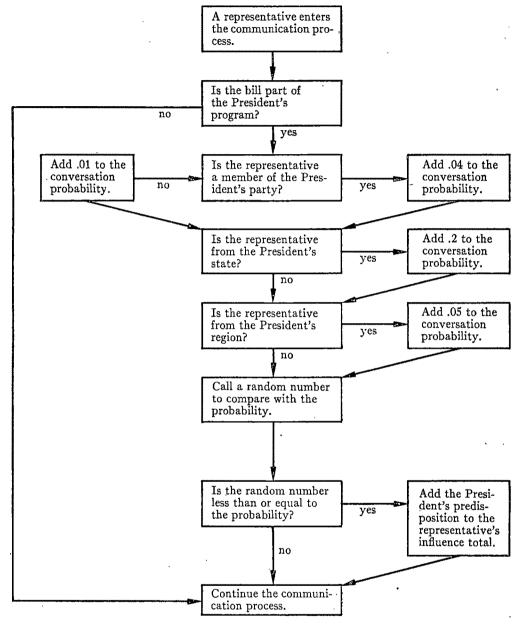

Fig. 3. Communication with the President.

The first determination made when a representative enters the communication process is whether or not he has a conversation with the President. Such a conversation symbolizes, for the sake of simplicity, a conversation with either the President or one of his legislative liaisons. The inclusion of the President in the communication process is predicated on the observation that presidential-legislative relations of this type have been institutionalized in the post war period.¹¹ As is indicated in the flow chart of Figure 3, I have confined the President's communications with representatives to cases in which legislation that is a part of his program is concerned.

The probabilities of conversation generated when the President confronts a representative are depicted in Figure 3. To arrive at these probabilities we begin by setting a limit on the average number of representatives that the President might be expected to confront on bills that are a part of his program. Here we assume that his number of contacts would approximate those of the formal leaders of the majority party in the House (the Speaker, Majority Leader, and Whip). After setting such a limit (approximately 45 contacts) we can then apportion this contacts among the types of legislators he confronts in such a manner that his total number of contacts on a given bill will approximate our limit. For these approximations we assume that his frequencies of interaction with the various types of representatives is similar to those of a representative. He is thus given more contacts with the members of his party, representatives from his home state, and representatives from his region of the country.

When the probability of conversation between the representative and the President is calculated, a random number is called, if the random number is less than or equal to that probability, it is assumed that a conversation took place and the President's predisposition on the bill (plus two if he favors the bill and minus two if he opposes it) is added to the influence total for that representative.

The representative then enters that part of the communication process within which a determination is made as to the members of the House with whom he will converse. In this part of the communication process he confronts all 434 of his colleagues. For each confrontation a probability of conversation is calculated, based on a matching of attributes of the representative and his potential influencers. As in the case of confrontations with the President, a random number is called after each of these confrontations, compared with the probability of conversation generated, and, when it is less than or equal to that probability, results in the addition of the predisposition that the conversation partner developed in the predisposition phase of the model to the representative's influence total.

¹¹ See for example Richard Neustadt "Presidency and Legislation," this Review, 49 (1955), 980-1021.

The formal leadership of the House is prominent in the communication process because, as Truman has observed, "The House has four and one half times as many members as the Senate. From this schoolboy fact comes the tendency for the formal leadership in the House to correspond closely to the actual. . . . "12 Thus in the first part of the matching process (shown in the flow chart in Figure 4) it is determined whether the representative entering the communication process is an elected leader. If he is, it is then determined whether or not his potential conversation partner is an elected leader. The flow chart in Figure 4 indicates the probabilities of conversation generated when the various types of leadership confrontations take place. These probabilities are derived from the general observation that the leadership in the House interacts frequently, and from the findings of investigations of state legislative bodies which indicate that the presiding officer (speaker) and majority leader have a close relationship and that the interactions between these and the minority leaders are somewhat less frequent.13 They are based, in addition, on the finding that frequent interactions occur between the whips and whip organizations, and between these and the other elected leaders.14

The probabilities of conversation among the legislative leaders are based, in part, on the average total number of communications in which a non-leader becomes involved in legislative bodies. To distinguish formal elected leaders, I made use of the finding that the leaders become involved in twice as many communicative interactions on the whole as do the rank and file members of legislative bodies.15 The probabilities appearing in Figure 4 are thus based upon an extrapolation from the total number of communications in which leaders become involved. The relative apportioning of probabilities for inter-party as opposed to intra-party confrontations is explicated in our discussion of non-leadership interactions below.

The flow chart in Figure 5 depicts the beginning of that part of the communication phase of the model in which a representative who holds no positions of elected leadership becomes involved after having confronted the President.

¹² David Truman, The Congressional Party (New York: Wiley, 1959).

¹³ Wahlke et al., op. cit., p. 225.

¹⁴ Randall Ripley, "The Party Whip Organizations in the United States House of Representatives," this Review, 58 (1964), 561-576.

¹⁵ Wahlke et al., op. cit., p. 226.

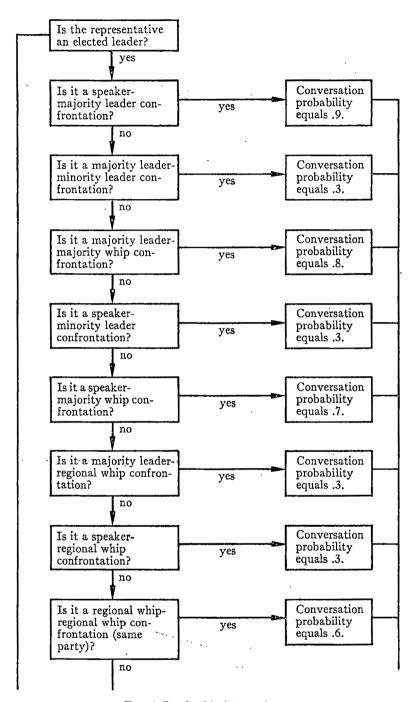

Fig. 4. Leadership interactions.

The first determination made in this section is whether the potential conversation partner is a regional whip assigned to the region of the representative. The high probability of conversation generated when the representative confronts his regional whip is based upon the finding that such a conversation actually does take place on most bills.¹⁶

The next set of determinations depicted in Figure 5 constitutes the matching of attributes

16 Ripley, op. cit.

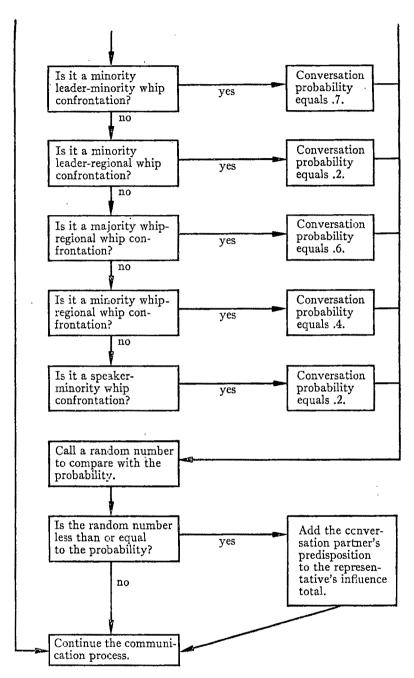

Fig. 4. (cont.) Leadership interactions.

between the representative and his potential conversation partner. As in the case of the other types of confrontations discussed thus far, the probabilities of conversation generated are based on the limit set for the average total number of communications in which a representative tends to become involved. That average falls between twenty-five and thirty and is derived from investigations of communicative interactions in legislative bodies. It has been found that in general legislators in state legislative bodies exert personal influence over approximately a dozen colleagues. We have added another half dozen to take account of the larger size of the House which increases the possibility of a wider acquaintanceship, Fig. 5. Rank and file interactions.

and the remainder has been added to represent the communications that a representative has with both elected and seniority leaders in the process of carrying out the task of legislating.¹⁷

The apportioning of the probabilities for confrontations between representatives involves a matching procedure. This procedure begins with a determination of whether the representative and his potential conversation partner are members of the same party. The relative size of the probabilities for inter- and intraparty interactions is based on the finding that a representative tends to have four times as many communicative interactions with members of his own party than with members of the opposition.¹⁸

¹⁷ See Wahlke et. al., op. cit., p. 222 for data on the dozen basic interactions. The additional interactions are based upon the findings of Truman, op. cit., pp. 145-275.

The matching procedure then continues with a determination of whether the representative

¹⁸ See Garland Routt "Interpersonal Relationships and the Legislative Process," Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciience, 19 (1938), 129-136, and Wahlke et. al.. op. cit., p. 224.

and his potential conversation partner are from the same state delegation. The additional probability of conversation added for intrastate confrontations is based upon the observation that state delegations in Congress are somewhat cohesive in their voting behavior and upon congressmen's reports that their state delegations are important sources of their communications about legislation.19 The size of the probability relates, again, to the limit set for the total number of communications a legislator can be expected to have and is weighted on the basis of inferences drawn from the above sources as to the importance of the state delegation as opposed to other factors in the communication process.

The next determination in the matching procedure is whether the representative and his potential conversation partner come from the same region of the country. The probability of conversation added for intra-regional confrontations is based upon both observations of interactions in legislative bodies and reports of conversation frequencies by members of the house.²⁰ The probability is based, in addition, on the limit set for total communications as in the case of the other probability increments.

The next matching determination depicted in the flow chart of Figure 5 is whether the representative and his potential conversation partner represent similar constituencies in terms of their urban-rural attributes. The probability of conversation added for a confrontation between representatives with like constituencies is based upon the finding that those with similar constituencies engage in a greater-than-average number of communications in a state legislature, and upon the finding that there is a slight tendency for those 19 See Truman, op. cit., p. 253; Donald Matthews U. S. Senators and Their World (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1960); John Kessel, "The Washington Congressional Delegation," Mid-West Journal of Political Science, 8 (1964), 1-21; Lewis Froman, Jr. and Randall Ripley, "Conditions for Party Leadership: The Case of the House Democrats," this Review, 59 (1965), 52-63; and Marc Ross," Some Correlates of Voting Support for the Leadership in the House of Representatives" (Mimeo, Department of Political Science, Northwestern University, 1965).

²⁰ Routt, op. cit., p. 135; Samuel Patterson, "Patterns of Interpersonal Relations in a State Legislative Group: The Wisconsin Assembly," Public Opinion Quarterly, 23 (1959), 101-109; Ross, op. cit.

with similar constituencies to demonstrate cohesion on roll-call votes in the House.²¹

The next matching determination for confrontations among representatives relates to committee membership. The probability of conversation added when the confrontation is between representatives who share a committee assignment is based, first of all, on the common sense supposition that those who share committee assignments will have some communications in the course of carrying out those assignments, and secondly on the finding that those sharing committee assignments in the House demonstrate a slightly greater than average cohesiveness on rell-call votes.²²

The last matching determination in this phase of the communication process relates to the effect of shared seniority status on communicative interactions of representatives. The probability of conversation added for shared seniority status is based upon the finding that interaction in legislatures occurs disproportionately within seniority groupings.²³

In addition to the criteria for the matching decisions enunciated above, the probabilities of conversation for these and other types of confrontations are based upon the finding that representatives in the majority party are more cohesive on roll-call votes than those in the minority party and on the finding that more interactions take place between members of the majority party. The use of this criterion can be noted in the apportioning of probabilities of conversation for interactions between leaders and rank and file representatives to be described below.

The flow chart in Figure 6 depicts the determinants of communication that are included to account for interactions between rank-and-file representatives and the seniority leaders and technical experts in the House, the chairmen and members of the committees through which the bill that is the subject of communications passes. The probabilities of conversation added for these confrontations are apportioned on the basis of a matching of party between the representative and his potential conversation partner, the assumption being that the representative seeking technical

²¹ Allan Fiellin "The Functions of Informal Groups: A State Delegation," in R. L. Peabody and N. W. Polsby (eds.), New Perspectives on the House of Representatives (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963), p. 66; and Triman, op. cit., p. 210.

²² Truman, op. cit., p. 277.

²³ See Wahlke et al., op. ci., p. 224; and Routt, op. cit., p. 135.

²⁴ Truman, op. cit., p. 286; Routt, op. cit., p. 135.

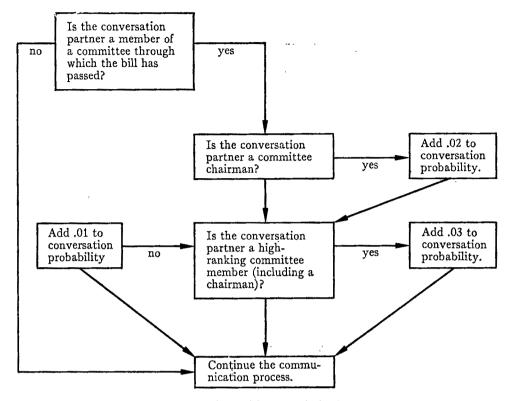

Fig. 6. Interactions with the seniority leaders.

advice on bills will display biases similar to those displayed in his choices of other conversation partners. In addition, in keeping with the finding that the seniority leaders (committee chairmen) are expecially cohesive with their party on bills that have gone through their committees, the chairmen are weighted more heavily in the communication process.²⁵ The higher ranking members of the committees relevant to the bill in question are given more weight in the communication process also, based upon the finding that technical experts receive more communications than rank and file legislators.²⁶

The final determinations in the communication phase of the model relate to the probabilities of conversation added when a representative confronts an elected leader. The flow chart in Figure 7 depicts the matching procedure involved. The probabilities of conversation added are based, in part, on the finding discussed above that leaders are involved in twice as many communications as non-leaders and, again, on the limit set for total communications for each representative. The apportioning of probabilities for the various types of leaders is based on the reports of communicative interactions by congressional representatives.²⁷ As in the case of the seniority leaders, representative-leadership interactions are incremented only for intra-party confrontations.

An overview of the communication phase of the model is depicted in the flow chart of Figure 8. It can be noted that when the random number falls within the probability of conversation calculated for a given confrontation, the predisposition of the conversation partner is added to the influenced representative's influence total. When a representative has confronted all 434 of his colleagues, his new predisposition is calculated on the basis of the influence he has received in the communications in which he has become involved. This calculation is carried out by dividing the sum of the predispositions with which the representative is confronted by the number of conversations in which he has been involved to obtain the average predisposition or attitude toward the bill with which he has been confronted. The representative's new predisposition then becomes one that is halfway between his old one and the ²⁵ Ibid., p. 240.

²⁶ Matthews, op. cit., p. 252.

²⁷ Ross, op. cit.

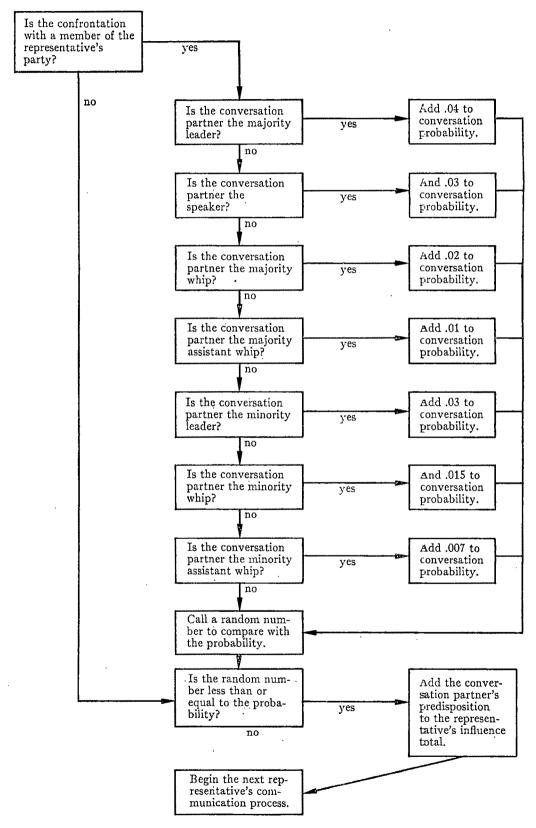

Fig. 7. Representative-leadership interactions.

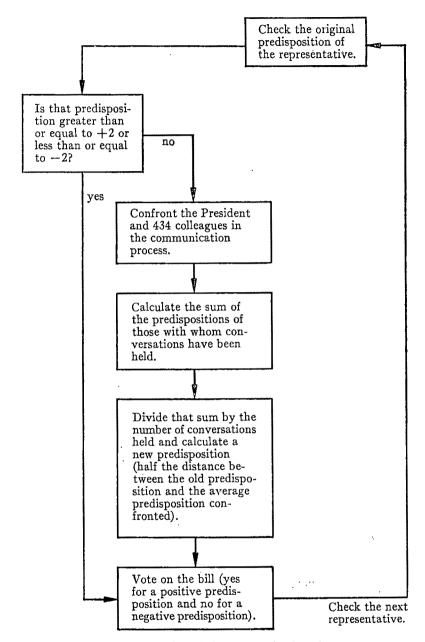

Fig. 8. An overview of the communication phase.

average one that he has confronted. This influence calculation is based upon research findings of attitude change and conformity in situations of communicated influence in small groups.²⁸

²⁸ See S. C. Goldberg, "Three Situational Determinants of Conformity to Social Norms," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 59 (1954), 325-329; C. I. Hovland and H. A. Pritzker, "Extent of Opinion Change as a Function of Amount of Change Advocated," Journal

The outputs of the communication process are thus the new predispositions of those of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 54 (1957), 257-261; C. I. Hovland, O. J. Harvey, and M. Sherif, op. cit.; S. Fisher and A. Lubin, "Distance as a Determinant of Influence in a Two-Person Serial Interaction Situation," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 56 (1958), 230-238; P. G. Zimbardo, "Involvement, Communication Discrepancy, and Conformity," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 60 (1960), 86-94.

TABLE 1. ACTUAL AND SIMULATED VOTING OUTCOMES

Bill	Simulated Voting	% Correct	Actual Voting
HR 12	171-239	84	171-239
(recommittal)
HR 12	280 - 128	77	288-122
HR 4955	153 - 244	92	181-217
(recommittal)
HR 4955	382-13	92	378-27
HR 6143	294 - 104	70	287 - 113
S 1576	353-3	94	335 - 18
HR 6196	167-237	81	179 - 224
(recommittal)
HR 6196	232-168	78	216-182
HR 6518	262-119	82	273 - 109
HR 4955	159-214	90	180-193
(recommittal)
S 2265	153-209	86	174–188
(recommittal)
S 2265	241 - 121	76	254-107
m HR~7152	323-100	84	290-130
HR 8316	362-0	87	317 - 43
${ m HR}$ 10222	245-173	90	229-189
HR 6196	238-175	89	211-203
HR 3881	230-172	82	212-189
HR 11377	247 - 172	85	226-185
HR 12175	371-3	82	308-68
HR 11926	221-170	78	218-175
S 3060	148-197	76	107 - 237
(recommittal)

representatives who receive influence in that phase of the model. It is these new predispositions that determine their votes on the bill in question.

II. THE PERFORMANCE OF THE MODEL

Because this simulation model aggregates the voting choices of each individual representative to obtain roll-call results, the basic evaluation of its performance has been carried out at both the macro and micro levels. The former involves the extent to which the voting outcomes in the simulation approximate the actual voting outcomes in the Eighty-Eighth Congress, and the latter considers the extent to which each individual representative's voting behavior in the Congress is approximated by his voting behavior in the simulation.

Considering, first of all, the macro level or voting outcomes as a whole we present the simulated and actual voting outcomes in Table 1. It can be noted that, in the simulation, the splits in the votes tend to be larger than were the splits in the actual votes. The average split in the simulated votes is 141 while the actual average split was 109. This difference is explicable in terms of the types of representatives for which the model's performance is below its overall average for individual voting performances. The sources of error will receive more attention in our discussion of the micro level performance of the model. Despite this tendency for the simulation to over-emphasize the splits in the votes, it can be noted that the correct outcomes are obtained by the simulation for all the bills. Using the splits in the simulated and actual votes as raw scores, moreover, we obtain a product-moment coefficient of correlation between the simulated and actual voting outcomes of .97.29 While this suggests a very positive evaluation of the simulation model, the assessment of its performance must be made in the context of a consideration of what kinds of performances are obtained with variations or alternative formulations of the model.

Before turning to this type of assessment, however, the micro level performance of the original model remains to be considered. The percentages of individuals voting the same way in the simulation as they actually voted are presented for each bill in Table 1. The average percentage of individuals correctly simulated across the twenty-one bills is 84. Breaking that figure down for the three different categories of party sponsorship we find that for the four bipartisan bills the average percentage of individual representatives correctly simulated is 89. The percentages obtained for the eleven Democratic Administration bills and the six Republican sponsored recommittal motions are 82 and 85 respectively. The assessment of these differences and all others reported must be made in the context of the amount of variation in results that can be obtained because of the stochastic variation of the communication phase of the model.30

²⁹ If the sum of the yes and no votes are used as raw scores instead of the splits between the yes's and no's on each vote, correlation coefficients become .95 and .96 respectively. It should be noted, however, that because the product-moment correlation coefficient adjusts for the situation in which the range of the values for one variable is higher than that for the other, the coefficient we have obtained slightly overstates the degree of fit between the simulated and actual roll-call voting outcomes.

30 To determine this variation two bills were run ten times each, one being a bill with a large number of representatives entering the communication phase and the other with relatively

These percentages obtained for the three party-sponsorship categories are explicable in terms of the types of individuals for which the simulation performs best. The most significant difference is between Democrats and Republicans. Averaging the percentages across all the bills yields scores of 86 and 79 correctly simulated Democratic and Republican representatives respectively. All of this difference is accounted for by the Democratic Administration-sponsored bills, for representatives in both parties voted correctly in the simulation: an average of 83 percent on the Republicansponsored recommittal motions and an average 85 percent on the four bills with bipartisan support. The simulation thus tends to over-emphasize the cohesiveness of the Republicans on Democratic-sponsored bills despite the attempt to build greater cohesiveness for Democrats than Republicans into the communication phase of the simulation model described above.31 It may be that it is this poorer micro level performance of the simulation for Republican repsentatives that accounts for part of the lower percentage of correctly simulated representatives on Democratic-sponsored bills.

Turning to the regional breakdown of the extent to which individual representatives are correctly simulated, we find that the poorest performance for regions obtained is for the southern representatives, with an average percentage correct across the twenty-one bills of 78. The next lowest percentage correct is for the eastern representatives at 83. The midwestern, mountain and far western representatives are simulated correctly with percentages of 88, 86, and 86 respectively.

It would appear that the simulation model confronts the same difficulty as the Democratic Whip organization, predicting the voting behavior of the Southern Delegation.³² Because of the difficulty of discerning those bills on which the conservative coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats takes shape, we must code the southerners as regular Democrats and thus predispose them in the same manner as the other Democratic representatives, with respect few. In each case, the amount of variation in the percentage of representatives correctly simulated did not exceed one percent. Thus any difference in percentages that is two percent or greater can be treated as an actual difference.

31 In keeping with previous findings cited in a number of the works noted above, the structure of the communication process provides for more communicative interactions within the majority party to party affiliation. By do doing, we miss a sizable percentage of them on occasions when they side with Republicans against "liberal legislation" such as bills proposing the expansion of the federal role. It should be noted in addition that it is undoubtedly the incorrect simulating of the voting of some southern representatives that accounts, in part, for the greater average split in the simulated votes as opposed to the actual votes, for the switching over of southerners has the effect of moderating the heavily party-oriented cleavages that account for the larger splits in the simulation.

32 See Froman and Ripley, op. cit.

The slightly lower average percentage correctly obtained for eastern representatives is probably explicable in terms of the traditional liberalism of eastern representatives. Several eastern Republican representatives usually side with Democrats on liberal legislation, and in general, eastern representatives from both parties tend to have more liberal voting records than their colleagues from other parts of the country. Our simulated voting results on the communications regulation bill, HR 8316, illustrate this phenomenon quite clearly. Coding the bill as a bipartisan measure resulted in an average percentage of representatives correctly simulated of 87. Because this bill results in the diminution of the federal role, however, a number of liberal easterners who had voted against the bill ended up for it in the simulation as a result of the bipartisan effect. Thus a below-average percentage of eastern representatives of 84 was obtained. Again, this slightly lower performance for eastern representatives would have the effect of over-emphasizing the voting splits as is the case with the performance on southern representatives.

Looking at the performance of the simulation model for the different representatives in terms of the types of constituencies they represent reveals a range of correctly simulated individual representatives from 86 per cent for representatives with predominantly urban constituencies to 81 per cent for representatives with predominantly rural non-farm constituencies. The representatives with predominantly rural farm constituencies were correctly simulated on an average of 82. These differences are probably a result of the distribution of Republicans and southern Democrats in terms of constituency types. A disproportionate share of non-southern Democrats represent constituencies with a high proportion of urban residence while Republicans and southern Democrats disproportionately represent rural farm and non-farm constituencies.

One interesting constituency-type variation in per cent correctly simulated is for competitive versus non-competitive districts. Representatives from the former were simulated correctly on an average of 33 per cent.³³ While this can be interpreted as evidence of the relatively stronger hold that the parties (the strongest determinant in our model) have over representatives who are less firmly established, the fact that competitive districts are not equally allocated on a regional or party basis confounds the clear interpretation of this result.

Moving to the consideration of a representative categorization that is closely related to the competitiveness of constituencies we can look at the extent to which the voting behavior of representatives with different seniority positions are correctly simulated. The findings from legislative research suggest that representatives with high seniority rankings are less likely to be loyal to their party and are thus far less predictable in terms of their roll-call voting.34 The results of the simulation tend to support this proposition: it yields an average per cent correct figure of 87 for the low-seniority members of the House while the average per cent correct figure obtained for representatives with high seniority standing is 82. Again. this finding must be assessed in the context of possible confounding factors, not the least of which is the fact that southern representatives possess a disproportionate share of the highseniority positions in the House.35

We have seen thus far that the model as originally constituted simulates the voting on federal role issues in the 88th Congress with results that match the outcomes of the actual voting quite closely at both the macro and micro levels. We have, in addition, gained some insights into the extent to which the voting behaviors of different types of representatives are explicable in terms of our theoretical formulation of the voting process. In the final section I turn to a consideration of the validity of my theoretical formulation by examining the extent to which alternative formulations of the simulation model can replicate the results obtained with the original formulation.

- ³³ These percentages are computed for only those twelve bills on which constituency effects are coded.
- ³⁴ See Oliver Garceau and Corrine Silverman, "A Pressure Group and the Pressured: A Case Report," this Review, 48 (1954), 672-691; Truman, op. cit.; Froman, op. cit.
- 25 If this inquiry were directed toward a rigorous examination of such effects as seniority, we could control for confounding effects and operate the model with these controls to obtain these more specific insights into the effects of individual mechanisms.

III. THE VALIDITY OF THE SIMULATION MODEL:
ALTERNATIVE FORMULATIONS

Pool, Abelson, and Popkin have addressed themselves to the problems of evaluating a complex simulation model:

A complex model can predict real-world outcomes and yet be wrong in many details. It may predict accurately because the main effects are correctly represented and yet the model may contain many irrelevances. So one must always question the details of a complex model, even if it passes the test of good prediction.²⁶

Simulation is a modeling strategy that is perhaps ideally suited for the questioning of the details of a model. Assumptions can be changed, and in a matter of minutes the data can be processed on the reformulated model. In this section we turn to a consideration of the details of our simulation model of roll-call voting in the U. S. House of Representatives in order both to examine the validity of the model as it was originally formulated and to test the sensitivity of the determinants or effects pogrammed into the model to represent those processes and propositions that we had deemed to be significant factors in the roll-call behavior of the members of the House.

The Party Effect. There is little doubt that on the American legislative scene, party is the most significant factor in roll-call voting cleavages. Recent quantitive analyses of roll-call voting in the Congress have explored this phenomenon systematically. The Because party is a prominent determinant in our simulation model, appearing as both a predisposing factor and a communications parameter, a systematic assessment of the performance of the model requires the consideration of the extent to which the party effect contributes to that performance

We thus examine, first of all, the performance of a simulation model in which party is the only effect. Maintaining the same coding rules for party sponsorship and omitting all other determinants we obtain the voting results shown in Table 2. The actual results and the results obtained with the original model are also shown for purposes of comparison. Again using the voting splits as raw scores, we obtain a product-

³⁶ Ithiel de Sola Pool, Robert Abelson, and Samuel Popkin, Candidates, Strategies, and Issues: A Computer Simulation of the 1960 and 1964 Presidential Elections (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1964), p. 64.

37 See Turner, op. cit.; MacRae, op. cit.; Truman, op. cit.; and Froman, op. cit.

TABLE 2. THE RESULTS OF THE "JUST PARTY" MODEL

Bill	Original Model	% Correct	Party Model	% Correct	Actual Voting
HR 12 (recommittal)	171–339	84	171–239	84	171–239
HR 2	280-128	77	240 - 170	77	288-122
HR 4955 (recommittal)	153-244	92	163-235	93	181-217
HR 4955	382 - 13	92	399-0	95	378-27
HR 6143	294 - 104	70	237-163	60	287-113
S 1576	353-3	94	357-0	95	335-18
HR 6196 (recommittal)	167 - 237	81	169-235	81	179 - 224
HR 6196	232 - 168	78	232-168	78	216-182
HR 6518	262-119	82	220-163	78	273 - 109
HR 4955 (recommittal)	159-214	90	160-213	90	180-193
S 2265 (recommittal)	153 - 209	86	153-209	86	174-188
S 2265	241 - 121	76	210-152	74	254-107
HR 7152	323-100	84	423-0	69	290-130
HR 8316	362-0	87	362-0	87	317 - 43
HR 10222	245 - 173	90	242 - 176	90	229 - 189
HR 6196	238 - 175	89	237-177	89	211 - 203
HR 3881	230-172	82	235-167	75	212-189
HR 11377	247 - 172	85	245-167	84	226-185
HR 12175	371 - 3	82	374-0	81	308-68
HR 11926	221 - 170	78	0-0	00	218 - 175
S 3060 (recommittal)	148-197	76	148-197	76	107-237

moment coefficient of correlation between the actual voting splits and the "just party" simulated voting splits of .80 as compared with the .97 coefficient obtained with the original model. The micro level performance or average percentage of representatives correctly simulated by the "just party" model is 78 as compared with the 84 per cent obtained with the original model. It is thus clear, on the one hand, that party plays an important role in the performance of the simulation model, but on the other, it is also clear that the remaining effects built into our model are not irrelevant, for the results obtained with only the party effect are not as good as those obtained with the original model at either level.

Another way to assess both the model as a whole and the effect of the party variable is to run the model in its original form without including the party effect. When this is done the performance criteria are markedly similar to those obtained when just party is used to simulate the voting. The voting results obtained with this variation of the model are presented in Table 3 along with the results obtained with the "just party" model and the actual votes for purposes of comparison. The product-moment coefficient of correlation between the actual voting splits and those obtained with party removed from the model is .68, somewhat lower than that obtained with just party as the model. But the average percentage of representatives correctly simulated is 78, the same figure obtained for the "just party" simulation.

Two types of interpretations suggest themselves from the sensitivity testing of the model with the party effect the subject of our manipulations. The relatively similar performance of the model with just party and without party suggests that the original model is somewhat overdetermined in terms of party. The absence of party in the second reformulation of the model is partly compensated because of the extent to which the communications process is structured by a party effect, but the communications is also structured by the preceding predisposition phase of the model. This suggests that there may be a party surrogate in this prior phase that accounts for the similar performances. We examine this possibility below.

The other type of interpretation afforded by manipulation of the party effect relates to the types of issues processed in the model. Included in Table 3 along with the juxtaposed voting results of the "just party" and "without party" simulations are the percentages of representatives correctly simulated on each bill. If we examine the three different categories of party sponsorship, bipartisan, Democratic, and Republican, separately, we can determine the extent to which the party effect is significant in each. These are broken down into the party sponsorship categories in Table 4.

TABLE 3. THE RESULTS OF THE "JUST PARTY" AND "WITHOUT PARTY" MODELS

Bill	"Just Party" Model	% Correct	Actual Voting	"Without Party" Model	% Correct
HR 12 (recommittal)	171-239	84	171-239	158-250	84
HR 12	240-170	77	288-122	353-55	78
HR 4955 (recommittal)	163-235	93	181-217	120-175	83
HR 4955	399-0	95	378-27	285-113	70
HR 6143	237-163	€0	287-113	301-96	82
S 1576	357-0	95	335-18	272 - 83	75
HR 6196 (recommittal)	169-235	81	179-224	127-272	75
HR 6196	232-168	78	216-182	257 - 137	76
HR 6518	220-163	78	273 - 109	315-66	80
HR 4955 (recommittal)	160-213	90	180-193	121-243	84
S 2265 (recommittal)	153-209	86	174-188	171-188	88
S 2265	210-152	74	254-107	288-72	75
HR 7152	423-0	69	290-130	165-243	64
HR 8316	362-0	87	317-43	265-97	75
HR 10222	242 - 176	90	229-189	265-149	87
HR 6196	237-177	8 9	211-203	247-164	86
HR 3881	235-167	75	212-189	209-190	85
HR 11377	245-167	84	226-185	255-156	86
HR 12175	374-0	81.	308-68	297-75	79
HR 11926	0-0	00	218-175	224-170	79
S 3060 (recommittal)	148-197	76	107-237	130-213	79

Considering, first of all, the bills coded as bipartisan we obtain an average percentage of correctly simulated representatives of 90 with the "just party" model, slightly better than the 89 per cent obtained over the same bills with the original model. The percentage obtained with the "without party" model is only 75, considerably lower. Similarly, we obtain an average percentage of correctly simulated representatives on the Republican-sponsored recommittal motions of 85 with the "just party" model, the same figure obtained with the original model. The percentage obtained with the "without party" model is 71, again considerably lower.

When we examine the eleven remaining Democratic Administration bills, however, we find that the percentage of correctly simulated representatives is only 70 for the "just party" model as compared with the 82 per cent figure obtained with the original model. The "without party" model, on the other hand, correctly simulates an average of 79 per cent of the representatives on these bills. This reversal in performances between the "party only" and "without party" models suggests some validity for our presupposition about treating recommittal motions as incidents of party conflict rather than mediating the party effect with substantive coding for region and constituency variables as in the case of the Democratic Administration bills. At a general level, this result tends to validate the inclusion of constituency and regional effects in the model, for these enhance its performance. To assess the inclusions of regional and constituency effects more critically, however we must directly manipulate them with further sensitivity testing of the model.

The Constituency Effect. Investigations of the relationship between the demographic and political characteristics of constituencies and the roll-call behavior of their representatives have been extensive. The findings from these studies all point in the direction of such a

TABLE 4. COMPARISON OF THE ORIGINAL "JUST PARTY," AND "WITHOUT PARTY" MODELS ON THREE PARTY SPONSORSHIP CATEGORIES

	Criginal Model % Correct	"Just Party" Model % Correct	"Without Party" Model % Correct
Bipartisan Bills	89	90	75
Republican Sponsorship	85	85	71
Democratic Sponsorship	82	70	79

TO A TO T. TO	5	mar	DESTITATE	ΩF	"TOTAL TRANSPORTION 13	CONSTITUTENCY"	MODEL

Bill	Original Model	% Correct	Without Constituency	% Correct	Actual Voting
HR 12 (recommittal)	171–239	84	170-239	84	171-239
HR 12	280-128	77	242-168	77	288-122
HR 4955 (recommittal)	153 - 244	92	149-249	91	181-217
HR 4955	382-13	92	380-17	91	378-27
HR 6143	294-104	70	169-230	66	287-113
S 1576	353 - 3	94	352-4	94	33518
HR 6196 (recommittal)	167 - 237	81	168 - 236	81	179 - 224
HR 6196	232 - 168	78	233-166	78	216-182
HR 6518	262-119	82	224 - 159	79	273-109
HR 4955 (recommittal)	159-214	90	158-215	90	180-193
S 2265 (recommittal)	153 - 209	86	150-212	86	174-188
S 2265	241-121	76	213-149	74	254-107
HR 7152	323-100	84	297-126	88	290-130
HR 8316	362-0	87	362-0	87	317-43
HR 10222	245 - 173	90	243-175	90	229 - 189
HR 6196	238 - 175	89	238-176	88	211-203
HR 11377	230-172	82	236-166	76	212-189
HR 12175	247 - 172	85	245-167	84	226-185
HR 12175	371-3	82	351-20	83	308-68
HR 11926	221 - 170	78	317-0	42	218-175
S 3060 (recommittal)	148–197	76	147-198	76	107-237

relationship.38 While these investigations have not systematically explored the constituency effect from issue to issue in terms of the extent to which different types of issues result in different degrees of constituency loyalty on the part of representatives, Miller and Stokes' recent investigation explored the effect in this manner.39 They found, among other things, that representatives tend to heed the desires they perceive their constituents to have as well as the ones they actually do have, particularly on domestic welfare legislation. The close similarity between the welfare legislation included in the Stokes and Miller study and our bills dealing with the federal role is the basis upon which the decision to code constituency effects was made.

In order to examine the validity of constituency coding in general and the specific coding decisions made in particular, I have run the model on the twenty-one bills without the constituency coding that had been included in the original run. The voting results obtained with this alternative formulation of the model are presented in Table 5 along with the actual voting results and the voting results obtained with the original model for purposes of comparison. The coefficient of correlation between the actual splits and those resulting from the "without constituency" simulation is .80 as compared with the .97 coefficient obtained between the original model and the actual votes.40 It would appear that the constituency effect is not an irrelevant part of the simulation model.

²⁸ Turner, op. cit.; Duncan MacRae "The Relation Between Roll-Call Votes and Constituencies in the Massachusetts House of Representatives," this Review, 46 (1952), 1046-1055; MacRae, op. cit., 1958; J. Roland Pennock "Party and Constituency in Postwar Agricultural Price Support Legislation," Journal of Politics, 18 (1956), 167-210; Froman, op. cit.

³⁹ Warren Miller and Donald Stokes "Constituency Influence in Congress," this Review, 57 (1963), 45-56.

To examine the extent to which the specific constituency coding decisions were well advised, we consider the micro level performance of the model without the constituency coding. The average percentage of representatives correctly simulated on the twelve bills for which constituency was coded is 78 for the run with the "without constituency" model. This ⁴⁰ When we compute the correlation between the actual splits and the "without constituency" splits across only the twelve bills on which constituency was originally coded we obtain a coefficient of .78 as compared with a .95 obtained with the original model for the same bills.

TABLE 6. THE RESULTS OF THE "WITHOUT REGION" MODEL

Bill	Original Model	% Correct	Without Region	% Correct	Actual Voting
HR 12 (recommittal)	171-239	84	171–139	84	171-239
HR 12	280-128	77	287-123	75	288-122
HR 4955 (recommittal)	153 - 244	92	165-233	92	181-217
HR 4955	382-13	92	385-13	92	378-27
HR 6143	294-104.	80	338-61	70	287-113
S 1576	353-3	94	354-3	94	335-18
HR 6196 (recommittal)	167-237	81	168-236	81	179 - 224
HR 6196	232-168	78	232 - 167	78	216-182
HR 6518	262-119	82	252 - 129	81	273-109
HR 4955 (recommittal)	159-214;	90	159 - 213	90	180-193
S 2265 (recommittal)	153-209	86	154-208	86	174-188
S 2265	241-121	76	239-121	77	254-107´
HR 7152	323-100	84	423-0	70	290-130
HR 8316	362-0	87	265 - 97	75	317 - 43
HR 10222	245-173	90	244-174	90	229-189
HR 6196	238-175	89	238-176	89	211-203
HR 3881	230-172	82	244-158	78	212 - 189
HR 11377	247-172	85	246-166	85	226-185
HR 12175	371-3	82	371-3	82	308-68
HR 11926	221-170	78	225-169	78	218-175
S 3060 (recommittal)	148-197	76	147–198	76	107-237

compares with an average of 85 per cent obtained for those twelve bills with the original model. While this is not conclusive evidence of the validity of the specific coding decisions made for the constituency effects, it argues strongly for that validity. It tends to validate the model as a whole and to support previous findings on the effect of constituency factors on legislative roll-call voting behavior.

The Region Effect. Sectionalism or regional cleavages in congressional voting behavior have been found in many investigations. In our simulation of bills dealing with the federal role, only four were coded as having regional effects. All of these were coded to suggest a negative predisposition on the part of southern representatives.

To test the extent to which my regional coding aided in the performance of the simulation model we processed the twenty-one bills without the regional coding. The voting results obtained with this "without region" model are presented in Table 6 along with the actual results and those obtained with the original model for purposes of comparison. The productmoment coefficient of correlation between the splits on the actual bills and those resulted from the "without region" simulation is .89 as compared with the .97 coefficient obtained between the actual voting splits and those resulting from the original simulation model.⁴² The regional coding thus substantially improves the performance of the simulation model even though only four bills are coded as subject to a regional effect.

⁴¹ See for example H. G. Roach "Sectionalism in Congress (1870-1890)," this Review, 19 (1925), 500-526; G. Grassmuck, Sectional Biases in Congress on Foreign Policy (Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1951); V. O. Key, Southern Politics (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1949).

To test the extent to which my specific regional coding was well informed, we examine the micro level performance of the "without region" model. The average percentage of representatives correctly simulated with this variation of our original model is 77 as compared with an average of 83 correctly simulated with the original model for the four bills on which region effects were coded. We thus have partial validation of the regional coding decisions. It would appear that the substantive provisions of the simulation model (including both constituency and regional effects) is an important part of the legislative process involved ⁴² When we compute the correlation between the actual splits and the "without region" splits for only the four bills on which region was originally coded we obtain a coefficient of .62 as compared with a .99 obtained with the original model for the same bills.

î.

TABLE 7. THE RESULTS OF THE "WITHOUT MEMORY" MODEL

Bill	Original Model	% Correct	Without Memory	% Correct	Actual Voting
HR 12 (recommittal)	171-239	84	171-239	84	171-239
HR 12	280-128	77	336 - 72	71	288-122
HR 4955 (recommittal)	153 - 244	92	153 - 249	93	181-217
HR 4955	382-13	92	399-0	95	378-27
HR 6143	294-104	70	314-80	73	287-113
S 1576	353-3	94	357-0	95	335-18
HR 6196 (recommittal)	167-237	81	169 - 235	81	179-224
HR 6196	232-168	78	232-168	78	216-182
HR 6518	262 - 119	82	280-102	81	273-109
HR 4955 (recommittal)	159 - 214	90	160-213	90	180-193
S 2265 (recommittal)	153-209	86	166 - 196	83	174-188
S 2265	241-121	76	271 - 89	71	254-107
HR 7152	323-100	84	322-100	84	290-130
HR 8316	362-0	87	362-0	87	317-43
${ m HR} 10222$	245 - 173	90	246-171	90	229 - 189
HR 6196	238 - 175	89	237 - 177	89	211-203
HR 3881	230 - 172	82	172 - 229	7 8	212-189
HR 11377	247 - 172	85	245 - 167	84	226 - 185
HR 12175	371-3	. 82	374-0	81	308-68
HR 11926	221-170	78	226-168	78	218-175
S 3060 (recommittal)	148-197	76	148-197	76	107-237

in roll-call voting. The inclusion of these effects has aided the overall performance of the model at the macro level and provided better individual performance of the model on the bills for which coding makes the substantive provisions relevant.

The Memory Effect. On all but two of the bills, memory is coded in terms of whether the bill proposes an expansion or diminution of the federal role. Each representative thus has his predisposition affected if his past votes on the federal role issue dimension suggest a positive or negative attitude toward the expansion of the federal role. To examine the extent to which memory is an important effect in our model I have run the bills through the model without including the memory effect. The results of the "without memory" simulation are presented in Table 7 along with the actual and original simulation results for purposes of comparison.

Looking at the macro level performance of the "without memory" model, we obtain a product-moment coefficient of correlation of .97, the same coefficient obtained with the original model. The lack of contribution of memory can be further highlighted by viewing the results obtained when just memory is used to simulate the votes. The product-moment coefficient of correlation obtained between the actual voting splits and those resulting from the "just memory" simulation is only .21. These findings suggest that the memory effect does not aid in the macro level performance of the simulation model. The presence of the memory effect may, however, account for the findings obtained when the party effect was manipulated. When we correlate the splits resulting from the "just party" simulation with those resulting from the "just memory" simulation we obtain a coefficient of .62. This suggests that memory tends to coincide to some extent with party membership and is thus somewhat of a party surrogate which may explain part of the similarity of the results obtained with the "just party" and "without party" simulations.

Despite the small role that memory has been shown to have in the macro level performance of the simulation model, the micro level performance of the "without memory" simulation model indicates that the memory effect is not entirely superfluous. The average percentage of representatives correctly simulated by the "without memory" model is 82 as compared with the 84 per cent figure obtained when memory is included. The memory effect is thus a slight aid in the micro level performance of the model.

Of some interest is the performance of the memory effect on the different types of bills. Comparing the average percentage of correctly simulated representatives obtained with the "without memory" model and the original

TABLE 8. THE RESULTS OF THE "WITHOUT COMMUNICATIONS" MODEL

Bill	Original Model	% Correct	Without Communication	% Correct	Actual Voting
HR 12 (recommittal)	171-239	84	173-222	84	171–239
HR 12	280-128	77	254-119	72	288-122
HR 4955 (recommittal)	153-244	92	155-233	90	181-217
HR 4955	382 - 13	92	303-34	74	378-27
HR 6143	294-104	70	188-133	62	287-113
S 1576	353-3	94	278-13	77	335-18
HR 6196 (recommittal)	167 - 237	81	170 - 221	79	179 - 224
HR 6196	232-168	78	220 - 168	78	216-182
HR 6518	262-119	82	219-120	76	273-109
HR 4955 (recommittal)	159-214	90	158-200	88	180-193
S 2265 (recommittal)	153-209	86	164-169	84	174-188
S 2265	241-121	76	207-121	72	254-107
HR 7152	323-100	84	298-100	83	290-130
HR 8316	36 2- 0	87	265-96	68	317-43
HR 10222	245 - 173	90	237-170	89	229-189
HR 6196	238-175	89	226 - 176	87	211-203
HR 3881	230-172	82	169-177	77	212-189
HR 11377	247 - 172	85	228 - 168	85	226 - 185
HR 12175	371-3	82	285-25	74	308-68
HR 11926	221-170	78	214-167	77	218-175
S 3060 (recommittal)	148-197	76	147–183	76	107-237

model for the four bipartisan bills yields the same figure of 89. Similarly, the "without memory" model results in the same average percentage of representatives correctly simulated across the six Republican sponsored recommittal motions as in the original model, 85. It is on the Democratic Administration bills that memory appears to aid the micro level performance of the model.

While the original model correctly simulated the voting behavior of 82 per cent of the representatives on the Democratic Administration bills, the "without memory" model correctly simulated only 79 per cent of the representatives on these bills. Because it is these bills that deal with the substantive issues involved in legislation, the memory effect probably conveys the impact of ideological postures that have been found to have some effect on legislative roll-call behavior. In the case of recommittal motions and bipartisan bills, the content of the bill that tends to evoke ideological effects is obfuscated by procedural concerns and the bipartisan effect respectively.

The Communication Effect. We turn finally to a consideration of the contribution made by the communications phase of the model. Again this assessment is made by testing the sensitivity of the effect by removing it. The voting results obtained when the model is run without the communications process are presented in Table 8 along with the actual and original simulation model voting results for purposes of comparison. Examining, first of all, the macro level performance of this alternative formulation of the model we obtain a product-moment coefficient of correlation between the actual voting splits and those resulting from the "without communications" simulations of .88 as compared with the .97 coefficient obtained between the actual and original model voting splits.

The micro level performance of the model is also enhanced by the communication process. The average percentage of representatives correctly simulated by the "without communications" simulation model is 78 as compared with the 84 per cent correctly simulated by the original model. We thus have a basis for believing that the communications process is not an irrelevant part of our overall model.

Several important questions can be raised with respect to internal aspects of the communications phase of the model. In constructing the process I found that changes in key mechanisms such as the salience of the party effect resulted in a dimunition of the performance of the model as a whole. Changes in the average number of communications of representatives had similar effects on the performance of the model as a whole. A thorough examination of the sensitivity of all the important effects in the communication process has not been conducted as yet, but the indications derived from the examinations thus far suggest that the communications phase of this model is quite sensitive to changes in parameters and mechanisms.

⁴⁸ See footnote 2 above.

IV. CONCLUSION

The fact that every alternative formulation of the model undertaken thus far has decreased some aspect of the model's performance lends evidence in support of the contention that the relatively good match obtained between the actual roll-call voting in the House on federal role issues and in our simulation is not a result of a number of errors or ill-advised hypotheses that cancel each other out to make the model right for the wrong reasons. What is especially significant is the fact that the theoretical model based upon propositions from legislative and face-to-face group research can be used to simulate the roll-call voting on an issue area in two sessions of the House with good performances at the macro and micro levels.

The results of the research just reported can be assessed from various perspectives. From the point of view of legislative behavior research, the performance of the model lends support to the propositions from legislative research upon which it is based. In addition, the model represents, in itself, a theoretical formalization of legislative voting behavior. To the extent that it was validated with the sensitivity testing reported in this chapter, that formalization has been shown to perform in a manner that suggests acceptance of the conceptualizations which comprise it.

In terms of the manner in which theories can be evaluated, this theoretical model has performed well on the basis of a prediction criterion. In addition, the ability of the model to simulate legislative voting effectively with few mechanisms grouped into its predisposition and communication phases suggests a positive evaluation in terms of a theoretical organizing criterion discussed in a recent article. To the extent to which the model performs similarly on other types of issues and for other sessions of the House, its organizing power will be further enhanced. The manipul-

⁴⁴ K. W. Deutsch, J. D. Singer, and K. Smith. "The Organizing Efficiency of Theories," American Behavioral Scientist, 9 (1965), 30-33.

⁴⁵ For a more extensive treatment of the model which includes an assessment of its performance on foreign affairs legislation, see Cleo H. Cherryholmes and Michael J. Shapiro Representatives and ability of the model has been demonstrated, in part, by the sensitivity testing reported in this paper. While it cannot be increased without sacrificing organizing power, its potential has not been exhausted here.

The performance of the model can also be assessed in terms of its successful simulation of a large decision-making body. It can be noted that the evaluation of the performance of processes in large groups depends upon the ability to discern outputs from the group processes in order to compare the functional equivalence of outputs in the simulation and thereby obtain evaluation criteria. The public character of roll-call voting provides an easily obtained quantifiable output and thus renders legislatures susceptible to the simulation mode of investigation. The success of this simulation is encouraging from the point of view of its implications for the application of the simulation technique to the study of social and political processes in large groups as well as its illumination of the determinants of the legislative process involved in the roll-call voting decisions of representatives.

Finally, a number of directions in which investigation of the model might proceed suggest themselves. In terms of the predisposition phase of the model, we could investigate the extent to which the inclusion of personal characteristics of representatives as predisposing effects would affect the simulation of roll-call votes. The communications phase of the model could be reformulated in two ways. First, a number of parameters could be added to affect conversation probabilities, and second, the communication process could be cycled to allow for a diffusion of influence whereby those whose predispositions have been changed as a result of interactions with colleagues could interact with other colleagues as influencers on the basis of their newly acquired predispositions.

What is perhaps most significant from the point of view of future research possibilities with the model is the relative similarity of state legislatures of the Congress. In order to develop our model to the point where it simulates legislative voting in a broader sense, we hope to employ it in simulations of roll-call voting in state legislatures as well as in several other sessions of the U.S. House of Representatives. In this way we hope to enhance the organizing power of a theoretical formulation, the potential of which we have begun to explore in the research reported here.

Roll-Calls: A Computer Simulation of Voting in the Eighty-Eighth Congress (Indianapolis, Indiana: Bobbs-Merrill, 1968), forthcoming.

ORGANIZATION THEORY AND THE EXPLANATION OF IMPORTANT CHARACTERISTICS OF CONGRESS*

LEWIS A. FROMAN, JR. University of California, Irvine

By and large the Congress of the United States has been studied on its own terms, as a somewhat unique political institution. Studies of Congress are usually considered to be important simply because they shed light on an important institution in the American political system. It is true, of course, that Congress is an important policy-making body and does deserve study for that reason. But there is no reason why substantive importance cannot be combined with "importance" in another sense. It is also important, for example, to develop theory within any discipline which will help explain the phenomena under study. Trivial substantive problems can be made interesting because of the theory which they suggest. And because a problem may already be substantively important does not mean that it cannot be made even more significant by theoretical development.

As a result of this substantive focus, research on Congress has produced a very rich body of descriptive data on various components of the institution, including its members and leadership, group structure, committees, party systems, organization, and rules and procedures. Studies have also provided generalizations concerning such things as the decentralized decision-making of Congress and the effects of the seniority rule on the distribution of power within the House and Senate. These descriptive data and generalizations may serve as the content to be explained within the context of a theory. As yet there has been very little effort at theory construction concerning Congress. The data are there—their organization and explication remain.

I. CHARACTERISTICS OF CONGRESS

Although it is difficult to abstract the most important characteristics of Congress which have emerged from these studies, most close observers would agree that the following thirteen accurately reflect some of the more interesting and useful things which may be said about Congress.¹

* I wish to thank James G. March and Deane E. Neubauer for helpful comments on earlier versions of this paper.

I. Impact on Public Policy

1. Congress is an important political decision-making body which, unlike legislatures in many other countries, makes a significant, independent contribution to public policy.

II. Organization

- 2. Decision-making in Congress is highly decentralized, with power widely dispersed among committees, subcomittees, and the formal and party leadership.
- 3. Each body has a well-developed system of formal and impersonal rules and procedures, with the rules of the House of Representatives more formal and impersonal than those of the Senate.

III. Members

- 4. Members in each body may make large individual contributions to public policy, although some members are more salient than others.
- 5. Members of each house have a high commitment and loyalty to the Congress.

IV. Group Structure

- 6. There are many subgroups within each body, with the House having a larger number than the Senate.
- 7. There is a highly developed specialization of labor and specificity of roles, and more so in the House than the Senate.
- 8. Group cohesion in each body is relatively low.
- 9. The existence of an active group structure has important consequences for decision-making and public policy.
- ¹ Since the literature is so voluminous, and since most of the findings have been replicated and are not controversial, I will not attempt to cite specific references in each instance. For a general bibliography see the latest texts on Congress, William J. Keefe and Morris S. Ogul, The American Legislative Process: Congress and the States (Englewood Cliffs: Frentice-Hall, 1964), and Malcolm E. Jewell and Samuel C. Patterson, The Legislative Process in the United States (New York: Random House, 1966).

(

V. Leadership

10. Each house has a relatively elaborate and complex leadership structure.

11. Authority of leadership is relatively low.

VI. Processes

12. Internal communication within each body is relatively elaborate and complex.

13. A prevalent form of decision-making within each body is bargaining.

These thirteen generalizations about Congress are obviously not meant to be exhaustive of those which could be made in each category (as well as in additional categories). They are, however, among the more important propositions which aid in the understanding of the congressional process. As far as I know none are contradicted by any study, and most are supported extensively in the literature. These thirteen propositions, then, will be taken as "given," as true of Congress, and as important enough to be "explained."

II. POSSIBLE EXPLANATORY THEORIES

There are, essentially, two ways in which one may attempt to link up emprireal findings with observations about their significance. One may discuss the consequences of the findings, what happens because the findings are true; or one may attempt to show why the findings are true, what explains the findings. The first is called functional analysis, the latter causal analysis.

Occasionally, but unfortunately only occasionally, the rich descriptive data on specific aspects of Congress and the generalizations relating one aspect to another are related further to possible consequences which the data being explored may have on public policy, careers of members, relations with the executive branch, or the American political system in general. Although most researchers on Congress are aware of the importance of demonstrating the effects which the institutional characteristics or processes which they describe have on important outcomes, the difficulty in collecting reliable data on such consequences often prohibits more than speculation.

More rare still are studies which explain why the descriptions or patterns which are observed are what they are. With relative infrequency historical references are made as to the genesis of certain features of Congress, but little or no causal analysis is attempted. At best one finds ad hoc explanations of special features of Congress, but such explanations are normally intrinsic to the organization itself and therefore difficult to validate in terms of general laws. Comparative data are necessary for this purpose. For example, to explain why power in Congress is decentralized it is not sufficient to point to the existence of the committee system. Multiple units are undoubtedly necessary to a dispersal of power, but not a sufficient condition for it. Are, for example, all organizations with committees decentralized? Undoubtedly not. But raising the general question forces one to think in a context larger than Congress itself, that is, on a comparative basis.

It is commonly accepted in philosophy of science that one achieves explanation of a phenomenon when that phenomenon can be subsumed under a general law. Thus, that Congress has a seniority system might be deduced from the following argument: All organizations with extensive divisions of labor have seniority systems; Congress is an organization with an extensive division of labor; therefore... (The soundness of this particular argument is not at issue here, it is the form of explanatory propositions with which this paragraph is concerned.)

What is necessary, then, in order to "explain" certain salient features of Congress is to subsume the specific findings under a set of more general hypotheses or laws (whether the former or the latter will affect the credibility of the explanation). But to do so requires moving away from the view that Congress is a unique institution and treating it, instead, as an instance of a more general category. What the more general category is will affect the terms of the theory as well as other matters. For example, Congress may be considered as an example of a legislature. If we had a theory of legislatures, then many of the propositions about Congress could be tested within that theory and many of the characteristics of Congress could be explained by the laws or hypotheses of that theory. We do not, however, have such a theory, although the development of one would certainly be useful. We do have the beginnings of general theory in the literature on organizations and it is not unrealistic, in order to use that theory, to label Congress an instance or an example of a formal organization.

If we view Congress as a formal organization, and use the general propositions which have been stated, with more or less validity, about formal organizations, we will be able to avoid strictly ad hoc interpretations of Congressional phenomena and, in their place, substitute a somewhat organized and consistent set of empirical generalizations which have been found to be true of other formal organizations. Such propositions, used in explanation, may be quite powerful and parsimonious and aid immeasurably in our understanding of why Congress is as it is. Dealing with Congress at this theoretical level may also have a number of other payoffs. If we are able to subsume important findings about a political institution under some general laws such an effort would provide significant clues as to what might be involved in attempts to change or reform various features of that organization. When one attempts to make changes in the absence of knowledge about causes, he is often "whistling in the wind," a constant source of irritation by the way to those who, at an intuitive level, are knowledgeable about Congress and who must deal with reform proposals by those who are

What follows, then, is an effort to explain the thirteen general characteristics of Congress concerning public policy, organization, members, group structure, leadership and processes, by subsuming these characteristics under general statements which have been drawn from organizations other than Congress. It is in this sense that Congress will be treated as a formal organization, subject to the same "laws" as other organizations, and unique only in the sense that there is only one Congress of the United States although there are many formal organizations.

The major source of these propositions is an article by Stanley Udy, Jr., which is an effort to subsume the extant literature on comparative organizations by the formulation of somewhat abstract generalizations.2 Udy's definitions will be found in his article, along with the bibliographic references supporting the propositions. In several cases the propositions have been rephrased for clarity, consistency, and relevance. It is to be emphasized, however, that these propositions are designed to encompass organizations in general and that data from legislative bodies had no part in their formulation. The process in which we are engaged in this paper, then, may be described in two ways: (1) an exploration of "goodness of fit" of propositions in one literature to the findings in another literature, and (2) an attempt to organize a number of descriptive statements about Congress around a set of explanatory propositions.

² Stanley H. Udy, Jr., "The Comparative Analysis of Organizations," in James G. March (ed.), Handbook of Organizations (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1965), pp. 678-709. Proposition seven comes from James G. March and Herbert A. Simon, Organizations (New York: Wiley, 1958), p. 130.

III. EXPLANATION OF MAJOR FINDINGS ON CONGRESS

The propositions about organizations from Udy and March and Simon may be placed in one of two categories, depending upon the reference of the independent variable: (a) propositions in which the environment of the organization is the independent variable, and (b) propositions in which either the organization itself or its membership is the independent variable. We will first consider three propositions which specify the environment or social setting as the independent variable. These three propositions help to explain seven of the descriptive statements about Congress enumerated at the beginning of this paper. The numbers in parentheses following each proposition refer to the descriptive statements (see above) being subsumed. We will then proceed to discuss four propositions in which organizational factors are the independent variables.

Environmental Determinants

1a. The more highly differentiated the social setting, the more salient the organization itself.³
(1)

Since outcomes of legislatures are public policies, this proposition asserts that although any setting undoubtedly affects an organization's output, the more differentiated and less unitary the setting the greater will be the effects of the organization itself in determining the organization's outcomes.

Applying this general proposition to Congress, it has often been suggested that Congress does not simply ratify the requests from its environment (including requests from the executive, interest groups, public opinion, political parties, etc.), but that the organization itself has a major impact on matters of public policy. It is even suggested that the American Congress is probably more powerful vis-à-vis the executive than are most other national legislatures. One explanation of this independence, as this first proposition suggests, is that the United States Congress may be classed with those formal organizations which face a relatively more differentiated environment. The social setting of the British Parliament, for example, is a good deal less highly differentiated given the fact that the diversity of interests which exist are already aggregated in a strong, cohesive, majority party which presents the bulk of requests. In Britain, of course, Parliament is not a highly salient political institution in terms of its independent impact on public policy. This observation may lead to a general hypothesis about legislatures: the independent influence which a legislature exerts will vary inversely with the centralization of other pressures. The French Assembly under the Fourth Republic could have a greater impact on public policy than the French Assembly in the Fifth Republic. In the former centralization of pressure was rather weak; in the latter it is relatively strong.

³ This part of proposition one is actually a deduction from two others: The more highly differentiated . . . the social setting, the less salient it will be; The less salient the social setting . . . , the more salient the organization itself; therefore By "differentiated" is meant dispersed, heterogeneous, plural, non-unitary. By "salient" is meant important as an influence on the output of the organization.

1b. The more highly differentiated the social setting, the more decentralized the decisional apparatus, the greater the amount of internal communication and group interaction, and the greater the expectation of high commitment of members.⁴ (2, 12, and 5)

Part b of this proposition asserts that not only will a diffuse and non-unitary environment make the organization more important as a determiner of its own decisions, but such an environment will also affect how the body is organized and how its members behave. An organization which faces a more unitary environment will be less likely to have an elaborate decentralized decision-making structure. It will also have less internal communication and less commitment of its members to the organization (which may, incidentally, also help to explain why a more centralized decision-structure is necessary).

The fact that Congress is subjected to a wide breadth and diffuseness of external pressures is documented without contradiction in the literature on Congress as well as in the relevant literatures on interest groups, political parties, public opinion, and public administration. The literature, of course, also supports the findings that Congress is highly decentralized, has a large amount of internal communication and ⁴ These three dependent variables are positively associated with what Udy calls "breadth and diffuseness of external pressure." I take "differentiated social setting" and "breadth and diffuseness of external pressure" to be synonymous.

Ĭ

interaction, and a high commitment of members to the organization.⁵

It is also interesting to observe that propositions 1a. and 1b. are probably mutually reinforcing. That is, an organization which has an important independent influence on its own decisions is also an organization where one would expect the commitment of members to be high. Similarly, an organization where commitment of its members is low is much more likely to be hierarchically organized (in order to force compliance) than an organization where commitment is high.

The amount of differentiation in the social setting, then, affects four important variables, some of which also influence (or at least are consistent with) the others.

2. The . . . greater the amount of pressure exerted on the organization from the social setting, the greater the emphasis on administration. (10)

In this proposition "administration" may mean at least three things: (1) routine tasks, (2) elaborate rules and procedures, and (3) complexity of leadership structure. Although we are primarily interested in the latter, all three meanings of the term are consistent with congressional findings. Proposition 2, then, asserts that organizations will vary in amount of routine tasks, the elaboration of rules and procedures, and leadership complexity and that one of the factors affecting the extent of "administration" is the amount of pressure exerted on the organization from the environment.

Studies of Congress attest to the large amount of outside pressure which is exerted on its members (from interest groups, constituents, executive agencies, party leaders, etc.) and also to the large amount of time which is spent by Congressmen and Senators on routine tasks (answering the mail, going to meetings, "making a record," etc.), the rather elaborate rules and procedures in both bodies, and the relatively complicated leadership structure. As is suggested by the general proposition, the two sets of factors, amount of pressure and amount of administration, are related in organizations other than Congress as well.

- ⁵ For discussions and bibliography see Keefe and Ogul, op. cit.; and Jewell and Patterson, op. cit.
- ⁶ For example, see Robert L. Peabody, "Party Leadership Change in the United States House of Representatives," this Review, 61 (September, 1967), Randall B. Ripley, "The Party Whip Organizations in the United States House of Repre-

Another way to state this proposition is in terms of work overload. Congressmen and Senators are literally deluged with requests, information, and "pressure." The three administrative responses of routine, rules, and role structure are efforts to cope with this overload.

3. The greater the degree of conflict with the social setting, the greater the amount of authority exercised at all levels, and the more cohesive the group structure. (11, 8)

Authority exercised by leaders in Congress is relatively small. Committee chairmen, the Speaker, the Majority and Minority Leaders, etc., are not able to command support although they do bargain for it. The literature suggests that leaders do have rewards and punishments to dispense, but all agree that the size of these resources is relatively small. Similarly, although the group structure in Congress is important and extensive it is not cohesive.⁷

These features follow from the independent variable in the above proposition, that is, Congress as an organization is not in conflict with the social setting. Rather, one would more accurately describe the relationship as being in league with the social setting. This comes about in two ways. First, Congressmen and Senators have constituents to court and care for, and they in fact spend an enormous amount of time doing just that. Estimates of time spent on constituency affairs range as high as ninety percent. Congressmen and Senators may, in fact, be in conflict with certain segments of the population, but not a majority of their own constituents (at least not publicly).

Second, it has been pointed out numerous times that although in some senses the executive branch and Congress are in conflict, in most matters legislators work hand in glove sentatives," this Review, 58 (September, 1964), 561-576; Lewis A. Froman, Jr. and Randall B. Ripley, "Conditions for Party Leadership: The Case of the House Democrats," this Review, 59 (March, 1965), 52-63, and Lewis A. Froman, Jr., The Congressional Process: Strategies, Rules, and Procedures (Boston: Little, Brown, 1967).

⁷ Lewis A. Froman, Jr., Congressmen and Their Constituencies (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963); David B. Truman, The Congressional Party (New York: Wiley, 1959); Alan Fiellin, "The Functions of Informal Groups: A State Delegation," in Robert L. Peabody and Nelson W. Polsby (eds.), New Perspectives on the House of Representatives (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963), pp. 59-78; and John H. Kessel, "The Washington Congressional Delegation," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 8 (Feb., 1964), 1-21.

with the administrative departments which they oversee. Of course, the amount of cooperation undoubtedly varies in the House and Senate from committee to committee, but by and large relations with executive agencies are cordial and friendly, not hostile.

Another aspect of these same phenomena of lack of strong authority and low cohesion is the fact that Congress exhibits a good deal of intraorganizational conflict, not only between the parties but within parties as well. It would also be expected that this would be true of other organizations which have non-conflictual environmental relations, a fact which might suggest that relationships between organizational variables in Congress might also be generalizable to other organizations.⁸

These three environmental factors, extent of differentiation, amount of pressure, and degree of conflict help to explain a wide range of congressional phenomena in particular (statements 1, 2, 5, 8, 10, 11, and 12 in the list at the beginning of this paper), and organizational phenomena in general.

Organizational Determinants

In the previous three propositions the environment or social setting has been the major independent variable. In this section we well consider propositions in which the independent variable is intra-organizational.

4. The more permanent the organization, the lower its turnover rate, and the less mechanized the technology, the higher the salience of its group structure. (9)

One of the features of Congress which has intrigued several recent writers on Congress is the important role which informal groups and group norms have in affecting the way in which Congressmen do their work. It has long been

- ⁸ See, for example, Samuel P. Huntington, The Common Defense (New York: Columbia University Press, 1961), which draws explicit parallels between Congressional processes and decision-making in the Pentagon.
- ° See Richard F. Fenno, Jr., "The House Appropriations Committee as a Political System: The Problem of Integration," this Review, 56 (June, 1962), 310-324; Donald R. Matthews, U. S. Senators and Their World (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1960), especially Chapters 1 through 5; Alan Fiellin, "The Functions of Informal Groups: A State Delegation," in Peabody and Polsby (eds.), op. cit., pp. 59-78, and John F. Manley, "The House Committee on Ways and Means: Conflict Management in a Congressional Committee," this Review, 59 (December, 1965), 927-939.

known, since Woodrow Wilson's Congressional Government,10 that committees and subcommittees play an all but overwhelming role in Congressional deliberations. But not only are these more formal groups now recognized as important cogs in the decision-making apparatus, but informal groups such as state delegations, voluntary clubs such as the Democratic Study Group in the House, informal groups of individuals within committees and subcommittees, and even larger groups such as the "conservative coalition," are being given increasingly more attention. Both the House and the Senate have a large number of informal groups as well as formal ones.

Causal proposition 4 asserts that the permanence of an organization, its relatively low turnover, and an unmechanized technology help to produce in organizations generally a highly salient group structure. Congress is certainly a permanent organization. Less well known, however, is the fact that turnover from Congress to Congress is relatively low, averaging about fifteen percent in the House of Representatives every two years.11 That is, approximately eighty-five percent of all Congressmen remain in Congress from one election to the next. The turnover in leadership positions. of course, is even smaller. In addition Congress is noted for its resistance to mechanization. Even such simple things as the installation of electric voting devices have failed to attract much enthusiasm among Congressmen and Senators. Most members of Congress pick up their information about what is going on as a result of talking with others. Televising the proceedings in each chamber, with closed-circuit outlets in each office would certainly be an aid to the members in determining when their presence on the floor might be desired. Rather than this, however, reliance is placed on word of mouth, and such low mechanization items as the telephone.

In addition to the high salience of the group structure, or more likely as a consequence of it, a number of informal norms have developed which help to protect the members and preserve stability. In a body in which members will be in contact with one another over long periods of time, and in which the technology of the organization is almost entirely social, it is not surprising to find that informal ways of doing things grow up which help to avoid serious threats to the stability and functioning of the organization. The seniority rule, senatorial courtesy, restrained debate, and even the socalled "Senate type," are undoubtedly a product of this. No issue is worth the destruction of the institution-members will have to deal with other members over a wide range of issues and over long periods of time. Legislators are, in effect, socialized into rules which specify that one must not jeopardize his ability to play future games by seriously discombobulating other members.

¹⁰ (New York, Meridian Books, 1956.) This book was first published in 1885.

¹¹ See Samuel P. Huntington, "Congressional Responses to the Twentieth Century," in David B. Truman (ed.), The Congress and America's Future (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1965); Nelson W. Polsby, "The Institutionalization of the House of Representatives," paper delivered at the 1966 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, and Lewis A. Froman, Jr., The Congressional Process, op. cit., Chapter 1.

5. The greater the need for technical expertise, the more salient the membership. (4)

Not only is Congress as an organization highly salient (essentially because of its highly differentiated environment), and groups within Congress important (causal proposition 4), but its members may also become significant figures in the development of public policy. Undoubtedly, as this proposition suggests, part of the reason why this is true is the importance attached to technical knowledge about very complicated matters of public policy. Such expertise may lie in a substantive field like housing or tax matters, or in parliamentary skills. In any event members may become influential by the amount of information about a topic which they have at their command.¹²

This factor of technical expertise also helps to explain why some Congressmen are more important than others and why periods of apprenticeship are developed within the institution. A number of norms of behavior, in fact, revolve around the learning of technical expertise. Freshman members are expected not to participate extensively in debate, to speak only about what they know, and generally to watch and listen rather than participate. 13 One source of power in the House and Senate is information and, like other technical skills, it must be learned. Additional support is given to this hypothesis by the deference which is paid to those who have information and skills. Wilbur Mills, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, for example, is an enormously respected member of the House, not only because of his formal position but for his technical competence and parliamentary skill as well.

¹² See, for example, Richard F. Fenno, Jr., The Power of the Purse (Boston: Little, Brown, 1966).

¹³ See Matthews, op. cit., Chapter 5.

6. The larger the size of the organization, the greater the number of subgroups in it; hence the greater the overall emphasis on formal and impersonal rules and specificity of roles. (3, 6, 7)

This proposition helps us in two ways. First, both the House and Senate are relatively large organizations. For example, in 1960 more than ninety-five percent of the 4.7 million business organizations in the United States had less than one hundred employees. ¹⁴ Even without counting the large supporting staffs in the House and Senate, each is larger than this figure. We would expect, then, that both houses of Congress would have a relatively large number of subgroups, formal and impersonal rules, and high specificity of roles.

But the fact that membership in the House is over four times that of the Senate would also suggest that the House, as compared with the Senate, would have a larger number of subgroups, a more complex and impersonal set of rules, and greater role specificity. The data indicate that each of these is true. Although the data on social groups is incomplete, in formal group structures the House in the Eighty-ninth Congress (1965-66) had 20 committees and 125 subcommittees, whereas the comparable figures for the Senate were 16 and 99. On the question of role specificity. Representatives are usually members of only one committee whereas Senators normally have three or more committee assignments. In addition fifty-one percent of Senate Democrats have two or more committee or subcommittee chairmanships whereas only twelve percent of House Democrats play such multiple roles.15 The data on rules and procedures is somewhat more difficult to summarize. but existing evidence supports the contention that House rules are more elaborate, formal, and impersonal than are Senate rules.16

7. The extent of use of analytic processes to resolve conflict is a function of the type of organizational conflict involved. The more organizational conflict represents individual rather than intergroup conflict, the greater the use of analytic procedures. The more organizational conflict represents intergroup differences, the greater the use of bargaining. 17 (13)

This proposition simply asserts that bargaining as a method of reaching agreement will be prevalent in organizations which have group conflict as opposed to analytic problem-solving devices in individual conflict.18 The processes of log-rolling, compromise, and side-payments are widely used to reach majority agreement in committees, subcommittees, and on the floor of both the House and Senate.19 The reasons for intergroup conflict in Corgress are, of course, obvious. Disagreements in Congress reflect, generally, the cleavages within society. Such cleavages include ideological differences (e.g., over the role of the federal government), religion, race, region, social class, and many others. Small groups of Congressmen and Senators may think somewhat alike on such matters, but putting together a majority coalition with respect to any single policy which touches on one or more cleavages usually results in extensive bargaining.

These last four intraorganizational propositions, then, account for the remaining six descriptive statements about Congress (3, 4, 6, 7, 9, and 13).

IV. SUMMARY AND IMPLICATIONS

We began this paper with thirteen major propositions about Congress. Each was subsumed under a more general empirical proposition about formal organizations derived independently of any data on Congress but which fit other formal organizations. We can now briefly summarize, diagrammatically, the major relationships.

In each of the thirteen explanations there is no recourse to factors peculiar to Congress (and hence no problem in proving the validity of unique explanations). In addition several additional findings about Congress were cast in a more general language to suggest that they too may not be peculiar to only one formal organization.

A number of implications for further research are suggested by this tentative beginning in wedding organization theory to the study of Congress.

1. Propositions in organization theory may be very helpful in causal analysis of political institutions other than those usually included in public administration. The executive branch is by no means the only location of formal or-

¹⁸ A similar proposition is found in Udy, op. cit.: "The greater the difficulty of group as opposed to individual problems, the greater the pressures toward social interaction" (p. 701).

¹⁹ See Froman, The Congressional Process, op. cit., Chapter 2.

¹⁴ William R. Dill, "Business Organizations," in James G. March, op. cit., p. 1072.

¹⁵ Lewis A. Froman, Jr., The Congressional Process, op. cit.

¹⁶ Ibid., passim.

¹⁷ This proposition is taken from James G. March and Herbert A. Simon, Organizations (New York: Wiley, 1958), p. 130.

Fig. 1. Summary relationships.

Independen	t Variables		Congressional Dependent Variables
Setting	Organizational	Policy	Organization	Members	Group Structure	Leadership	Process
. highly differ- entiated		1. high salience of Congress	2. high decen- tralization	5. high commit- ment			12. high internal communication
2. amount of pressure					arren como de apro de aproxece.	10. high complexity of leadership	y
3. low conflict					8. low cohesion	11. low authority
	4. high perman low turnover low mechanic	•			9. high salience of group structure
	5. high technic expertise	al —		4. high salience of members
	6. size→	3. high formal an impersonal rul		6. large number of subgroups 7. high specificity of roles
	7. intergroup conflict					-	13. bargaining

ganizations which may have common features. In addition, the general propositions used here by no means exhaust the list of possible factors which may be included in the study of comparative organizations.²⁰

- 2. There is, of course, no reason why such comparative study should be restricted to the search for causes only. It may also be true that certain organizational characteristics may produce similar consequences in terms of the organization's output. None of the possibilities which readily suggest themselves concerning functional analysis have been included here.
- 3. As suggested at the beginning of this paper, proposals for change in such highly visible organizations as the United States Congress must take into account the "realities" of the organization. Included in a list of such realities would have to be some notion of why the organization operates the way it does now in order to make realistic estimates of the likely acceptance and feasibility of changes. To propose changes without taking into account the causal roots of what is being proposed to be changed is to run the risk of being labeled naive, being ignored, or botching the job. Among other things which the 1946 Legislative Reorganization Act purported to do, for example, was to reduce the number of committees in Congress. In fact, counting subcommittees which have vastly increased in number, the number of subgroups in the organization has increased. The analysis in this paper perhaps sheds some light on why this has been the case.
- ²⁰ Udy's article, op. cit., lists many more general propositions, most of which have to do with technological and psychological relationships.

4. The interplay between organization theory and the study of specific formal organizations like Congress need not be all in the direction of organization theory suggesting the more general propositions which will then be applied to a specific governmental institution. In several places in this paper propositions which developed from the study of Congress were thought to have more general application. For example, a greater degree of technical expertise in any organization might produce a more highly extended apprenticeship system, similar to the one developed in Congress. Or organizations which have low conflict relations with the environment might be hypothesized to have a higher degree of intra-organizational conflict. Both of these general propositions were suggested as a result of the study of Congress, and the question being asked is whether these propositions might not be true of other organizations.

5. One of the advantages of relying on comparative data as a source of general propositions is that factors which may be peculiar to only a small subset of institutions may turnout, on reflection, to be special cases of more general rules. For example, although a large number of important propositions about Congress were discussed, in no case was it even necessary to refer to the fact that Congressmen are elected rather than recruited in some other way. Certainly the fact that they are elected has something to do with the low degree of conflict with the social setting which, it is suggested, is characteristic of Congress. But organizations may, for many different and specific reasons arrive at the same or similar degree of low conflict. Election is one way, recruitment through professional schools may be another. Regardless of the specific nature of recruitment, however, the result may be the same, that is, low conflict with the social setting.

Given these advantages of comparative organizational study, it is hoped that this paper will encourage further efforts in the same direction.

IF, AS VERBA SAYS, THE STATE FUNCTIONS AS A RELIGION, WHAT ARE WE TO DO THEN TO SAVE OUR SOULS?*

LEWIS LIPSITZ
University of North Carolina

Sidney Verba has argued that the state in modern societies may function as a religion. He is certainly not the only one to adopt such a point of view. But his work is especially notable in that he has strengthened the argument by welding together a theoretical perspective that seems to be derived from structural-functional analysis and a good deal of varied and interesting, though not crystal-clear data. Verba's discussion of the functions of the state is most explicit in his article on the Kennedy assassination—in which he seeks to interpret the many studies of public reaction to the President's death. In this article, appropriately titled "The Kennedy Assassination and the Nature of Political Commitment," Verba attempts to go to essentials. He speaks of the deeper levels of political involvement made evident by the psychological crisis of the assassination. Repeatedly he employs the term "primordial" to describe the character of the underlying political commitment to the nation-state and its symbols in modern societies—the foremost of these symbols in America being the President. But let Verba speak for himself since he is explicit about these matters: first, on the nature of public reactions and the larger meaning of those reactions:

The Kennedy assassination...illustrates the close meshing of the sacred and the secular in the top institutions of a political system. In a society in which the formal ideology is officially secular...the close linkage of religious institutions to the events of the crisis weekend is particularly striking...a larger proportion of the American population responded to the assassination with prayer or attendance at special church services and religious ceremony and imagery abounded in the events of the weekend.²

* So many people have criticized this article that I can only mention a few who have made life particularly hard: Herbert Reid, Donald Searing, Robert Alford and Kenneth Ring. Without their comradely impatience I would have made even more mistakes.

¹ In Bradley S. Greenberg & Edwin B. Parker (eds.), The Kennedy Assassination and the American Public (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1965), pp. 348–360.

² Ibid., p. 352.

On the basis of what seems to him the extraordinary depth and the special one of public reaction to the assassination, Verba goes on to offer the following interpretation:

What this suggests is that complete separation of church and state may be possible only in a formal sense. In a secular society where formal religious commitment is weak, the activities of the state may be the nearest one comes to activities of ultimate importance, activities that fundamentally determine matters of death and life and the quality of life. In short, governmental institutions may have significance of a religious kind. The awe inspired by the ultimate power of the church in more pious times may be akin to the awe inspired in modern secular societies by the ultimate power of the state.³

Second, there is Verba's notion of the President's central symbolic role. Drawing on recent studies of political socialization, he argues:

He [the President] is the symbolic referent for the learning of political commitment; children first become aware of political matters through an awareness of and diffuse attachment to the President. As Durkheim pointed out, complex social collectivities... are not easily the direct objects of emotional attachment or commitment. Rather some common symbol... is required... this central symbolic role in a modern secular society is preempted by the political symbols that stand on the highest level for the society—in the American case by the presidency above all.

Verba goes on to say:

The presidential role is thus endowed with a religious quality... Religion and politics in the United States are closely related to each other, and many of the functions religion and religious symbolism perform elsewhere in holding society together are performed in the United States by the central political symbols. If in the new states a passionate political religion replaces an intense traditional religious commitment, in a modern society such as the United States a somewhat less intense political religion assumes some of the functions of a less intense religious system.... 4

3 Thid

⁴ Ibid., p. 353. Robert Bellah has recently put forward an argument for the existence of what he calls a "civil religion" in the United States.

All of this is profoundly interesting and provocative, but immediately questions come up: for example—what is a "religious quality?", how do we know that politics has moved in to fill the psychological gap left by the loss of religion?; does religion and/or its symbolism really hold society together, and if so, what exactly does that mean? In short, has Verba himself taken a great leap of faith in reaching his conclusions? For the moment, let us swallow our skeptical tendencies and accept at least that there is a grain or more of truth in his linking up the sacred and the political in modern societies. But accepting the potential insightfulness of Verba's analysis, where does it lead us? The political leader as monarch-priest: the citizen as worshiper; the political group as sacred object—these are strange, but nonetheless familiar themes. They are familiar because social scientists often use ideas of the sacred. and religious metaphors, in interpreting politics outside western, industrial societies. They are strange because Verba has taken these ideas. previously manufactured chiefly for export, and put them to work at home. The result, you would think, would be thoroughly disturbing to men who care about the quality of our political life. Yet, remarkably enough, Verba seems entirely at ease, and never appears to raise as much as a normative eyebrow at the possible implications of his own imaginative analysis. But then, what are these implications?

I. POLITICS AS SECULAR RELIGION

In the representative system, the reason for everything must publicly appear. Every man is a proprietor in government and considers it a necessary part of his business to understand.... He examines the cost, and compares it with the advantages and above all, he does not adopt the slavish custom of following what in other governments are called LEADERS.

Thomas Paine

Secularization is a dominant trend of modern times. In fact, it is precisely the questioning of received truths, of once sacred notions, that is

He sees the notion of an "American Israel" playing a "constitutive role" in the thought of early American leaders, and he perceives considerable continuity in the civil religion, employing as a clear contemporary example of its appearance, President Kennedy's inaugural address, Bellah states: "...this religion—or perhaps better, this religious dimension—has its own seriousness and integrity and requires the same care in understanding that any other religion does." Robert N. Bellah, "Civil Religion in America," Daedalus (Winter, 1967).

identified with the nature of modernity. Science, technology, industralism, the modern nation-state, all are associated with the growth of the secular style and the decline of traditional faiths

But at the same time we are supposedly becoming secular, life has grown increasingly politicized. The modern era is the time of that "fundamental democratization" of which Mannheim spoke—the involvement of the masses of people in political life. Revolutions, civil wars, international conflicts, general social upheaval, ideological ferocity—these are the characteristic features of our epoch. What Thomas Mann wrote half a century ago seems to sum up the extraordinary quality of modernity: "In our time the destiny of man presents its meaning in political terms."

As students of this upheavel, some social scientists have perceived the continued importance of religious impulses in social life despite their seeming decline. This is not so much the religion of established churches and beliefs in supernatural beings; rather, it is a concept of religion fundamentally involving ideas of the "sacred." It is the "religious" impulse inter-

⁵ There is a good deal of controvery over the problem of defining religion. Some writers regard the crucial distinction to be that between the "sacred" and the "secular." Roger Caillois, for example, in Man and the Sacred (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1959), identifies religion with the realm of the sacred, arguing that in this realm men feel a deep-seated dependence and show a lack of critical inquiry. His argument here follows Durkheim's position that sacredness is a matter of social definition and can be applied to a good many things. Melford Spiro, on the other hand sees religion as inextricably connected with supernatural beings, though he notes that the worship of other "sacreds" may serve many of the same functions as religious beliefs. Melford E. Spiro, "Religion: Problems of Definition and Explanation," in Michael Banton (ed), Anthropological Approaches to the Study of Religion (New York: F. A. Praeger, 1966), pp. 85-126. Clifford Geertz and Phillip Rieff provide discussions of religion in terms of its psychological functions and this focus provides a bridge between the alternative definitions noted above. Geertz defines religion as a system of symbols that establish powerful, pervasive and long-lasting moods and motivations in men by formulating conceptions of a general order of existence and clothing these conceptions with such an aura of factuality that the moods and motivations seem uniquely realistic: Clifford Geertz, "Religion as a Cultural System," in Banton, op. cit., pp. 1-46. For Rieff, religion performs two functions: the therapeutic control of preted in this sense that social investigators have though they found in various aspects of modern political life. Interpretations of Communism, both as an ideology, and a set of institutions, often rely heavily on analogies borrowed from religion. Alfred Meyer, for example, develops the analogy very extensively and suggestively between communism and puritanism.⁵

Then too there are the "new states" and the phenomenon Apter has called "political religions" in those changing societies. There is no need here to engage in a discussion of these "political religions." It is enough just to note the consensus that such a phenomenon exists. Political religions attempt to define a new reality, to mobilize people's deepest sentiments, and generally to compensate for the loss of older, now shattered, beliefs. Fascism might perhaps qualify under this heading. Coming closer to home in recent years, various analysts have argued, although some only implicitly, that the religious impulse was still to be found, even in the most apparently modern and developed societies.

In an article analyzing the supposed "functions" of the Coronation of a British Queen, Shils and Young draw on the identity Durkheim suggested between religious and political rededication ceremonies: "What essential difference is there between an assembly of Christians celebrating the principle dates of the life of Christ, or of Jews remembering the exodus from Egypt or the promulgation of the decalogue, and a reunion of citizens commemorating the promulgation of a new moral or legal system or some great event in the national life?"

everyday life, and relief from that control by covertly providing opportunities for instincts to express themselves. Phillip Rieff, The Triumph of the Therapeutic (New York Harper & Row, 1966). Thomas Luckmann and Peter Berger have discussed religious roots in the formation of the self and the construction of symbolic universe. They see religion referring to a realm that transcends everyday life, giving it ultimate meaning. Their analysis of the process of legitimation is particularly suggestive: Peter L. Berger and Thomas Luckmann, The Social Construction of Reality (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday 1966). Thomas Luckmann, The Invisible Religion (N. Y.: The Macmillan Co., 1967).

⁶ Alfred G. Meyer, Communism (New York: Random House, 1963), pp. 4-8. And Meyer says that he is certainly not the first to note the similarities.

⁷ Edward Shils and Michael Young, "The Meaning of the Coronation," Sociological Review, 1. (December, 1953). The quote is from Emile

For Durkheim, as for Shils and Young, the religious impulse, the creation of a realm of the sacred, is a social cement, binding together members of a collectivity.

This argument leads to the conclusion that there are strong similarities between the religious and the political, and for that matter, between traditional and modern social systems. Apter argues, for example, that "politics in its moral sense can be described as approaching religion, just as churches in their organizational sense can be said to approach politics:"8 Almond has pointed out that traditional patterns of socialization continue in modern political systems, but are supplemented by other, more differentiated socialization mechanisms. Verba, discussing comparative political culture, argues that a "residue of non-rationality" a political commitment that is "implicit" and "primitive," exists in all stable political cultures.9 Primary among these "implicit" beliefs he places the feeling of national identity.

Perhaps the fundamental social-psychological underpinning to this point of view has been added by Robert Lane, Murray Edelman, David Easton, and Robert Hess. Easton and Hess tell us that "not only do many children associate the sanctity and awe of religion with the political community, but to ages 9 or 10 they sometimes have considerable difficulty in disentangling God and country." Their discussion of the psychological consequences of the flag salute is particularly interesting. They see the ritual as displacing religious affect onto a political object. They conclude: "The fact that as the child grows older he may be able to sort out the religious from the political setting much more clearly and restrict the pledge to a political meaning, need not thereby weaken this bond. The initial and early intermingling of potent religious sentiment with political community has by that time probably created a tie difficult to dissolve."10 Edelman asserts that politics can never deal strictly with who gets what in the sense of tangible benefits and punishments. Rather he maintains that "symbolic" rewards and punishments also play a Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life. Norman Birnbaum has a thoughtful critique of Shils and Young, "Monarchs and Sociologists," Sociological Review, V. 3 (July, 1955) pp. 5–23.

⁸ Apter, op. cit., p. 272.

⁹ Sidney Verba, "Comparative Political Culture," in Verba (ed.), Political Culture and Political Development (Princeton: Princeton, University Press, 1965).

¹⁰ David Easton and Robert D. Hess, "The Child's Political World," "Midwest Journal of Political Science, V. 6 (August, 1962), pp. 238-39.

significant role in political conflict. This would be true in all political systems—and Edelman applies his ideas to the contemporary United States in particular. The "symbolic" side of politics, according to Edelman, involves two things: the creation of a sense of belonging, and attempts to allay the feelings of anxiety widespread in mass publics.11 Lane, on the basis of intensive interviews with Eastport "common men" looks at the question of religion and politics from the perspective of the urban citizen in an industrial society in mid-twentieth century.12 He finds that "in many ways belief in a powerful state is a psychological substitute for belief in a powerful God." And this belief, according to Lane, serves an essential psychological function. He says: "A positive faith in one's political system, like a positive faith in religion, reassures a person that he is properly connected to the powers that be... He has been 'good' and, like a good child, deserves well of the authorities."13

Still, the argument remains vague. What exactly are the consequences of the religious impulse in politics—particularly American politics. First, we are led back immediately in the direction of the President and Verba's analysis of reactions to the assassination. Greenstein has recently summed up behavioral research on the American President in seven points. 14 One—the President is by far the best known political figure in this country, and often the only political figure known. Two-there is great respect for the status of the President, although often combined with cynicism toward politicians. Third and Fourth—the President is the first public official to come to the attention of young children and children see the President as very important and benign. Fifth-in spite of much variation, adults generally have favorable views of the President's performance. Sixththere is a tendency to rally to the support of the President particularly when he acts at a time of international crisis. And seventh-scattered clinical evidence indicates that for an undetermined portion of the population the President is an unconscious surrogate of childhood authority figures. In addition Greenstein notes that although responses to the Kennedy assassination were profound, they were not uniquely so. From the evidence available he argues that similar reactions occurred at the deaths of other Presidents such as Lincoln, Roosevelt, McKinley, Garfield and even Harding. These reactions often take a somatic form involving headache, tenseness, insomnia and rapid heart beat.

But the religious impulse in politics leads us in another, though related, direction—the direction of American nationalism. Writing in the mid-1950's S. M. Lipset noted that Americans were not a tolerant people and pointed out that "each war and most postwar situations have been characterized by the denial of civil liberties to minorities. . . . "15 He went on to relate this lack of tolerance, especially in crisis situations, to the quality of national allegiance in this country. "... Americanism is a political creed.... Our national rituals are largely identified with reiterating the accepted values of a political system, not solely or even primarily of national patriotism. For example, Washington's Birthday, Lincoln's Birthday, and the Fourth of July are ideological celebrations comparable to May Day or Lenin's Birthday in the Communist World," Rather than a notion of simple citizenship, the concept of Americanism, Lipset concluded, had become a "compulsive ideology." If, then, there are specific large-scale evidences for the infusion of religious tendencies into American politics they would probably be most apparent along these two dimensions: Intense and often intolerant patriotism, and implicit reverence for the President, particularly in times of crisis.

II. THOREAU'S POSITION

We have now taken one of the necessary two steps backward to gain perspective on Verba's findings. These findings, as it turns out, are not unique, but dovetail with the interpretations of a good many other social scientists. Of all the writers mentioned, only Lipset and Edelman are at all disturbed at what they see. The others either simply report findings, or, more important for purposes of this paper, they see the ¹⁵ S. M. Lipset, "The Sources of the Radical Right—1955," in Daniel Bell (ed.), The Radical Right, (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday & Co., 1963), p. 264. See also Robert Dahl's characterization of America as a "... somewhat deviant case: most other stable democracies have not imposed as severe a set of legal and social obstacles to political dissent as exist in the United States." R. A. Dahl, "Epilogue," in R. A. Dahl (ed.), Political Oppositions in Western Democracies, (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1966), p. 391.

¹¹ Murray Edelman, The Symbolic Uses of Politics (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1964).

¹² Robert E. Lane, Political Ideology (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1962).

¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 198-199.

¹⁴ Fred I. Greenstein, "Popular Images of the President," American Journal of Psychiatry, 122 (November, 1965), 523-529.

religious impulse in politics performing useful and perhaps essential functions. Verba, as well as Shils and Young in their piece on the British coronation, take the position that some kind of religious or quasi-religious political commitment must be widespread if a social system is to be stable. As Verba points out, there is no such deep, consensual commitment to "democratic" ideas and so a latent, but unquestionable basic lovalty to the going political order must be what maintains the "stability" of the system. Of course, this emphasis on stability and on latent emotional ties is nothing new, not only structural-functional theorists, but Marxists as well have acknowledged the potency of the religious impulse in social and political life. What is worth noting, however, is the ease with which these writers assume that such impulses are entirely harmonious with democratic expectations. Speaking of national identity, for example, Verba says: "It is perhaps only when some basic beliefs remain implicit and 'primitive' and when the commitment to them is heavily expressive that one can have the underlying stability that allows a more pragmatic approach in relation to other beliefs." Or, to take another example: "... stability in 'modernized' systems may depend upon the maintenance of a residue of non-rationality-of traditional, implicit and unquestioned values . . . that keeps certain aspects of the political system out of the realm of rational meansends calculations." What a happy balance Verba hopes to strike! The emphasis on combining sacred and pragmatic beliefs in politics, and maintaining each in proper amount is reminiscent of Berelson's praise of political apathy, and Almond and Verba's conclusion that it takes some "subject" and "parochial" types in order to achieve the proper mix for the stable, yet not stagnant, civic culture. But can it really be that there are no dangers to democratic politics flowing from those "primitive" beliefs. Clearly, Lipset's discussion of Americanism is not comforting. But Edelman too expounds a darker side in his interpretation: "Alienation, anomie, despair of being able to chart one's own course in a complex, cold and bewildering world have become characteristic of a large part of the population of advanced countries. As the world can be neither understood nor influenced, attachment to reassuring abstract symbols rather than to one's own efforts becomes chronic."

The question of who is right in this matter— Verba or Edelman—is partly empirical but not wholly so. In order to evaluate the consequences of the infusion of the religious into politics, we have also to employ normative tools. This is the second step backward we have to take to gain perspective on Verba's analysis. It is my contention that Thoreau, that solitary but significant figure in the liberal tradition, can help us in this, perhaps more than anyone else.

Thoreau is not an easy man to deal with, especially if you come to him with the problem of social stability foremost in your mind. His most important political writings all involve attacks on the going political order, and attacks of a very radical sort. He tells men to obey their consciences not the law. He refers to higher laws that ought to have precedence over legislation. In the famous essay on civil disobedience written after his refusal to pay certain Massachusetts state taxes as a protest against the Mexican War and the extradition of fugitive slaves, he declared his intention of unilaterally severing his ties to the on-going political system. He wants to opt out-return to his state of nature, to his berry field, leaving the state and its noise far behind. But sadly, Thoreau finds that the state does not merely get in the way of the good, but itself is a vast machine of evil. It is not enough therefore for a man to opt out: nothing less than a decisive alteration of the state is needed. Thoreau actually accepts both of these points of view in different places—they might be represented by the contrast between Thoreau himself at Walden Pond, and Captain John Brownwhom Thoreau championed-taking up arms against the slave system. Thoreau has been attacked for inconsistency and moral confusion because of these varied strands in his writings.

Yet it has been overlooked that Thoreau perceived and was attempting to come to grips with a very complex and modern phenomenonexactly that phenomenon Verba has described for us: the growth of a religious attitude toward the nation-state; the phenomenon of "primordial" allegiance, of "primitive" and unquestioned beliefs. In the essay on Civil Disobedience, Thoreau, like Verba, sees that in his time the political realm is dealing with ultimate questions, with matters of conscience-matters, as Verba puts it, "of death and life and the quality of life." Of course, Thoreau had in mind those unquestionably ultimate issues of slavery and war. But unlike Verba, Thoreau saw disastrous consequences for liberal democracy in the growth of the sacred form of political allegiance. Actually he saw twin disasters: first, the loss of moral autonomy for the mass of men who abandoned their consciences to state direction: and second, ostracism or worse for the few who would not abandon their convictions and as a result became enemies of the state. Calling attention to this dilemma, Thoreau says: "Can there not be a government in which majorities do not virtually decide right and wrong, but conscience?-in which majorities decide only those questions to which the rule of expediency is applicable? Must the citizen even for a moment, or in the least degree, resign his conscience to the legislator?"16 But most men do resign their consciences to the legislators, and Thoreau chooses a military image—not by accident I think—to make this clear: "A common and natural result of an undue respect for law is, that you may see a file of soldiers, colonel, captain, corporal, privates, powder-monkeys, and all, marching in admirable order over hill and dale to the wars, against their wills, against their common sense and consciences, which makes it very steep marching indeed . . . they are all peaceably inclined. Now what are they? Men at all? or small moveable forts. . . . "17 Those who, as Thoreau puts it, "serve" the state with their consciences also, and not just with their bodies—the heroes, patriots, and reformers—these men often resist state authority. And Thoreau's argument is that the state inevitably treats them as criminals because it has been persuaded of its own sanctity.

In his own time, Thoreau regarded Captain John Brown as one of these conscientious patriots. For Thoreau, Brown's distinguishing characteristic involved his refusal to place his faith in leaders, in intermediaries—it was, in short, his political protestantism. Thoreau's own language in "A Plea for Captain John Brown," makes the religious analogy clear: "The curse is the worship of idols, which at length changes the worshiper into a stone image himself. . . . This man [John Brown] was an exception, for he did not set up even a political graven image between him and his God." 18

Whatever we want to call him—anarchist, romantic, enemy of the people—Thoreau did perceive that the intertwining of the religious and the political ought to be regarded as a problem. And indeed it must be regarded as a problem from the standpoint of the liberal tradition. Thoreau, as an inheritor of the Lockean view with its emphasis on the strict separation of church and state, could hardly avoid this problem. His originality and importance lies in the fact that he, like Verba, did not think of church and state in formal institutional terms, but in psychological terms—in terms of conflicting impulses within human beings. In this, he carried the Lockean argument for separation one step further. Locke's distinction between church and state is based upon the matters each must deal with. The state is justified as a matter of convenience—its purposes are pragmatic and commonsensical. Men gave their consent to government because it provides certain definable benefits. The relationship between man and the state is a contractual onewith the state providing certain day-to-day services in exchange for the giving up of the right to judge one's own case. The state, as one interpreter of Locke has characterized it, is a limited corporation. The culmination of this rather expedient attitude toward the state shows up in Jefferson's notion that a political revolution per generation would be needed to adapt the governmental framework to the people's needs, and in Tom Paine's proclamation that each generation was a new Adam, for whom inherited political forms were irrelevant.

The church, for Locke, dealt with the sacred, with ultimate questions of individual salvation. It was absolutely essential then that religion not corrupt itself through association with the state, and also that the state not coerce men into accepting a particular religious position. In sacred matters, for Locke, voluntarism was fundamental. Salvation could not be established by government edict.

But if voluntarism is essential in matters of the sacred, and if we discover that the state deals not in matters of convenience, but of conscience, matters of death and life and the quality of life, then the same voluntarism Locke thought essential for church-religion. must be applied to political-religion as well. As I understand it, this is the essence of Thoreau's argument. He sees that the state is not merely a matter of convenience and that allegience to it is psychologically similar to religious allegiance. Law and morality became intertwined and the basis of the Lockean dichotomy between church and state evaporates. Given this reality, Thoreau speaks for the rights of conscience. He argues by analogy with the Lockean position on religion that political salvation should not be coerced and that the right to opt out of the contract should be recognized as it would be in the case of a church. If politics is our religion, each man must nonetheless save his own soul, but this time on the terrain of the authoritative allocation of values.

Thoreau means to make clear that it is blasphemy for liberals to regard the state with reverence, since such attitudes are a retreat from the hard-headedness of liberal thought.

¹⁶ "Civil Disobedience," Thoreau's Writings, Vol. IV, (Boston: Houghton Mifflin & Co., 1906), p. 358.

¹⁷ Ibid., pp. 358-359.

¹⁸ "A Plea . . . ", ibid., P. 419.

He is pointing in his own way toward the idea of that escape from freedom Erich Fromm has described this way: "After the great European Revolutions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries failed to transform 'freedom from' into 'freedom to,' nationalism and state worship became the symptoms of a regression to incestuous fixation."19 He is pointing in his own way to the phenomenon of mass acquiescense that Edelman has connected with symbolic reassurances, particularly strong in the foreign policy area. Finally, Thoreau is pointing to a resolution of the liberal dilemma—the dilemma posed by the nationalization of the sacred. This solution, impassioned and extreme as it may seem in Thoreau, basically calls for enlarged rights for dissenters, and a more critical attitude generally toward the political system. It is perhaps the normative reverse of Verba's idea that some basic beliefs should remain unquestioned if there is to be the stability which allows a pragmatic approach to other beliefs. The Thoreauian tendency would be to argue that modern politics inevitably confronts precisely those issues which touch the core of political religion: the issues of war, dissent, and enlightened popular sovereignty. Though he would admit that liberal thought provides no clear solution, a contemporary Thoreau would suggest that we will find a way out of these problems by revitalizing the meaning of resistence, probably in the direction of civil disobedience and a heightened consciousness of the meaning of consent.

I am not attempting here to make a case for Thoreau's brilliance as a political philosopher, nor to deny that his position has many probably insoluble problems.²⁰ I am arguing that he graspee a central development of our era and perceived its normative significance.

19 Erich Fromm, The Sane Society (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston).

²⁰ The critique of Thoreau's politics by Heinz Eulau—"Wayside Challenger," Antioch Review (Dec., 1949), 509-522, argues that to follow Thoreau's injunctions and make the individual conscience the ultimate political decision-maker would bring on anarchy, and make democracy impossible. Eulau's position, though it has some important sense to it, fails to penetrate to the real problem Thoreau sought to deal with. Eulau's argument is equally absolutist, ignoring the problems that would flow from too great a reverence for existing laws. Generally, Eulau forgets that at any one moment, democratic values, and other important values as well, may conflict with legalities.

III. NORMATIVE CONSEQUENCES OF EMPIRICAL SCIENCE

What need have we of the socialization of banks and factories? We socialize men.

Remark attributed to Hitler

We cannot accept Verba's assurance that the sort of religious attachment to political symbols he describes holds no dangers for democratic life. We have many normative specifics to attend to.21 First, we need to look again at the problem of the democratic personality. If we regard achieving democracy as, in part, a problem of developing the self, then a passive, reverent citizenry is undesirable regardless of how much stability it may generate. We need to think of measuring democracy not by defining it blithely as whatever exists in so-called democracies, but in terms of the creation of citizens-men and women aware of the problems of freedom in their own and other societies; men and women relatively free from irrational obsessions. We need to scrutinize the undemocratic aspects of our societies, at the workplace, also in the home and school, and develop plans for reform, or conservation. We are still awaiting that general democratization of social life which Dewey spoke of, and which depends upon a more equal distribution of economic and cultural resources.

A second concern grows directly out of this perspective on democracy. There is a suggestion in much recent literature that "democracy" is saved only by the "apathy" of large numbers of people who have undemocratic attitudes.22 To activate these anathetics then appears to risk undermining what democratic processes we have. For example, in relation to the Vietnam War, a national survey early in 1966 showed that individuals with income below $5,000 a year were three times as likely to oppose the right to demonstrate against the war as individuals with incomes of $10,000 a year or more.23 Would it contribute to democratization to activate those who oppose dissent? Aren't we here dependent on mass acquiescence and elite support for libertarian norms, with a little help from our friends, the upper middle class. Such has been the common argument. But this argument is strangely myopic in several respects. For present purposes, its major failing is a refusal to press the question hard enough.24 Why should individuals with low incomes or little education oppose dissent when they are not more likely to support the war itself, and perhaps even less likely to support the war?25 This is not a simple ambiguity, but perhaps here we are encountering precisely that primordial attachment to national symbols that makes for "stability." If less educated people are less likely to favor libertarian norms this may occur because of the kind of early socialization they participate in. We cannot with one hand endorse primordial allegiance to the nation and with the other hand condemn anti-libertarian nationalism. It seems likely that these matters are linked. Here we return to concerns that Marx and Freud dealt with long ago, when they sought the roots of the "religious" in the fundamental structure of human development. Perhaps in discussing political religions we need to rethink Marx's argument: "The abolition of religion as the illusory happiness of the people is required for their real happiness. The demand to give up illusions about its condition is the demand to give up a condition which needs illusions."26 Instead of assuming then the "naturalness" of a religious attachment to politics, we should seek the empirical origins of this process.

²¹ There are a great many empirical specifics as well.

²² As one example, see Herbert McClosky, "Consensus and Ideology in American Politics," this Review, 58 (June, 1964), 361-382.

²³ Louis Harris survey reported in the Washington Post, April 18, 1966. Under $5,000, 60% oppose the right to demonstrate; over $10,000, 19% oppose it.

All of this should make us increasingly aware of the ideological implications of our work. Despite our proclamations of value "neutrality" it is increasingly clear that many of the analytical frameworks and conclusions of behavioral political scientists have normative roots and branches.²⁷ This is also clearly true

²⁴ There are a good many other serious failings in this point of view. On this matter, see my letter criticizing McClosky's argument in this Review (December, 1966), 1000-1001. A thorough treatment is Peter Bachrach, The Theory of Democratic Elitism. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1967).

²⁵ Sidney Verba, et al., "Public Opinion and the War in Vietnam" this Review, (June, 1967) 317-333. A curious Gallup poll of February, 1967, shows that 40% of those with incomes under $3,000 a year favored a bombing halt, while only 14% of those with incomes over $10,000 a year did so.

²⁶ From "Toward a Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right."

²⁷ There are many recent discussions of this matter: Christian Bay, "Politics and Pseudopolitics," this REVIEW, 59 (March, 1965), 39—

in the discussion of political religions. Our increasing sophistication about "methods" of research has not been matched by an equal sophistication about the normative side of that research. But that sort of sophistication is not easy to come by. To begin, we might take greater care in discussing both "democracy" and "stability"—both of which are in deep need of quantification and clearer definition. Failing to deal with these matters, we will find ourselves, as sometimes in the past, offering bland endorsement of the status quo in western societies, while turning away from the deepest normative and empirical questions.

In the end, of course, it may not matter what social scientists think. That is an empirical question. If not, these issues are important only for the profession and for the sake of personal clarity. On the other hand, the social role of social scientists might just be of some consequence and we may, ourselves, help to determine by our action or inaction what our social role will be. In that case, the stakes are considerable and the costs of confusion high.

Finally, we need to pay careful attention to the problem of dissent in modern societies. The civil rights movement made this problem real again, and a good many social scientists have tried to come to grips with questions of civil disobedience. More recently, the issue of conscientious objection to a particular war has also burst upon us. One would think that, given the liberal heritage, given the extraordinary dimensions of war in modern times, given the Nuremberg trial experience—we would have paid more attention to this problem. Unfortunately, the Vietnam war has had to recall us to it. Modern war is, after all, precisely the experience that invalidates the old liberal dichotomy between church and state. Wars deal in ultimate matters, and generate passionate affiliations rare in peacetime. And here Thoreau's plea for the rights of conscience is most immediately relevant. The right conscientiously to object to a particular war follows from the principle of voluntarism in sacred matters. Legal protection for such a right would clarify for each individual the fact that obedience as well as opposition was a moral choice. This, in itself, would be a gain in democratic education.

52; Charles Taylor, "Neutrality in Political Science," in Peter Laslett and W. G. Runciman, Philosophy, Politics and Society. Third Series, (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1967), pp. 25-57. Charles C. Moskos, Jr. and Wendell Bell, "Emerging Nations and Ideologies of American Social Scientists," The American Sociologist, (May, 1967), 67-72, for three particularly relevant pieces.

IV. CONCLUSION

It may be that men ought not to live, and perhaps cannot live, without a religion or its functional equivalent—some set of beliefs related to "ultimate" matters. And of course it is clear that even the man who attacks dogmatism has his own dogma, which includes, at least, the freedom to criticize. This is not as much of a dilemma as it appears. There are, after all, dogmas and dogmas. It makes sense to distinguish between a group attachment based on enlightenment and personal experience, and an attachment developed largely unconsciously, which resists examination.²⁸

Robert Bellah has something of this sort in mind when he argues that America's civil religion has had a "best" and a "worst", a depth and a distortion. He chooses to believe that "it is difficult to use the words of Jefferson and Lincoln to support special interests and undermine personal freedom."²⁹ And he also chooses to identify the words of Jefferson and Lincoln with America's "civil religion." On the other hand, he calls to mind the use of nationalistic sentiment "as a justification for the shameful treatment of the Indians . . ." and its use "to legitimate several adventures in imperialism. . . ." Right now, he argues, there is "the tendency to assimilate all governments or parties in the world which support our immediate policies or call upon help by invoking the notion of free institutions and democratic values. Those nations that are for the moment 'on our side' became 'the free world.' A respressive and unstable military dictatorship in South Viet-Nam becomes 'the free people of South Viet-Nam and their government.'"30 Faced with what he considers a degeneration of the civil religion, Bellah counts on the "prophetic voices" to call us back to sanity. He recalls Lincoln's opposition to the Mexican War. He quotes Thoreau: "'I would remind my countrymen that they are men first, and Americans at a late and convenient hour....'" For Bellah these words provide the appropriate standard for contemporary thought and action. Yet here, I think, Bellah stretches his conception of civil religion to include even its staunchest opponents. Thoreau is reacting against precisely that reverence for established authority which civil religion creates. To ask for civil religion without reverence is to abandon the core of the concept. Moreover, the implications of civil religion in the United States are far more serious now than a hundred years ago. The United States is not just another country, but a primary world power. The ways in which Americans regard their government may have consequences which touch men everywhere. This is not true of many other societies. What is required, as Bellah states, is the articulation of standards that transcend immediate interests and subject the nation itself to judgment. But to work out and internalize such standards would require a far more critical attitude toward political authority.

²⁸ On this point, Michael Walzer has put the matter eloquently: "The increasing size of the state, the growing power of administration, the decline of political life: all these turn politics from a concrete activity into what Marx once called the fantasy of everyday life. The state becomes an arena in which men do not act, but watch the actions, and, like other audiences, are acted upon. Patriotic communion is always a fraud when it is nothing more than the communion of an audience with its favorite actors, of passive subjects and heroes of the state. Our emotions are merely tricked by parades and pageants, the rise and fall of political gladiators, the deaths of beloved chiefs, the somber or startling rites of a debased religion. It could be done to anyone, whereas patriotism ought to be the pride of a particular man, the enjoyment of particular activities": "Politics in the Welfare State," Dissent (January-February, 1968) p. 36. ²⁹ Bellah, op. cit., p. 14.

(Editor's Note: For comments by Professor Verba, see Communications, pp. 576-577.)

30 Ibid.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE RELATION OF POLITICAL THEORY TO ANTHROPOLOGY*

CARL J. FRIEDRICH, assisted by Morton Horwitz Harvard University

The study of developing areas has, in recent years, caused political science and theory to be increasingly aware of realities of non-Western government and politics. Comparative politics and its theory no longer, therefore, can avoid utilizing the results of the research of anthropologists and ethnologists in a way comparable to the use of historical data if they wish to be comprehensively empirical. Since the political theorist will not, as a rule, be able to become a practising anthropologist, the basic problem of such cooperation turns upon whether the investigating anthropologist asks the crucial, the basic questions in the first place. A broad survey of their reports and writings, such as the Human Relations Area Files afford, shows that this is by no means generally the case. Nor is this easy to achieve, for political scientists and anthropologists differ in their objectives. It has been suggested that the anthropologist is primarily interested in diversity, in how many ways something could be done, whereas for the political scientist and theorist such divergencies are important mainly as they lead to political insight and verifiable generalization.

The utility of the writings of anthropologists for the political scientist is seriously impeded by the over-simplified and misleading understanding of the nature of power and authority held by many of them.¹

* What follows is a revision of a working paper prepared for a conference held at Yale University on May 7–8, 1965, which has been reported elsewhere. Its purpose was to consider the problems raised in adapting the Human Relations Area Files to the use of political scientists (and by implications to that of jurists, economists, and other social scientists). There can be little doubt that although "the HRAF constitute a major potential resource for research and teaching in political science," they have not been used to any great extent by political scientists. (The authors wish to acknowledge the research assistance of Mr. Michael Rothschild.)

¹ These writings are digested in the Human Relations Area Files, produced at New Haven, in cooperation with Yale and a number of other universities. In the footnotes which follow, there is a certain time lag due to delays in incorporating material in the HRAF. See, for a recent con-

One of the most pervasive difficulties which arises among those who would use the work of anthropologists is the one-dimensional understanding of what the concept "power" entails. Because of the liberal and egalitarian assumptions of many anthropologists, a tendency to ignore the element of power is characteristic of much of the literature. Only where they are confronted by a clearly hierarchical society in which elements of coercive power can hardly be overlooked do they set about to analyze the power relations in primitive cultures. Many primitive societies, however, are not particularly hierarchical so that the dominant sources of power in these societies, deriving either from social coercion or from consent, are more difficult to detect. Often, in the absence of clear and determinate incividuals who exercise power in a particular society, students of primitive cultures have come to conclude that in fact there is no power in the society.2

Leaving aside for the moment the obvious confusion of power and authority which is quite common in anthropological writings, there are other grave difficulties with their work as far as power relations are concerned. One often finds in reading such material that there is undue preoccupation with the formalistic aspects of power, to the exclusion of analyses of many other relevant power situations. There is, in addition, insufficient appreciation of the informal aspects of social coercion which are among the dominant means of social control in primitive societies. The situation which some anthropologists find "perennially astonishing" is undoubtedly the result of a highly complex system of informal social controls, not the least important of which is tribution which is informed by a much greater awareness of the problems here discussed, Max Schwartz, Political Anthropology (New York 1966), though even here the references are spotty and the views often rather one-sided.

² The interesting study by John Middleton and David Tait (eds.), Tribes Without Rulers (1958), while more sophisticated, suffers from this difficulty too. Max Schwa-tz has, in Political Anthropology, offered a good review of the literature of political anthropology, including the studies of Goodenough and Leach which focus attention upon conflict and process.

the "personal influence" of the headmen. E. Adamson Hoebel remarked upon this tendency to ignore social coercion in his critique of Malinowski's studies of the Trobriand Islanders' systems of law. In all of his studies of law, Hoebel noted, "Malinowski exhibited a definite distaste for the forces of social coercion and he exerted himself to the utmost to minimize—even banish—them as operative elements in the regulation of human relations."²

Some anthropologists, however, have given careful attention to the informal processes of social control in primitive cultures. Leighton and Kluckhohn, for example, quite a few years ago described in great detail the social controls which they found among the Navaho on the basis of their "shame culture." And in his study of Yahgan society, Gusinde points out that among the Yahgan "one could speak of public opinion as the guardian of laws and as the avenger of serious transgressions. It acts no less successfully than a police force or a court of justice." Indeed, he gives great weight to this crucial dimension of primitive life.

The pressure it puts upon a person can be clearly seen from the fear which everyone, not only the average Indian, has for a bad reputation and even more of public ostracism. If he sees himself ensnared by it, he promptly hastens back to the path of virtue and constantly tries with exaggerated zeal to change the bad opinion about him into a good one.⁶

Yet, in spite of his clear insight into informal aspects of social control, Gusinde appears to exhibit another tendency prominent among students of society imbued with liberal and egalitarian ideals. While he is willing to see an amorphous "public" as the guarantor of social order, he is unwilling to see that specific individuals very often do exercise disproportionate amounts of power in a given society. In fact, one often finds among anthropologists that only the most well-structured and formal power relationships are given attention. Thus, Gusinde emphasizes that "there is no authoritative judge over all the people; everyone must seek his own justice." Furthermore, he stresses

- ³ E. Adamson Hoebel, The Law of Primitive Man (Cambridge, Mass.), 1961, p. 181.
- ⁴ Dorothea Leighton and Clyde Kluckhohn, Children of the People (Cambridge, Mass.), 1947, pp. 105-106.
- ⁵ Martin Gusinde, The Yahgan: the Life and Thought of the Water Nomads of Cape Horn (trans. Frieda Shutze, for Human Relations Area Files), p. 1025.

that "there is no superior authority appointed for either tribal community or for smaller groups." Yet, he mentions, but does not elaborate upon a phenomenon which is often of crucial significance in primitive cultures:

There are always certain...men, who as a result of their advanced age and blameless character, their long experience and mental superiority, have a moral influence of such importance that it amounts to positive control.

Just what the precise nature of this "positive control" is, we are not told. We know that in primitive cultures the power exercised by political leaders will more often than not be consensual power deriving from authority, where the members of the community cooperate with the leadership in securing obedience to the community's values and beliefs. But a preoccupation, on one hand, with the formal and coercive aspects of power or, on the other hand, with the informal sanctions of an amorphous public opinion, has obscured the consensual aspect of power and leadership possessing less formal characteristics.

The failure to appreciate the consensual component of power can be traced to a still more fundamental misunderstanding of political phenomena which constantly reappears in anthropological writings: the confusion of power with authority. Since many of the studies identify authority with power, or see it as some kind of power, usually legitimate power or formal power or rightful power (which again is some sort of legitimate power), an inquiry into the basis of authority often becomes merely an investigation into the basis of power.8 As we have argued, however, "there are power situations which are differentiated from others by the fact that the wielder of power has the capacity to elaborate what he prefers by reasoning which would make sense to those who follow him, if time and other circumstances permitted. Such reasoning usually involves the values and beliefs, as well as interests, of the group within which the power is exercised. The power-handler shares with his followers all or part of such values and beliefs, and therefore could, and at times will, explain to his following the reasons he acted in a certain way and more especially why he preferred them to act likewise. What we are proposing is that his capacity for reasoned elaboration when it exists should be called political authority." Because "power can be implemented and enlarged by the capacity for reasoned elaboration" and because the particular component of power which is usually affected by political authority is consensual power, there is a clear relationship between the failure of anthropological studies to give appropriate attention to consensual power and their misunderstanding of the nature of authority.

⁸ Ibid.

⁷ Op. cit., p. 802.

⁸ For a more detailed theoretical discussion, see Carl J. Friedrich, Man and His Government (New York, 1963), pp. 213ff.

If we understand authority as involving the capacity for reasoned elaboration then the anthropologists have all but ignored this significant dimension of political behavior. Even so, although rarely understood, the nature of political authority is often alluded to in anthropological discussions of the leader's role. There are many cases where this capacity is clearly an essential concomitant of such leadership. Thus it has been shown that among the Nambicuara (Brazil) the very existence of the band is dependent upon the chief's ability to inspire confidence in his followers. 10 It is true in other cases as well. Of the Comanche (North America) it has been written: "A peace chief rose to his position of leadership by combining generosity, kindness, evenness of temper, wisdom in council and knowledge of his territory with good sense and the ability to speak persuasively on matters at issue. The man whose advice was most persistently followed served as a peace chief for his group. He emerged gradually as a leader, and when his ability to influence his group was surpassed by that of another man, he ceased to be its (chief)."11 An almost identical situation is described by Honigmann in his study of the Nahane.

A leader held authority as long as he lived. . . . Leaders who lost competence found themselves ignored, the people adhering to a more intelligent man. The headman's functions transcended mere food getting. His wisdom derived from experience, and the ability to speak convincingly reinforced his authority in moral matters. 12

- 9 Ibid., p. 233, for this and the preceding quotation.
- ¹⁰ Claude Levi-Strauss, "The Social and Psychological Aspects of Chieftanship in a Primitive Tribe: the Nambicuara of Northeastern Mato Grosso," Transactions of the New York Academy of Sciences, Series II, vol. 7 (1945), 16-32
- ¹¹ Ernest Wallace and E. A. Hoebel, The Comanches (1952), p. 211.
- ¹² John J. Honigmann, The Kaska Indians: An Ethnographic Reconstruction (New Haven, 1954), p. 84.

Needless to say, the source of authority need not be verbal facility, but may well be the power of example. Karsten notes that "the Jibaros have absolute faith in the heritability of prominent qualities, and ascribe extraordinary importance to education and the power of example. The son of a great chief. they say, must necessarily also become an able warrior because he is, as it were, a direct continuation of his father, has received a careful education for the deeds of war, and has always had the good example of his great father before his eyes."13 In a large number of cases, however, the capacity for verbal elaboration is an essential element in authority. Among the Navaho, Kluckhohn and Leighton observe, "age and experience, ceremonial knowledge and oratorical skill, wealth and any combination of these facts can bring prestige and influence..."14 And among the Kapauku, as Pospisil has shown, wealth and generosity as well as eloquence and verbal courage are considered basic attributes of authority. Despite his wealth and generosity, a man who is afraid to argue publicly and pass judgments has hardly a chance of becoming a headman."15

There are many cases where an important element which enhances authority is some form of secrecy or esoteric ritual. Particularly a characteristic of aristocratic or hierarchical cultures, secrecy extends authority by convincing the common people that, while the capacity for reasoned elaboration is in no way impaired, they are for one reason or another better off not knowing. "Among the Bemba," Richards writes, much of the tribal ritual is secret.. and the advisory council is composed of what might be called an aristocratic caste. If the bakabilo meet in sitting on the open ground of the capital... they use archaic language on purpose, so that the common people cannot understand... the Bemba chiefs were formerly considered very nearly divine, and the belief in their supernatural powers is still strong enough to integrate the

- ¹³ Rafael Karsten, "The Head-Hunters of Western Amazonas: The Life and Culture of the Jibaro Indians of Eastern Ecuador and Peru," Societas Scientiarum Fennica: Commentationes Humanarum Litterarum, Vol VII, No. 1 (1935), p. 267.
- ¹⁴ Clyde Kluckhohn and Dorothea Leighton, The Navaho, Cambridge, Mass., 1946. p. 71.
- ¹⁶ Leopold J. Pospisil, "Kapauku Papuan Political Structure," in Verne F. Ray (ed.), Systems of Political Control and Bureaucracy in Human Societies (Seattle, 1958), p. 18.

tribe. The sacredness of the royal ceremonial largely depends on its secrecy and the fact that only persons of the right descent can take part in the ritual. The ordinary people do not attend the ceremonies except in the case of some inhabitants of the capital, but they value their secret nature and speak contemptuously of the Bisa and the neighboring tribes with less complex rites." ¹²⁶

Similarly, Firth has observed that among the Tikopia, where ritual knowledge is the basis of authority, the chief is reluctant to communicate all he knows to his son.

A younger man of rank will not normally know as much as his father because in native belief if a chief or elder imparts the last vestiges of his ritual knowledge to his son, then the gods regard that as a sign he is finished with the affairs of this world and will soon make him die. Only when he is very old or ill does he divulge the information.¹⁷

Another good illustration of this phenomenon can be seen in ancient Thailand, where, as Thompson reported, the secrecy of the law was the basis of its authority. "The concept that law was a secret science known only to judges and not open to discussion by the people still survived in 1850, when a law code in process of compilation was seized by the king and destroyed lest it should become known to the public." 18

The tendency to confuse power and authority leads to considerable difficulty in making effective use of anthropological studies in political theory. For example, of the Kavirondo Bantu we learn:

Political authority... remained inarticulate. It was not linked upon the clearly defined rights and privileges, such as are usually associated with institutionalized chieftainship. The leading elders of a clan or sub-clan were merely those persons whose opinion carried most weight when public matters were discussed... and who were called to perform sacrifices. They had no rights that were inherent in their office.... There is no generally accepted term for a clan or tribal head, but a leading elder is referred to by a variety of terms which can also be used with regard to any respected and honoured person. Finally, there was no formal appointment and installation of the head of a clan or sub-clan.¹⁹

¹⁶ Audrey I. Richards, "The Political System of the Bemba Tribe—North-Eastern Rhodesia," in M. Fortes and E. E. Evans-Pritchard (eds.), African Political Systems (London, 1940), p. 111.

¹⁷ Raymond Firth, Primitive Polynesian Economy (London, 1939), pp. 103-104.

¹⁸ Virginia Thompson, Thailand: The New Siam (New York, 1941), p. 269.

What makes this report especially interesting is its old-fashioned, or shall we say unsophisticated, use of the term "authority." It seems to stand for "power" as well as "rulership" and "office." Had the author had a different conception, he would have recognized the conduct he observed as indicative of the primordial and characteristic syndrome of authority, and thus would have been able to contrast it with other types of political situations. Moreover, the informal and unstructured attribute of authority in this situation led him to treat lightly one of the most important sources of power in primitive cultures.

Situations such as the one just related have in recent years aroused the interest of anthropologists as they have debated "stateless" societies, "tribes without rulers,"20 in short. societies or cultures without any centralized pattern of government. Characteristically, these sorts of political systems are operated with the help of authority and the influence which springs from it, in a loose and segmented way.21 It is wholly inadmissible, in fact, to argue that these societies lack "authority," as we have seen is done in a good deal of the literature. An attempt to restrict the political to that which is coercive (even though recognizing the role of consent in human society) is certainly unacceptable from the viewpoint of political theory. We have heard it argued that "in the modern nation state, the ancient empire, the African kingdom, etc., the limits of the political field are coincident in the end with the limits of authority," meaning by authority the right to rule coercively. Yet, as we have seen, this formulation excludes the significant political dimension of leadership deriving from authority, understood as involving the capacity for reasoned elaboration.

There are, as we have already mentioned, many societies in which the characteristic situation of power based on authority can be ¹⁹ Gunther Wagner, "The Political Organization of the Bantu of Kavirondo," in Fortes and Evans-Pritchard, op. cit., pp. 235-236.

²⁰ Middleton and Tait, op. cit., 1958. Unfortunately, it, too, is entangled in difficulties resulting from the failure to distinguish power and authority. A similar attempt at classifying "stateless societies" is offered by Fortes and Evans-Pritchard in their Introduction to African Political Systems, op. cit., pp. 11–16.

²¹ M. G. Smith, Government in Zazzau: 1800-1950 (1960).

surmised to exist, particularly in all those in which the ruler acts as judge; for judicial decisions are typically affected by authority (though by no means always, as so-called cadijudgments show). Thus we hear about the Zulu (South Africa) that the king demonstrates authoritative qualities in promulgating law and judging cases. As the supreme court of the nation "the king was supposed to maintain the customary law . . . he could not decide against the law, for his favourite. Nevertheless, the king could in deciding the case create a new law for what he and his council considered good reason."22 Among the Hausa it is pointed out. there is a clear distinction between Law (shari'a) and acts of legislation (doka, pl. dokoki). "The chief had neither the function nor the power of making or altering the shari'a, which it was formerly his duty to apply and execute within the scope of powers alloted to him. Since the shari'a is regarded in Zaria as a divinely santioned code of law, it may not be altered except under force majeure by acts of legislation (dokoki), although of course its application provides considerable scope for differences of interpretation. Hence community chiefs lacked the function and power of enacting dokoki which modified the shari'a."23 Both of the situations here described are surely reminiscent of the medieval king, or at least of the image of the king as judge, believed-in during the European middle-ages. It is found in many other cultural settings, notably among the Tallensi, the Ankole and the Marquesas.24 And there are many other comparable situations, as, for example, that among the Ganda (East Africa) where the king was reported in an early study as absolute in power and yet as "expected to respect established right, to uphold justice, and to behave with 'kindness' or generosity in rewarding the deserving." In fact, "in relations between the chiefs and people we see again a conflict between a theoretical absolutism and an equally conceived theoretical standard of air dealing. . . . "25 In a similar manner, Firth went to great lengths to illustrate the fact that among the Tikopia "the power of the chief, absolute though it is in theory, is continually held in check in the interests of his people."26 Not only do both of these situations illustrate customary restraints upon a formally absolute ruler, they also imply that power is primarily consensual. The required standard of justice by which such a chief is measured seems to be the analogue to that required by the classic Greek, and more especially by the Platonic, conception of monarchy which dominated much later thought; here the link with traditional political theory is evident.

²² Max Glueckman, "The Kingdom of the Zulu of South Africa," in Fortes and Evans-Pritchard, op cit., p. 33.

²³ M. G. Smith, The Economy of Hausa Communities of Zaria, London, 1955, p. 10.

24 The Tallensi and the Ankole are discussed by Fortes and Orberg, respectively, in Fortes and Evans-Pritchard, op. cit., pp. 266 and 121ff. The Marquesas are described in Ralph Linton, "The Material Culture of the Marquesas Islands," Memoirs Bernice P. Bishop Museum, vol. 5, p. 268 (1925). Rothschild added the following comment here. Only in the colonial period when Tallensi chiefs were agents of the British Administration can it be said that they had judicial power based on authority. The Tallensi are one of the famous tribes of the anthropological state and their fame rests on Fortes' description of their social structure before the British came to the Gold Coast and before chiefs had pronounced judicial functions.

There are numerous cases where the element of authority is the distinguishing feature of the "legal process" in primitive societies. Among the Kikuyu, for example, the capacity of reasoned elaboration is the central characteristic of the judge's authority. "A muthamaki or mugambi depends for his judicial reputation very largely on his knowledge of the principles on which judgments in previous cases have been based...."27 A very interesting example of authority as "reasoned elaboration" also occurs in the following case, where it is explained why the crime of murder (awudie) came to be punished among the Ashanti by centralized authority. One of the Ashanti legal maxims says: "It is taboo for any person killed to have to inquire after death 'What was it I did?"" Murder without due process of law "struck at the root of all centralized authority," for the authority of the council of Elders in punishing cases of murder was based on its ability satisfactorily to supply to the murderer the answer to the question, "What was it I did?" Only where the murderer could be shown through a trial authorized by custom that he had committed murder was execution lawful. To go outside of the law—to take the law into one's own hands by punishing a murderer-was rightly considered a challenge to all authority.28

²⁵ Lucy P. Mair, An African People in the Twentieth Century (London, 1934), pp. 268, 183.

²⁶ Raymond Firth, We, the Tikopoa: A Sociological Study of Kinship in Primitive Polynesia (London, 1936), p. 284.

²⁷ H. E. Lambert, Kikuyu Social and Political Institutions (London 1956), p. 120.

The absence of a clear understanding of authority as well as a tendency to ignore the consensual element of power in primitive cultures has led to a debate among anthropologists on the nature of "law" as encompassing "all processes of social control, and . . . any of the obligations, customary actions, and conventions inherent in the social system " Such a characterization is both too all-inclusive and "confusing." The particular author from whom this statement is taken limits his definition "to social control which is maintained by organized legal sanctions and applied by some form of organized political mechanism."29 Yet, once we understand the consensual component in power and realize that the primitive legal process depends far more on the strength of custom than on coercion, we see that it is precisely within the realm of "customary actions and conventions inherent in the social system" that we are likely to find the legal process at work. Moreover, to limit "law" to "organized legal sanctions" overlooks the importance of the informal and amorphous processes of social coercion prevalent in primitive society. Even so, he points out that among the Nuer "there were recognized standards for the control of human relationships even though these were maintained by sanctions too indeterminate to be called legal."30 Yet, as we shall see, there are good reasons both for distinguishing between law and custom and for devaluating the importance of sanctions in connection with defining law.

Where law is employed as a term "designating the enforceable rule, enforced by a legitimate ruler possessing authority," it appears that many difficulties in understanding the primitive legal process are avoided. "For evidently such rules will be expressing the values, interests and beliefs of the community, and hence will be rooted in custom and habit exhibited in the behavior of the members of such a community." Three difficulties are eliminated by this formulation. First, it avoids the formalistic insistence upon "centralized" authority or sanctions. The inquiry is shifted to whether, in fact, a rule is enforced by any legitimate ruler possessing authority. This formulation also escapes the difficulty inherent in the realist position, which, simply put, asserts that law is a generalization based upon what is the prevalent behavior of various persons, especially of judges. This difficulty results from the fact that if law is prevalent custom, it is not easy to comprehend the imperative "ought" aspect which a command involves, for if people do something anyhow, why tell them that they ought to? Thus, the distinction between law and custom emphasizes the ideal obligatory "ought" element in law which custom often lacks. To underline this point, Hoebel discussed Malinowski's distinction between the customary and legal handling of the incest taboo among the Trobriand Islanders, where mild moral disapproval turned into harsh legal punishment once the incest was called to public notice.32 On the other hand, a strictly normative interpretation of "law" is likewise misleading. This is so because law can be nullified: if few or none obey it, it ceases to exist. Indeed, as Pospisil points out, the result would be "that so-called dead rules which are not enforced and are often unknown to the public, being contrary to the behavior of the majority of the people, are considered together with the rest of the rules as the law of the country."33

By understanding law as an "enforceable rule, enforced by a legitimate ruler possessing authority," we are able to encompass both the empirical and normative aspects of law. The first question one asks is whether, in fact, a rule is enforced. Usually the proper place to look for this phenomenon is among the decisions of the native headmen or councils.34 Yet, the normative and obligatory aspect of law is derived from the authority of the headmen's or councils' decisions, which relate legal commands to the interests, values and beliefs of the community. It is in terms of the rulemakers' capacity for reasoned elaboration, which relates decisions to a community's interests, values and beliefs, that a law becomes authoritative. Conversely, the obligatory aspect of law declines when it becomes less authoritative.

The concept of authority is crucial to the understanding of primitive law; for it relates to the tricky question of whether there must be sanctions for there to be law. It is surely extreme to say that physical force is the only

²⁸ R. S. Rattray, Law and the Ashanti Constitution (London, 1929) pp. 295-296.

²⁹ P. P. Howell, A Manual of Nuer Law (London, 1954), p. 225.

³⁰ Ibid., p. 22.

³¹ Friedrich, op. cit., p. 270. See also The Philosophy of Law in Historical Perspective, 2. ed. (1954), passim.

³² Hoebel, The Law of Primitive Man, pp. 185ff.

³³ Leopold Pospisil, Kapauku Papuans and Their Law, New Haven, 1958, p. 248.

³⁴ Ibid., p. 255.

kind of sanction standing behind law.35 Indeed, if we accept this formulation "law would not be a universal phenomenon, for cultures exist where physical sanction is practically lacking."36 Among the Kikuyu, it has been shown, "if a judgment debtor failed to pay and persisted in his recalcitrance he would be ostracized, excommunicated from society. He was 'shut out'.... His relatives and neighbors would show their disapproval by declining to talk or eat with him." And among the Kapauku, "being shamed by a public reprimand, which sometimes lasts for several days. is much worse than anything except capital punishment."38 Among the Yahgan as well, it is reported, "punishment of being ignored and ostracized is more effective than scoldings and whippings."39 Yet, it appears that if law is to be distinguished from custom, some form of sanctions-however informal and unorganized-must accompany a legal rule, even if these sanctions are rarely invoked to enforce a decision. The Guajiros, for example, emphasize the differences between moral obligations. which derive from custom, and legal obligations, which are backed up by public sanctions.40 Yet, it is perhaps more important to insist that the authoritative nature of law in most primitive cultures, on most occasions, eliminates the necessity for sanctions. Because law is generally an expression of the interests. values and beliefs of a people, a legal offender often will habitually bow to the weight of the law without ever considering the sanctions which disobedience entails.

If a "legal process" is to be identified among primitive peoples, it appears that greater understanding of customary processes of settling disputes is necessary. To some extent, the HRAF material, with its emphasis upon formal "structural" categories, makes this attempt at understanding more difficult, especially where, for example, it stresses "office" rather than "process." It is important to bear in mind, therefore, as the legal realists insist, that one must look to the informal processes of dispute-settling in primitive cultures, for there is a greater tendency to define law too narrowly. Essentially, there are three modes of settling disputes in all societies, not all of which, however, need be part of the legal process. If there are no rules at all, we may speak of expedient settling of disputes, if only broad general rules, of discretionary settling, if detailed rules, of judicial settling.⁴¹

35 Hoebel, op. cit., p. 28.

The case of the leopard-skin chief among the Nuer might well be an example of the expediential mode of settling disputes (though there are also to be found the other two types of dispute-settling). "Only if both sides are willing to submit to arbitration can a dispute be settled. Also, although the chief, after consultation with the leaders, can give a verdict, this verdict is reached after general agreement and in large measure, therefore, arises from an acknowledgement by the defendant's or plaintiff's party that the other party has justice on its side."42 Most Nuer disputes, in fact, are settled privately and between the parties concerned without the intervention of the leopard-skin chief. Indemnities "will not be paid if there is no pressure on the part of the community in which they live, and there will be pressure in proportion to the extent to which men's mutual animosity disturbs the tranquility of the community, generally speaking, the greater the structural distance between them, the less likelihood of composition."43 Indeed, this seems to be the characteristic mode of dispute settling among atomistic or uncohesive primitive societies, where neither powerful public opinion nor centralized power exists. Just as with the Nuer, compensation is determined by so-called "arbitors" or "palabras," who are nothing more than "intermediaries named by the family groups affected to settle the affair peacefully."44 Although there are fairly welldefined ideas of customary liability and compensation, the family of the injured person must seek a settlement which will provide a settlement in accordance with their power. Where the expedient mode of dispute settling predominates, neither equity nor justice are as important as the maintenance of equilibrium within the body politic, and hence this becomes the central object of any settlement of a dispute.

³⁶ Pospisil, op. cit., p. 267.

³⁷ Lambert, op. cit., p. 128.

³⁸ Pospisil, op. cit., pp. 267-268.

³⁹ Gusinde, op.cit., p. 984.

⁴⁰ Vincenzo Petrullo, "Composition of Torts' in Guajiro Society," Publications of The Philadelphia Anthropological Society, Vol I. (1937), 156-158.

⁴¹ Friedrich, op. cit., p. 426.

⁴² E. E. Evans-Pritchard, "The Nuer of the Southern Sudan," in Fortes and Evans-Pritchard op. cit., p. 293.

⁴³ Howell, op. cit., p. 24.

⁴⁴ Roberto Pineda Giraldo, Aspectos de la Magia en la Guajiro (translated from the Spanish for the Human Relations Area Files by Sydney Muirden), pp. 77.

Discretionary settlement of disputes comes into play whenever no specific rules or principles have been formulated, while at the same time mere whim, that is the failure to recognize broad rules of conduct, cannot be allowed. Among the Azande, for example, "custom determines in most cases what penalty to inflict," but the chief has great discretion in applying the rule. In the case of witchcraft. discretion is particularly pronounced for guilt is determined not on the basis of precedent but by recourse to an oracle. The importance of precedent is here transferred to the correct operation of the oracle so that "true" judgments will be given. 45 Among the Kikuvu, we also find a clear case of discretionary settling of disputes. "Every tribe has a code, but it is a code of general principles, not of detail. Every judgment must conform to it, though the principles are applied with a latitude unknown in European law."46 Where the discretionary mode predominates, the emphasis in dispute settling appears to be on equity, rather than on strict obedience to rules which are held to embody substantive justice. The attitude appears to be similar to Plato's classic argument against written law on the grounds that laws prevent the realization of justice in particular cases. Plato argued for the discretionary approach to justice as long as the ruler was bound by moral conviction. To be sure. his last word on the subject in the Laws marked a change in his position, because by then he despaired of finding rulers who would be certain to be just.47

Finally, the mode of judicial settling of disputes is often the most difficult to identify among primitive peoples. Researchers have tended to ignore this phenomenon in primitive cultures, perhaps for the reason that they have been prepared by their own experiences to look for a determinate legal sovereign or for a formal judicial authority that has explicit powers to enforce its decisions. On the other hand, the legal realists have rightly insisted that the proper test is whether a judge's legal decisions are in fact obeyed, even when he lacks the formal characteristics of a judge. There exists a great variety of "courts" which may appear in primitive societies. 48 To illustrate, a typical

⁴⁵ C. R. Lague, Les Azande du Miam-Niam (trans. from Human Relations Area Files), pp. 20-21. Cf. also Evans-Pritchard, op. cit.

46 Lambert, op. cit., p. 118.

⁴⁷ Grene, Man and His Pride: A study of the Political Philosophy of Thucydides and Plato. See Ch. 12, especially at the end.

48 Hoebel, op. cit., pp. 24-26.

example of the legal process among a primitive people is given by Koppers in his study of the Bhil. The panch, or judicial council consists of an assemblage of "the most established and most influential members of the village." Of them he reports;

The panch treats clan and caste questions above all, property disputes and disagreements of every sort, in which the most numerous are probably those concerned with marriage and women. . . . If one of the two parties is found guilty, then the guilty party must provide the daru. However, it happens rarely that the guilt is ascribed exclusively to one party; generally both sides are more or less guilty and a corresponding decision of the panch is rather rare. 49

If one were to search for "organized legal sanctions" he undoubtedly would find none, for all that exists in the way of sanctions is the informal disapproval of public opinion. Here as in other cases, the sanction of public opinion underlines the authoritative nature of the legal process: to disobey the legal authority is to strike at the heart of the communal values and beliefs, which brings public ostracism. Physical force plays little if any role in upholding the legal process.

The same kind of situation occurs among the Baluhya: intra-clan disputes are usually settled privately by negotiation and mediation. When they become serious and the public takes notice, then the elders of the different clans meet together and pronounce judgment. "The only sanction which supported legal decisions given by the leaders of the sub-clan or by the larger ad hoc assembly of all clan elders was the solidarity of the members of the respective groups in backing these decisions. Native statements assert that whenever the verdict was supported by all or the great majority of the clan elders, the defendant would not have tried to oppose." 50

In the above instances it was fairly clear, although implicit, that decisions were determined on the basis of specific and well-defined customary rules. This judicial mode of settling ⁴⁹ Wilhelm Koppers, Die Bhil in Zentralindien, (translated for the Human Relations Area Files by Theodore J. Ziolkowski), p. 165.

⁵⁰ Wagner, op. cit., p. 221. Rothschild added the following comment: "It should be noted that the council's decision was accepted only if elders from all sections of the clan or sub-clan accepted it. If there were disagreement which followed lineage lines and neither side gave in the clan would split which was, one gathers from Wagner, not an infrequent occurrence."

disputes is made even clearer by Pospisil's description of the Kapauku "process of law."

After he secures all the evidence and makes up his mind as to the factual background of the dispute, the authority starts the activity called by the natives boko duwai, which means the process of making a decision and inducing the parties to the dispute to follow it. This process could hardly be compared in its form to the adjudicating activity of our judges. The native authority makes a long speech in which he sums up the evidence, appeals to a rule, and then tells the parties what should be done in order to terminate the dispute. If the disputants are not willing to comply, the authority becomes emotional and starts to shout reproaches, and makes long speeches in which evidence, rules, decisions, and threats form inducements. Indeed, the authority may go as far as to start "wanai, the mad dance," or to change his tactics suddenly and weep bitterly about the misconduct of the defendant and the fact that the latter refuses to obey him. Some native authorities are so skilled in the art of persuasion as to produce genuine tears which almost always break the resistance of the unwilling party. A superficial Western observer confronted with such a situation may very likely regard the weeping headman as the culprit on trial. Thus, from the formalistic point of view, there is little resemblance between the Western court sentence and the boko duwai activity of the headman. However, the effect of the headman's persuasion is the same as that of a verdict passed in our court. As we have seen, there were only five cases in our material (176 cases) where the parties openly resisted and disobeyed the authority. . . . 51

This description of the Kapauku "process of law" again raises the question of whether students of primitive cultures are defining "law" with sufficient flexibility to enable them to understand what appear to be legal phenomena. The reason for informality in the primitive legal process need not be the "underdeveloped" nature of their legal institutions. In fact, informality may be the expression of a profound cultural objection to the formalistic adversary nature of advanced legal institutions. Mediation and negotiation become the mechanism by which this idea is approached, although, of course, these processes do not square with the Bodinian-Austinian doctrine of law as the act of a sovereignty. Because of the traditional mode of settling legal disputes, the observer may fail to note the specific and detailed customary rules for settling disputes, because they often, although known, remain unarticulated. This is not to say that the abstract rules which natives may identify are necessarily "good law." Only through empirical study of actual "decisions" can the observer learn the actual rules governing settlement of disputes.

The study of law in primitive cultures is intimately related to the basic political structure of those cultures. One of the most important distinctions in this connection, already mentioned, concerns the question whether a particular society possesses some form of centralized governmental institutions. Where a centralized governmental system exists, one can expect a fairly well defined system of law. In these states, rules and decisions are generally made by headmen or councils possessing powers of enforcement by appropriate sanctions. It should be pointed out in this connection that virtually all of the tribes contained in the studies digested in the HRAF display the attitude towards law characteristic of traditional societies: They conceive of law as "discovered" and not "made." Many, as we have seen, have some conception of a "higher law," which they invariably identify with customary practices.

As the centralized governmental institutions. become more powerful, there is some tendency for a society to regard a greater number of misdeeds offenses against the body politic as distinguished from mere private offenses against persons or things. Yet, this is not always so. Among the Zande, for instance, punishment is essential "for the satisfaction of the individual," not of the community. Although there are clear powers of enforcement in the hands of the chief, all crimes except witchcraft appear to be regarded as private matters to be settled by indemnity.52 Among the Baluhya there is no clear distinction between crimes against society and those which affect individuals, because the extent of social involvement depends on the actual social disruption which a particular offense causes and not on its inclusion in a category of crimes against society. The Baluhya, in addition, limit social punishment to repeated offenders who can not be disciplined privately.53 On the other hand, the distinction among the Ashanti between "things hateful to the tribe" and those deeds which were punished privately has been described in elaborate detail. Private offenses were treated as "household matters" and "were settled by the persons directly ⁵¹ Pospisil, op. cit., p. 255.

⁵² P. M. Larken, "Impressions of the Azande," Sudan Notes and Records, vol. XIII, p. 99 (1930).
⁵³ Wagner, op. cit., p. 219n.

concerned or were decided by argument before an Elder. . . . " Public offenses, by contrast, "raised a much wider issue to the African and were thought to result in more serious and widely felt consequences."54 Of course. this distinction resembles in some respects the Western classification of offenses as "civil" and "criminal" but the use of these familiar categories can be rather misleading. In many tribes, assault, adultery or even murder are treated as if they were "civil" matters, where some indemnity or refund of the "bride-price" is the only penalty. There does seem to be considerable utility, however, in analyzing primitive legal systems in terms of the distinction between "public" and "private" offenses even though this dichotomy may not apply in all situations. Nevertheless, in those instances where it does apply, the investigator will have an opportunity to learn the reasons for the treatment of particular crimes; he may, at the same time, learn that many laws are not enforced by centralized authority. Finally, an investigation of the degree to which there is a relationship between the scope of centralized power and the extent to which offenses are treated as public might also prove valuable. In any case, the extent of such treatment provides an important clue to the extent of social cohesiveness in any society.

The extent to which offenses are considered public also provides an important measure of the complexity of a society. Hoebel points out that simple societies have relatively little need for law. "If the more primitive societies are more lawless than the more civilized," he writes, "it is not in the sense that they are ipso facto more disorderly; quite the contrary. It is because they are more homogeneous; relations are more direct and intimate; interests are shared by all in a solid commonality; and there are fewer things to quarrel about."55 Conversely, when a society becomes more interdependent and heterogeneous it inclines to treat an ever greater number of offenses as affecting the body politic. Where anti-social behavior affects only the household or a limited circle of people, social control tends to be confined to this basic sphere; but where the consequences of a misdeed have impact over a wider circle, the range of public offenses is expanded.

Any broadly comparative theory of politics needs to make all possible use of the kind of data concerning primitive societies which anthropology is able to furnish. But there is still a great task ahead in developing more effective cooperation between the two disciplines. If the problems we have discussed and many others like them can be overcome it would surely be a major stimulus to the study of comparative politics. And, perhaps more important, it would provide a readily accessible source of empirical material with which to validate those generalizations which form the core of political theory and science.⁵⁶

⁵⁴ Rattray, op. cit., p. 287.

⁵⁵ Hoebel, op. cit., p. 293.

⁵⁶ The recent work of Gabriel A. Almond and G. Bingham Powell Jr., Comparative Politics: A Developmental Approach (Boston, 1967) utilizes some of this material, as did my Man and His Government (New York, 1963), and Karl W. Deutsch's The Nerves of Government (New York, 1964).

A NONLINEAR MODEL FOR THE ANALYSIS OF JUDICIAL DECISIONS*

FRED KORT University of Connecticut

Various attempts have been made in recent years to analyze judicial decisions in selected areas of law as functions of controlling facts. At least two of these attempts have relied on systems of simultaneous equations.1 In both endeavors the assumption was made that the combination of facts on which the decisions depend is linear. In the absence of any clear indication of a nonlinear combination, as well as in view of the significant results that were obtained on the basis of a linear model, the initial approach was justified. The use of high speed digital computers has made it possible, however, to explore the existence of nonlinear relationships where the original assumption of linear relationships was made. The important feature in detecting nonlinear relationships is not primarily the greater accuracy of the results—the linear model has provided acceptable approximations—but the acquisition of new insights into how different facts combine in influencing judicial decisions.

It is the purpose of this paper first to review the linear model, and then to show how it can be extended to a nonlinear model—in general terms as well as in the form of an actual application. Finally, limitations and implications of the nonlinear model will be indicated.

I. THE LINEAR MODEL

In many areas of law, comprehensive sets of facts have been specified by courts as relevant and controlling for reaching decisions, with the understanding that some combinations of these facts would lead to decisions in favor of one party, whereas other combinations would lead to decisions in favor of the opposing party. For example, in the involuntary confession cases under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court has clearly stated that each decision depends on the particular circumstances surrounding the interrogation of each petitioner-a rule which has been substantially modified but not fundamentally changed by the decision in the Miranda case. Workmen's compensation cases provide another example; reviewing courts have indicated that an award or denial of compensation must be decided on the basis of such facts as the nature of the injury, the circumstances under which the accident occurred and became known, the conditions of employment, etc. Beyond the association of some combinations of facts with decisions which already have been reached, it is not known, however, what decisions can be expected on the basis of other combinations of facts. This problem can be attacked by representing each case which already has been decided by an equation. The resulting system of simultaneous equations can be stated as follows:

$$a + b_{1}X_{11} + b_{2}X_{12} + \cdots + b_{j}X_{1j} + \cdots + b_{n}X_{1n} = Y_{1}$$

$$c + b_{1}X_{21} + b_{2}X_{22} + \cdots + b_{j}X_{2j} + \cdots + b_{n}X_{2n} = Y_{2}$$

$$\vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots$$

$$c + b_{1}X_{k1} + b_{2}X_{k2} + \cdots + b_{j}X_{kj} + \cdots + b_{n}X_{kn} = Y_{k}$$

$$\vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots$$

$$a + b_{1}X_{N1} + b_{2}X_{N2} + \cdots + b_{j}X_{Nj} + \cdots + b_{n}X_{Nn} = Y_{N}.$$

$$(1)$$

* Support for this research was provided by a grant awarded by the Committee on Governmental and Legal Processes of the Social Science Research Council. The IBM 7040, which was supported in part by Grant GF-1819 of the National Science Foundation, and the IBM 360 at the Computer Center of the University of Connecticut have been used extensively throughout the entire research. The assistance which has been received from the research foundations and from the University is gratefully acknowledged.

¹ Fred Kort, "Simultaneous Equations and Boolean Algebra in the Analysis of Judicial Decisions," Law and Contemporary Problems, 28 (Winter, 1963), 143-163; and "Content Analysis of Judicial Opinions and Rules of Law," in Glendon Schubert (ed.), Judicial Decision-Making (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1963), pp. 133-197; S. Sidney Ulmer, "Quantitative Analysis of Judicial Processes: Some Practical and Theoretical Applications," Law and Contemporary Problems, 28 (Winter, 1963), 164-184; and "Mathematical Models for Predicting Judicial Behavior," in Joe Bernd (ed.), Mathematical Applications in Political Science, III (Charlottesville, Va.: University of Virginia Press, 1967). A different approach, employing Boolean algebra, has been used by Reed C. Lawlor; see his "Foundations of Logical Legal Decision Making," Modern Uses of Logic in Law (June, 1963), pp. 98-114, and Kort, supra.

² Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436 (1966).

These simultaneous equations apply to any number of facts and their weights $(j=1, 2, \dots, n)$ in any number of cases $(k=1, 2, \dots, n)$. The only unknowns are the weights of the facts, b_j , and the constant a. Each numerical value of X_{kj} (0, 1, or an integer larger than 1), which indicates the absence, presence, or several manifestations of fact j in case k, is known. If multiple regression is used, the number of votes of the justices favorable to the party seeking redress (which is known in the decided cases) can be used as a numerical value for Y_k . The normal equations which then are obtained by employing the method of least squares are:

where

$$x_{kj} = X_{kj} - \overline{X}_j$$
 $(j = 1, 2, \dots, n),$

$$\overline{X}_j = \sum_{k=1}^N \frac{X_{kj}}{N}, \qquad d_j = \overline{X}_j^{} - \overline{X}_j^*,$$

$$\overline{X}^* = \sum_{k=1}^{N_1} \frac{X_{kj}}{N_1}, \qquad \overline{X}_j^{}_{a} = \sum_{k=1}^{N_2} \frac{X_{kj}}{N_2},$$ and where N is the total number of cases, N_1 the number of cases in the con group (decisions against the aggrieved party), and N_2 the number of cases in the pro group (decisions in favor of the aggrieved party).

By substituting the values for b_i which are

As the normal equations are solved, the weights of the facts are obtained. By substituting these weights for b_j in a case not previously encountered, a numerical value for Y_k —which indicates in terms of the votes of the justices a decision in favor or against the party seeking redress—is obtained.

If discriminant analysis is used, a numerical value is not assigned to Y_k . The system of simultaneous equations which corresponds to the normal equations in multiple regression analysis is the following:

obtained from the solution of these equations in the "discriminant function"

$$Z_k = b_1 X_{k1} + b_2 X_{k2} + \cdots + b_n X_{kn} \tag{4}$$ for any case k, a numerical value which places the case in a pro or con category can be computed.

Whether discriminant analysis or multiple regression should be used depends on the assumption which is made about the nature of the decision. If it is assumed that the decisions

$$b_{1} \sum x_{k_{1}^{2}} + b_{2} \sum x_{k_{1}} x_{k_{2}} + \cdots + b_{n} \sum x_{k_{1}} x_{k_{n}} = d_{1}$$

$$b_{1} \sum x_{k_{2}} x_{k_{1}} + b_{2} \sum x_{k_{2}^{2}} + \cdots + b_{n} \sum x_{k_{2}} x_{k_{n}} = d_{2}$$

$$\vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots \qquad \vdots$$

$$b_{1} \sum x_{k_{1}} x_{k_{1}} + b_{2} \sum x_{k_{1}} x_{k_{2}} + \cdots + b_{n} \sum x_{k_{n}^{2}} = d_{n},$$
(3)

³ This is the method which was used in my studies cited in note 1. For a somewhat different application of multiple regression to the analysis of judicial decisions, see Werner F. Gruenbaum and Albert Newhouse, "Quantitative Analysis of Judicial Decisions: Some Problems of Prediction," Houston Law Review, 3 (1965) 201-220.

⁴ This is the method which was used in the studies by Ulmer, see supra, note 1. For a somewhat different application of discriminant analysis to judicial decisions, see S. Sidney Ulmer, "The Discriminant Function and a Theoretical Context for Its Use in Estimating the Votes of Judges," to be published in a forthcoming volume by John Wiley and Sons, edited by Joseph Tanenhaus and Joel Grossman.

represent two separate categories (pro and con), discriminant analysis is appropriate. If, on the other hand, it is assumed that the decisions represent various degrees of support of parties in terms of the votes of the justiceswhich reveal, of course, whether each decision is pro or con-multiple regression has to be employed. In exploring nonlinear relationships between the controlling facts, there is another consideration which is decisive in the choice of discriminant analysis or multiple regression. Two-group discriminant analysis, which would distinguish a pro category from a con category, assumes linearity. Multiple regression can be linear or nonlinear. It also is true that multiple discriminant analysis encompasses nonlinearity. However, it would be possible to attribute meaning to the results of multiple discriminant analysis in this instance only if the analysis would discriminate groups of decisions representing different combinations of votes. The result then would be virtually the same as the one obtained by multiple regression. For these reasons, multiple regression will be used in the exposition of the nonlinear model.

Before turning attention to the nonlinear model, the use of factor analysis in connection with the linear model should be noted. In employing the linear model, it is advisable to restate the facts in terms of factors for the purpose of multiple regression or discriminant analysis for two reasons: (1) the equations stated in terms of the facts may not contain sufficient information for a unique solution; (2) it is desirable to explore the mutual dependence or independence of the facts. This restatement of the facts in terms of factors can be accomplished by the use of factor analysis. The original equations representing the observations (cases) then can be written as follows:

(the facts), an assumption regarding linearity or nonlinearity in the correlations between facts has to be made. This, of course, is an assumption which one does not wish to make in exploring a nonlinear model. For this reason, the exposition of the nonlinear model will use the facts as variables without reducing them first to factors. In view of the purposes of factor analysis, which have been indicated, it must be understood that the exploration of a nonlinear model can be pursued only if the equations stated in terms of facts provide sufficient information for a unique solution (in the least squares sense).

II. THE NONLINEAR MODEL

In considering a nonlinear model for the analysis of judicial decisions, it must be noted that there are infinite possibilities. This can be seen from the fact alone that the linear model which has been discussed can be readily extended to a nonlinear model by raising any X_j to a power ranging from 2 to infinity. Obviously, then, even at the initial stage of ex-

$$A + B_{1}\overline{F}_{11} + B_{2}\overline{F}_{12} + \cdots + B_{j}\overline{F}_{1j} + \cdots + B_{m}\overline{F}_{1m} = Y_{1}$$

$$A + B_{1}\overline{F}_{21} + B_{2}\overline{F}_{22} + \cdots + B_{j}\overline{F}_{2j} + \cdots + B_{m}\overline{F}_{2m} = Y_{2}$$

$$\vdots$$

$$A + B_{1}\overline{F}_{k1} + B_{2}\overline{F}_{k2} + \cdots + B_{j}\overline{F}_{kj} + \cdots + B_{m}\overline{F}_{km} = Y_{k}$$

$$\vdots$$

$$A + B_{1}\overline{F}_{N1} + B_{2}\overline{F}_{N2} + \cdots + B_{j}\overline{F}_{Nj} + \cdots + B_{m}\overline{F}_{Nm} = Y_{N}.$$

$$(5)$$

These equations apply to any number of factors and their weights $(j=1, 2, \ldots, m)$ in any number of cases $(k=1, 2, \ldots, N)$. Since the object of the factor analysis is to restate the facts in the original equations in terms of fewer variables, it is expected that the number of factors m is smaller than the number of facts n. Each numerical value of \overline{F}_{ki} , which is the factor estimate of factor j in case k is known; it has been obtained as a result of the factor analysis. The only unknowns in the new equations are the weights of the factors, B_i . As new cases arise, the applicable facts can be reduced to the factors which have been identified, and by substituting the weights of the factors obtained from the solution of the equations the decisions can be determined. However, since factor analysis is based on the correlations between the original variables

- ⁵ See David V. Tiedeman, "The Utility of the Discriminant Function in Psychological and Guidance Investigations," Harvard Educational Review, 21 (Spring, 1951), 71-80, at 79.
- ⁶ This method has been used in my earlier studies and in the more recent study by Ulmer, see supra, note 1.

ploration, only a nonlinear relationship between facts which has a meaningful interpretation can be considered.

For the purpose of exposition, it will be helpful to examine a hypothetical example. Assume that—contrary to reality—the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States consider only two facts in deciding an involuntary confession case: X_1 —the defendant was subjected to protracted interrogation; X_2 —the defendant did not even complete an elementary education. If the linear model which has been discussed is used, the decision in this instance would be stated as a function of facts as follows:

$$a + b_1 X_1 + b_2 X_2 = Y. (6)$$

Since the function represents the regression equation, it takes into account not merely the simple correlations between the decision and each fact, but the multiple correlation between the decision and the facts in combination. It is linear, for in three-dimensional space it can be represented by a plane. (If only one fact were involved it would be represented by a line, and if more than two facts were involved it would be represented by a hyperplane.) The interpretation of the function would be as follows: The influence which the fact that the defendant has not even completed an elementary education has on the decision adds to the influence which the fact that he was subjected to a protracted interrogation has. It is quite possible, however, that the subnormal education of the defendant does not add to his protracted interrogation as a fact in favor of a reversal of his conviction, but that it increases the impact of that fact on the decision. This possibility can be represented by a multiplicative rather than additive relationship between the facts in the following form:

$$a + (b_1 X_1)(b_2 X_2) = Y.$$
 (7)

This function is nonlinear, for in threedimensional space it is not represented by a plane, but by a hull. In order to maintain a meaningful interpretation of this function, a modification has to be introduced. According to the form in which the function has been crease the impact of his protracted interrogation on the decision, but—in the absence of subnormal education—the protracted interrogation still would influence the decision.

In reality, judicial decisions depend. of course, on more complex and more extensive combinations of facts than are indicated in the foregoing illustration. For example, in the involuntary confession cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, 29 controlling facts can be identified. In the workmen's compensation cases reviewed by the Supreme Court of Connecticut, 22 controlling facts appear in the opinions of the Court. Multiplicative relationships therefore are possible not only between pairs of facts, but between sets of 3, 4, \cdots , n facts. Moreover, the relationships between some facts may be additive and between others multiplicative. For n facts, in any case k, the decision as a function of facts then would have to be stated in the following form:

$$a + (1 + b_{1}X_{k1})(1 + b_{2}X_{k2}) \cdot \cdot \cdot (1 + b_{m_{1}}X_{km_{1}})$$

$$+ (1 + b_{m_{1}+1}X_{k(m_{1}+1)})(1 + b_{m_{1}+2}X_{k(m_{1}+2)}) \cdot \cdot \cdot (1 + b_{m_{1}+m_{2}}X_{k(m_{1}+m_{2})}) + \cdot \cdot \cdot$$

$$+ (1 + b_{m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l-1}+1}X_{k(m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l-1}+1)})(1 + b_{m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l-1}+2}X_{k(m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l-1}+2)})$$

$$\cdot \cdot \cdot (1 + b_{m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l}}X_{k(m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l})})$$

$$+ b_{m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l}+1}X_{k(m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l}+1)}$$

$$+ b_{m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l}+2}X_{k(m_{1}+m_{2}+\cdots+m_{l}+2)} + \cdot \cdot \cdot + b_{n}X_{n} = Y_{k}, \text{ where } (m_{1} + m_{2} + \cdots + m_{l}) \leq n.$$ stated, the fact that the defendant was subjected to protracted interrogation would have no effect on the decision if his education were not subnormal. For X_2 then would be 0, and the entire term, including X_1 would vanish. Such a result would not be plausible. One would expect X_1 to have some impact on the decision, even if X_2 were absent. For this reason, it would be more meaningful to modify the preceding function as follows:

$$(9)$$

$$a + (1 + b_1 X_1)(1 + b_2 X_2) = Y.$$
 (8)

According to this expression, the subnormal education of the defendant certainly could in-

7 It should be noted, however, that precisely this type of function is very meaningful in the analysis of some judicial decisions in Roman law systems. In the latter, the presence of specified facts frequently is designated by legislatures or courts as a set of indispensable conditions for a decision in favor of the aggrieved party. A forthcoming study by the author, to be presented at the APSA Annual Meeting in 1968, will exemplify this point with regard to Swiss cases.

In determining which particular form of this function applies to a specified set of judicial decisions, a nonlinear multiple regression analysis has to be performed several hundred to several thousand times-depending on the number of facts and the number of multiplicative relationships between facts which are identified as significant in the course of the analysis. It can be readily seen that such an investigation would be prohibitive without the use of a high speed computer. With the use of a computer, the following procedure can be employed: Linear regression is performed first. Then a multiplicative relationship between the first pair of facts is introduced into the regression equation, and nonlinear regression is performed. If the results of this regression are significant in relation to the preceding one,8 the multiplicative relationship between

. 8 The significance test which can be employed here is the F test for determining significance of nonlinear regression over linear regression or higher order nonlinear regression over lower order nonlinear regression:

$$F = \frac{\left[\sum (Y_{\text{from higher order regression}} - \overline{Y})^2 - \sum (Y_{\text{from lower order regression}} - \overline{Y})^2\right]/1}{\left[\sum (Y - \overline{Y})^2 - \sum (Y_{\text{from higher order regression}} - \overline{Y})^2\right]/(N - n - 1)}.$$

the first two facts is accepted; if not, the additive relationship is restored. In any case, a multiplicative relationship between the next pair of facts is introduced into the regression equation, and a new nonlinear regression is performed. This procedure is employed for every pair of facts, and in each instance the acceptance or rejection of the multiplicative relationship under investigation depends on the significance test of the higher order nonlinear regression in relation to the lower order nonlinear regression. This procedure then is extended to multiplicative relationships between 3, 4, \cdots , n facts. It is possible, of course, that every multiplicative relationship is rejected because of insufficient significance. In that case, the original linear model is retained. It can be seen, therefore, that no assumption regarding linearity or nonlinearity is made in this procedure. The linear model is transformed into a nonlinear model only if the significance tests so indicate.

Of crucial importance in the foregoing procedure is the solution of nonlinear simultaneous equations. The normal equations which are encountered in the iterative regression analysis are nonlinear. This can be seen if one considers merely a few terms in the preceding, generally stated function (9):

$$a + (1 + b_1 X_{k1})(1 + b_2 X_{k2}) + \cdots + b_n X_{kn} = Y_k. \quad (10)$$

In accordance with the method of least squares, on which regression analysis is based, the function

$$g = \sum_{k=1}^{N} \left[a + (1 + b_1 X_{k1})(1 + \dot{\beta}_2 X_{k2}) + \cdots + b_n X_{kn} - Y_k \right]^2 \quad (11)$$ has to be minimized. The normal equations, which are obtained by taking the partial derivatives of this expression with respect to every unknown and setting them equal to 0, can be written in the following form (the subscript k is omitted):

$$f_{0} = \frac{\partial g}{\partial a} = Na + N + b_{1} \sum X_{1} + b_{2} \sum X_{2} + b_{1}b_{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2} + \cdots + b_{n} \sum X_{n} - \sum Y = 0$$

$$f_{1} = \frac{\partial g}{\partial b_{1}} = b_{1} \sum X_{1}^{2} + b_{1}b_{2}^{2} \sum X_{1}^{2}X_{2}^{2} + \cdots + a \sum X_{1} + ab_{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2} + \cdots + \sum X_{1} + b_{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2} + \cdots + b_{n} \sum X_{1}X_{n} - \sum X_{1}Y + b_{2}^{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2}^{2} + \cdots + b_{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2} + 2b_{1}b_{2} \sum X_{1}^{2}X_{2} + \cdots + b_{n} \sum X_{1}X_{n} - \sum X_{1}Y + b_{2}^{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2}^{2} + \cdots + b_{2}b_{n} \sum X_{1}X_{2}X_{n} - b_{2} \sum X_{1}X_{2}Y = 0$$

$$f_{2} = \frac{\partial g}{\partial b_{2}} = b_{2} \sum X_{2}^{2} + b_{1}^{2}b_{2} \sum X_{1}^{2}X_{2}^{2} + \cdots + a \sum X_{2} + ab_{1} \sum X_{1}X_{2} + \cdots + \sum X_{2} + b_{1} \sum X_{1}X_{2} + \cdots + b_{1} \sum X_$$

Since only a few terms were taken from the generally stated function, it should be noted that the normal equations are in reality much more complicated than the equations in the preceding exposition. A solution of the normal equations by graphic methods is not possible.

See F. E. Croxton and D. J. Cowden, Applied General Statistics, 2nd. Ed. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1955), pp. 726-732, including the exposition of the t-test on p. 727.

However, with the assistance of a high speed computer, a method of iterative approximation—based on Taylor's theorem⁹—can be used for the solution of these equations.

⁹ See, e.g., R. E. Johnson and F. L. Kiokemeister, Calculus, 3rd. Ed. (Boston: Allyn and Bacon, Inc., 1964), pp. 397-401, and M. H. Protter and C. B. Morrey, Jr., College Calculus (Reading, Mass.: Addison-Wesley Publ. Co., Inc., 1964), pp. 695-699. This method was brought to the attention of the author by Pro-

According to Taylor's theorem, a function of several variables $f(x_1, x_2, \dots, x_n)$, which is continuous in the neighborhood of a point (c_1, c_2, \cdots, c_n) , and all the partial derivatives of which up to p+1 are continuous in the neighborhood of that point, can be expanded as follows:

$$f_{j}(a, b_{1}, b_{2}, \cdots, b_{n})$$

$$= f_{j}(c_{0}, c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})$$

$$+ \frac{\partial f_{j}(c_{0}, c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})}{\partial a} (a - c_{0})$$

$$+ \frac{\partial f_{j}(c_{0}, c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})}{\partial b_{j}} (b_{1} - c_{1})$$
(15)

$$f(x_{1}, x_{2}, \dots, x_{n}) = f(c_{1}, c_{2}, \dots, c_{n})$$

$$+ \sum_{1 \leq r_{1} + r_{2} + \dots + r_{n} \leq p} \frac{\partial^{r_{1} + r_{2} + \dots + r_{n}} f(c_{1}, c_{2}, \dots, c_{n})}{\partial x_{1}^{r_{1}} \partial x_{2}^{r_{2}} \dots \partial x_{n}^{r_{n}}} \frac{(x_{1} - c_{1})^{r_{1}}}{r_{1}!} \dots \frac{(x_{n} - c_{n})^{r_{n}}}{r_{n}!}$$

$$+ \sum_{r_{1} + r_{2} + \dots + r_{n} - p + 1} \frac{\partial^{p+1} f(z_{1}, z_{2}, \dots, z_{n})}{\partial x_{1}^{r_{1}} \partial x_{2}^{r_{2}} \dots \partial x_{n}^{r_{n}}} \frac{(x_{1} - c_{1})^{r_{1}}}{r_{1}!} \dots \frac{(x_{n} - c_{n})^{r_{n}}}{r_{n}!},$$

$$(13)$$

where (z_1, z_2, \dots, z_n) is a point between $(x_1,$ x_2, \dots, x_n) and (c_1, c_2, \dots, c_n) . If (c_1, c_2, \dots, c_n) is so chosen that it is close to (x_1, x_2, \dots, x_n) , approximate equality can be attained in (13) even if the right side of the equation is limited to the first derivatives. (13) then becomes

$$f(x_{1}, x_{2}, \cdots, x_{n})$$

$$\stackrel{=}{=} f(c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})$$

$$+ \frac{\partial f(c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})}{\partial x_{1}} (x_{1} - c_{1})$$

$$+ \frac{\partial f(c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})}{\partial x_{2}} (x_{2} - c_{2}) + \cdots$$

$$+ \frac{\partial f(c_{1}, c_{2}, \cdots, c_{n})}{\partial x_{n}} (x_{n} - c_{n}).$$
(14)

Each of the normal equations in (12), f_0 , f_1 , f_2, \dots, f_n , is a function of several variables, namely, of a, b_1, b_2, \dots, b_n . Any of these normal equations f_j $(j=0, 1, 2, \dots, n)$ therefore may be expanded in accordance with (14):

fessor Elliot S. Wolk, Department of Mathematics, University of Connecticut.

$$+\frac{\partial f_j(c_0, c_1, c_2, \cdots, c_n)}{\partial b_2} (b_2 - c_2) + \cdots$$

$$+\frac{\partial f_j(c_0, c_1, c_2, \cdots, c_n)}{\partial b_n} (b_n - c_n).$$

For the purpose of initial approximation, the values obtained for a, b_1, b_2, \cdots, b_n from linear regression can be used as values for c_0 , c_1, c_2, \cdots, c_n . Of course, the values of a, b_1, b_2, \cdots, b_n as nonlinear regression coefficients in (12) are not known. Furthermore, the values of $(a-c_0)$, (b_1-c_1) , (b_2-c_2) , \cdots , (b_n-c_n) are not known. However, by solving a system of equations with $(a-c_0)$, (b_1-c_1) , (b_2-c_2) , \cdots , (b_n-c_n) — designated in briefer notation as Δa , Δb_1 , $\Delta b_2, \cdots, \Delta b_n$, respectively—as unknowns, a first approximation to a, b_1, b_2, \dots, b_n as nonlinear regression coefficients can be found. This system of equations can be obtained by applying (15) to each of the normal equations in (12); i.e., the partial derivatives of each normal equation with respect to a, b_1, b_2, \cdots , b_n are taken, the values of $c_0, c_1, c_2, \cdots, c_n$ are substituted for a, b_1, b_2, \cdots, b_n respectively, and the following system of equations is formed:

As the values of Δc , Δb_1 , Δb_2 , \cdots , Δb_n that are obtained from the solution of these equations are added to the initial values of c_0 , c_1 , c_2 , \cdots , c_n , the first approximation to a, b_1 , b_2 , \cdots , b_n as nonlinear regression coefficients is found. The values of a, b_1 , b_2 , \cdots , b_n in this first approximation then are used as c_0 , c_1 , c_2 , \cdots , c_n , and the entire procedure is repeated as many times as is necessary for reaching a point at which the residuals between the right and the left sides of the normal equations (12) vanish or become negligible.

III. APPLICATION OF THE NONLINEAR MODEL

For the purpose of testing and demonstration, the proposed nonlinear model was applied to an analysis of the Connecticut workmen's compensation cases. Included in the analysis were all 128 cases which the Supreme Court of Connecticut had decided since the adoption of the State Workmen's Compensation Law of 1913 with regard to the following question: Does the combination of relevant facts justify an award or denial of compensation? Of course, there are several thousand workmen's compensation cases which were never submitted to the Connecticut Supreme Court for review, and there are many cases which the Court reviewed on other grounds. But the analysis under consideration is concerned only with those cases in which the decisions of the Court may be regarded as a function of identified relevant facts. These facts are listed in Table 1.

In accordance with the procedure described in the preceding section, linear regression analysis was performed first. The observation equations, which are stated in general terms in (1), were formed pursuant to the basic regression equation with $k=1, 2, \cdots, 128$ (128 cases). Note again that the value of each X_{kj} is 0, 1, or an integer larger than 1, depending on whether fact j is absent, present, or has several manifestations in case k. The normal equations—stated in general terms in (2)—were obtained by taking the partial derivatives of the sum of the squares of the observation equations with respect to every unknown and setting them equal to 0. As these normal equations were solved, the values of the linear regression coefficients $a, b_1, b_2, \cdots, b_{22}$, which are listed in Table 2, were found. The substitution of these values in the observation equations (1) yielded the estimated values for Y_k .

$$a + b_1 X_{k1} + b_2 X_{k2} + \dots + b_j X_{kj} + \dots + b_{22} X_{k22} = Y_k,$$
 (17)

10 Copies of the complete set of data and results may be obtained from the author.

The significance test for the linear multiple regression gave a value of F = 7.962, with a chance probability for such a value of P <0.001. Consequently, the results of the linear regression could be accepted as significant. Nevertheless, the possibility had to be considered that the linear model was merely a good approximation to a nonlinear model, which would show even higher significance. The exploration of this possibility was particularly indicated by the fact that some regression coefficients were negative (see Table 2) and made an intuitive interpretation difficult. For example, one would expect that fact 4—an accident occurred in the course of an activity known to and permitted by the employer-should have a positive rather than negative weight in contributing to a decision in favor of the claimant. It will be seen that even the nonlinear model in its application to this set of data did not eliminate entirely such inadequacies, but it will be apparent that the latter model achieved substantial improvement in this and other respects.

After the completion of the linear regression. a multiplicative relationship between the first two facts was introduced into the regression equation, and nonlinear regression in accordance with the exposition of systems of equation (10) to (16) was performed. Since the results were not significant in relation to the preceding linear regression, a multiplicative relationship between the first two facts was rejected. Likewise, the introduction of every subsequent multiplicative relationship into the regression equation and the corresponding nonlinear regression analysis did not yield significance over the linear model until the pair of fact 4 and fact 18 (see Table 1) were reached. At that point, the significance test for nonlinear regression gave a value of F = 8.024, with a chance probability of P < 0.001, and the significance test for the nonlinear regression over the preceding linear regression yielded a value of F = 5.997 (see note 8), with a chance probability P < 0.05. Consequently, a multiplicative relationship between fact 4 and fact 18 was accepted, and the further exploration of the nonlinear model continued on the basis of the following regression equation:

$$a + b_1 X_{k1} + b_2 X_{k2} + \cdots + (1 + b_4 X_{k4})(1 + b_{18} X_{k18}) + b_6 X_{k5} + \cdots + b_{17} X_{k17} + b_{19} X_{k19} + \cdots + b_{22} X_{k22} = Y_k,$$
(18)
$${}^{11} F = \frac{\sum (Y_{\text{from regression}} - \overline{Y})^2 / n}{\sum (Y - Y_{\text{from regression}})^2 / (N - n - 1)}.$$

TABLE 1: FACTS IN THE CONNECTICUT WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION CASES

Injury Claimed Is an Occupational Disease or the Result of Repetitive Trauma or Repetitive Acts:

- 1. Injury consists of a disease or a physical disability which is frequently encountered in the occupation of the employee.
- 2. Injury consists of a disease or a physical disability which reasonably can be connected with the occupation of the employee.

Circumstances under Which an Accident or an Act Alleged to Have Caused the Injury Occurred:

- 3. Accident or act occurred during working hours.
- 4. Accident or act occurred in the course of an activity known to and permitted by the employer, or customary and not forbidden by the employer.
- 5. Accident or act occurred in the course of an activity conducive to efficient work.
- Accident or act occurred in the course of an activity indispensable to the performance of the work.
- 7. Accident or act occurred on the premises of employment, in an area annexed to the place of employment, in an area where the work normally is performed, in the direct course of transportation furnished by the employer, or in living accommodations furnished by the employer.
- 8. Accident occurred as the result of an act or activity which did not involve unnecessary, self-imposed, knowlingly hazardous conduct, such as taking a "joy-ride" on a conveyor belt for unloading coal.
- 9. Accident occurred as the result of an act by the injured employee, the occurrence of which was known to the employer and not effectively forbidden.

Circumstances under Which the Injury Became Known:

- 10. Injury became immediately apparent to the employee as a result of an accident or act.
- 11. Accident or act as described by the claimant was observed by other persons.
- 12. Injury became immediately apparent to other observers as a result of an accident or act.
- 13. Injury was reported to the employer as soon as it became apparent to the employee.
- 14. Accident or act alleged to have caused the injury was promptly reported to the employer.
- 15. Accident or act alleged to have caused the injury was brought to the attention of a physician when medical treatment for the injury was first sought.
- 16. Claim for compensation filed as soon as the injury became apparent to the employee.

Conditions of the Employment Which Affect the Probability of an Injury Subject to Compensation

17. Conditions of employment exposed employee to an uncommon risk or to a common risk to an unusual degree, or to an exertion or risk beyond usual workaday labor (including railroad crossings en route to work and adjacent to the place of employment when employer knows of and permits use of crossing path).

Causal Aspects of the Injury

- 18. The cause alleged by the claimant is the probable cause of the injury, as supported by expert testimony.
- 19. The injury is causally traceable to the employment other than through weakened resistance or lowered vitality, as supported by expert testimony.
- The accident or act is the cause of the injury, and no expert testimony is necessary to establish this fact.

Evidence Not Derived from Expert Testimony

- 21. No contradictions in the evidence given by the claimant.
- 22. All evidence not derived from expert testimony in favor of the validity of the allegation made by the claimant.

with values for a, b_1 , b_2 , \cdots , b_{22} as listed in the applicable column in Table 2. It should be noted that this equation is a particular form of the generally stated equation (9).

The further introduction of multiplicative relationships between pairs of facts did not yield significance over the regression in terms of (18) until the pair of fact 7 and fact 20 (see Table 1) was reached. At that point, the significance test gave a value of F = 9.179,

TABLE 2. REGRESSION COEFFICIENTS

Applicable to facts (X_1) as listed in Table 1	Linear	Nonlinear, after inclusion of multiplicative relationship between facts 4 and 18	Nonlinear, after further inclusion of multiplicative relationship between facts 7 and 20
a	-1.709	-2.860	-4.836
bı	-0.330	-0.288	-1.539
b_2	3.388	3.027	3.265
b_2	-0.101	-0.082	-0.540
b4	-0.529	-0.119	-0.276
bs	2.443	2.088	3.339
b_6	-0.704	-0.542	-1.154
b7	1.317	1.263	1.238
bs	0.484	0.348	0.395
ba	0.929	0.929	0.530
b_{10}	0.325	0.743	0.727
b_{11}	.0.088	0.033	1.114
b12	-1.280	-1.197	-2.986
b_{13}	0.031	-0.100	0.648
b14	-0.178	-0.111	-0.400
b_{15}	0.566	0.479	0.823
b_{16}	-2.235	-2.117	-1.575
b ₁₇	1.103	0.982	1.395
b_{18}	2.062	2.989	0.992
b_{19}	0.700	0.237	2.854
b_{20}	2.561	2.773	2.184
b21	0.443	0.449	0.864
b_{22}	0.225	0.085	0.368

with a chance probability P < 0.001, and the significance test for the higher order nonlinear regression over the lower order nonlinear regression yielded a value of F = 99.997, with a chance probability P < 0.001. On that basis, a multiplicative relationship between fact 7 and fact 20 was accepted as part of the nonlinear regression equation, which now could be stated as follows:

$$a + b_1 X_{k1} + b_2 X_{k2} + \cdots + (1 + b_4 X_{k4})(1 + b_{18} X_{k18}) + b_5 X_{k5} + \cdots + (1 + b_7 X_{k7})(1 + b_{20} X_{k20}) + b_8 X_{k8} + \cdots + b_{17} X_{k17} + b_{19} X_{k19} + b_{21} X_{k21} + b_{22} X_{k22} = Y_k;$$ with values for a, b_1 , b_2 , \cdots , b_{22} as listed in the applicable column in Table 2.

An exploration of further multiplicative relationships between pairs of facts and multiplicative relationships between more than two facts did not yield any significance over nonlinear regression in terms of (19). To be sure, the proposed procedure is designed to examine multiplicative relationships between 2, 3, \cdots , n facts. On empirical grounds, it is not likely, however, that significant multiplicative relationships in all these combinations will be found.

A comparison of equations (17) and (19) shows that the nonlinear model which has been accepted for this set of data is superior to the linear model not only on the basis of statistical significance tests, but also on intuitive grounds. If the applicable values of the regression coefficients $a, b_1, b_2, \cdots, b_{22}$ from columns 1 and 3 of Table 2 are substituted in equations (17) and (19), respectively, the following observations can be made: In the linear model, fact 18 counteracts with a positive weight of approximately 2 the negative weight of approximately 1/2 of fact 4 (which can not be easily interpreted), if both facts are present in the case. In the nonlinear model, the impact of fact 4, with a positive weight of approximately 3/4, is increased twice if fact 18 also is present in the case. [Note $(1+b_4X_{k4})$ $(1+b_{18}X_{k18})$ with the applicable values for b_4 and b_{18} and 1 (presence) for X_{k4} and X_{k18} in equation (19)]. The latter relationship is more meaningful, for one would expect that verification by expert testimony substantially increases the influence of an accident in the course of an activity permitted by the employer on the decision. Similar observations can be made with respect to facts 7 and 20. In the linear model, fact 20 adds a positive weight of approximately 2 1/2 to a positive weight of approximately 1 1/4 of fact 7, if both facts are present in the case. In the nonlinear model, the impact of fact 7, with a positive weight of approximately 2 1/2 is increased three times if fact 20 also is present in the case. The latter relationship is more plausible than the former, for one would expect that an undisputed injury does not merely add to the influence of the fact that the accident occurred at a place connected with the employment, but that it decisively increases the impact of the latter on the decision in a workmen's compensation case.

IV. LIMITATIONS AND IMPLICATIONS

In general, the application of the nonlinear model provides insights into the relationships between facts in judicial decisions which otherwise would be merely speculative. Limitations in the application of the model must be recognized, however. In the discussion of factor analysis in connection with the linear model, it was noted that—without reducing the facts to factors-not enough information may be obtained from the observations (cases) for a unique solution of the simultaneous equations. Another possibility is that enough information for a unique solution of the equations is obtained, but there are too few observations for an indication of significance in the results of multiple regression. This is the problem which was encountered in the analysis of the involuntary confession cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. With 29 facts and 33 cases (only 4 degrees of freedom), the F test did not even show significance at the 0.05 level, either for the initial linear regression or for any subsequent nonlinear regression. Clearly, this is a situation to which the nonlinear model can not be applied. On the other hand, by reducing the facts to factors and employing the linear model as an approximation, i.e., system of equations (5), significant results can be obtained.

As far as the implications of the use of the nonlinear model are concerned, three comments—quite different from each other—seem to be in order: (1) The exploration of nonlinear relationships between facts that determine judicial decisions can be combined with an analysis of the acceptance or rejection of facts by appellate courts.¹² In this fashion, it first can be ascertained under what circumstances facts are accepted by appellate courts from lower court records and appellate briefs as relevant for decisions, and then it can be determined whether linear or nonlinear relationships exist between the accepted facts in influencing the decisions. (2) It can be shown that nonlinear relations between controlling facts are even more dominant in Roman law systems than in common law systems. The Swiss workmen's compensation cases provide a significant example in that respect. 13 On that basis, linear and nonlinear models furnish a criterion for distinctions in judicial decisions between major legal systems. (3) The dependence of decisions on controlling facts is not unique to judicial decisions, although it has special importance in adjudication. Consequently, the proposed nonlinear model can be employed in the analysis of decision-making processes beyond the framework of judicial action.

¹² See Fred Kort, "Models for the Analysis of Fact-Acceptance by Appellate Courts," The American Behavioral Scientist, 9 (April, 1966), 8-10; and "Quantitative Analysis of Fact-Patterns in Cases and Their Impact on Judicial Decisions," Harvard Law Review, 79 (June, 1966), 1595-1603.

13 See supra, note 7.

DECISION COSTS IN COALITION FORMATION*

CHARLES R. ADRIAN University of Colifornia, Riverside

CHARLES PRESS
Michigan State University

Choices made in coalition formation are costly to participants, complex, and difficult to measure with precision because observable coalitions are multi-person, non-zero-sum games. At least eight decision costs are included in the process. The purpose of this paper is to identify them and to examine their usefulness in explaining coalition formation. Decisions include: (1) information costs, (2) responsibility costs, (3) intergame costs, (4) costs of division of payoffs, (5) dissonance costs (6) inertia costs, (7) time costs, and (8) persuasion costs.

Coalition building is an essential aspect of decision making within any political system. Whether one is studying the behavior of a municipal planning commission, a committee or sub-committee of a legislative body, the United Nations Security Council, or any other decision-making institution in which more than one person is involved in reaching a decision, the essential problem is often one of establishing a winning coalition within the entire group membership. A winning coalition is any portion of the group that can decide to do or not to do something that is on the agenda of the group and over which it has competent authority. The requirements of what constitutes a winning coalition are determined by the formal and informal rules of the game. Most commonly, one of the rules is that a winning coalition must consist of onehalf the members of the group plus one and this assumption is made for purposes of this paper. The size of the coalition needed is important for individual and coalition strategies, but it is not important conceptually. That is, the problems involved in securing a winning coalition on the United States Supreme Court when only four votes are needed in order to agree to hear a case affects the strategy of the members of the court, but is of no theoretical importance to coalition formation. Once the formal rules indicate the size of coalition minimally necessary, the size and makeup of the coalition is theoretically determined by an algebraic summation of the decision costs involved for participants. These costs incorporate a variety of economic and psychological factors and in particular are influenced by three "principles." These are the unanimity principle, the size principle, and the indispensable membership principle.

* We wish to thank Paul Dawson, Susan B. Hannah, and James Ozinga, all former students in our "choice theory" seminar at Michigan State University, for their critical comments on this article.

The unanimity principle is derived from the small-group theories of social psychology. It can be stated as follows:

Among members of a group capable of direct communication with one another, the dynamics of intra-group interaction produces pressures for decisions of the group to be formally unanimous.

There are two corollaries:

- (1) Pressures for unanimity vary directly with the cultural salience of the issue.
- (2) Pressures for unanimity vary inversely with the size of the group.¹

Some studies seem to indicate that the pressure for unanimity is strong only in groups of six or less,² and one report on a five-member village council found patient efforts to secure a coalition of the whole group to be the rule,³ but a preliminary study of a 42-member county governing board in a county where potential rural-urban and urban-sub-urban conflicts were present, still found the pressure to exist and unanimous votes to be the rule.⁴ The few non-

- ¹ For empirical studies tending to support this principle, see Barry E. Collins and Harold Guetzkow, A Social Psychology of Group Processes for Decision-Making (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 1964), esp. chap. 9; and Robert T. Golembiewski, The Smail Group (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962), esp. pp. 144–170.
- ² For a supporting study, see Philip E. Slater, "Contrasting Correlates of Group Size," Sociometry, 21 (1958), 129-139.
- ³ A. J. Vidich and Joseph Bensman, Small Town in Mass Society (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1958), p. 110.
- ⁴ Jean McDonald, "The Theory of Political Coalitions as Applied to the Ingham County Board of Supervisors," a seminar paper submitted to the authors, Michigan State University, March, 1966.

unanimous votes strongly tended to be on non-salient issues.

The size principle was developed by William Riker.⁵ In its briefest form, it is this:

In n-person, zero-sum games, where sidepayments are permitted, where players are rational, and where they have perfect information, only winning minimal coalitions occur. A winning minimal coalition contains the minimum number of votes practicable that is still a majority.

As we will indicate below, Riker has developed an elegant size principle, but it has very restricted explanatory power so far as the observable behavior of coalition formation is concerned. Even so, the size principle is of value, for it can be generalized to apply to far more situations than it does as stated by Riker. We would state the size principle as follows:

In n-person, non-zero-sum games, where side-payments are permitted, and where information costs are greater than zero (persons have imperfect information), the desire to maximize individual power and individual shares of the payoffs of victory will cause players to seek to approximate a minimal winning coalition.

The unanimity principle and the size principle, obviously, work against one another, but there is no theoretical reason why these opposed tendencies could not exist simultaneously in the same group behavior. Interest-group theory, motivational theory in psychology, and the laws of physics are replete with similar examples of countervailing forces.

The indispensable membership principle is this:

Sometimes, for a coalition to be winning, certain powerful members of the group must be included. They cannot be substituted for by any aggregation of other group members.

The United States Constitution, as originally submitted to the states, could formally be made effective through its ratification by nine of the

- ⁵ William H. Riker, The Theory of Political Coalitions (New Haven: Yale University Press 1962).
- ⁶ In a zero-sum game, what one player or coalition of players gains, the others lose. The formula is: $1-(a+b+\cdots x)=0$.
- ⁷ Side payments are payments made by players as inducements for other players to join with them in coalition.

thirteen states, but it was generally believed by informed persons then (and still is) that the government it would establish could not be effective or even survive unless the two most populous states, New York and Virginia, were among those ratifying. Some decisions of the United Nations General Assembly will not be effective unless both the United States and the Soviet Union support them. Majority leaders in either house of Congress seldom are excluded from a winning coalition on any issue in their house. Their support is ordinarily necessary in order to secure a numerical majority. Leaders always have a number of votes, "in the pocket;" these include those of persons with little seniority and no independent power base, and those who are indebted to the party leader for past favors. A coalition may be able to win almost automatically if just one indispensable person joins—the majority leader in a legislative body, the president of the university student body, or the most prestigeful member of a departmental faculty. His action converts what might otherwise be a risky position for some members of a group into one involving minimal decision (responsibility) costs.

In some cases, the indispensable membership for a winning coalition is the entire membership. Economic sanctions applied by an international agency such as the United Nations are an example. With even a few small nations refusing to cooperate, efforts to apply sanctions to an offending nation may not be effective.

I. DECISION COSTS

Decision costs in coalition formation include the following:

(1) Information costs. These are divided into two sub-categories. They involve the costs of collecting information concerning the value ordering and strategies of other members of the group as well as the costs of communicating one's own value ordering and bargaining positions.

The communication of information is complicated by the blurring effect resulting from each individual's imperfect perception of reality and by the screening of all communications through one's personal value system. Furthermore, in evaluating information, people may confuse what they believe to be rational information (subjective rationality, in Herbert Simon's terms) with what is rational, that is, what is believed to and in fact does lead to chosen goals.

Because information costs are often high, what is sometimes taken for apathy may represent rational calculation, as Anthony Downs has pointed out, and as many a member of a legislative body has concluded. The amount of power for influencing an outcome or the payoff for being a member of a winning coalition may be so small as to make it uneconomic to be informed.

Information costs may tend to counter the potential application of either the size principle or the unanimity principle. The effort (cost) necessary in order to determine whether it would be desirable and feasible to include all members of the group in the coalition may be too high to be worthwhile. A leader may assume, for example, that one or two persons who have been consistently deviant members of the group cannot be brought along into agreement on a particular decision while, if he had the actual information, he might have found the situation to be one in which these persons could be convinced to join the coalition with minimal, acceptable cost. On the other hand, where the coalition seeks to apply the size principle in the absence of complete knowledge, as Anthony Downs has observed, the coalition might rationally include, say, fiftyfive per cent of the total membership of the group in order to overcome the informational aspects of decision-making costs-it is not worth the effort needed to determine the actual minimal coalition.8

(2). Responsibility costs. These are costs resulting from having a decision attributed in whole or in part to a given person. Responsibility costs are related to the size of the group. The relative size of a minimal winning coalition varies according to the size of the group—the smaller the group, the larger the percentage of the total that is required for a minimal winning coalition. In the case of a two-person committee, one hundred per cent of the group is the necessary figure; for three persons, sixtysix and two-thirds per cent. In the United States House of Representatives, with 435 members, 50.1 per cent (218 Congressmen) is needed if all are present. In cases of very small groups, individual power is relatively high,9 information costs relatively low, and responsibility costs relatively high. In a fairly large group, on the other hand, the inverse is the case.

Responsibility costs increase inversely with the size of the group. These may vary enormously, of course. They may be negative costs (profits)—that is, the individual may gain social capital, status, or opportunities to participate in other games, but they may also be very expensive, resulting in losses in relation to all of these.

Responsibility costs vary by role and position, particularly as to whether an individual is the coalition builder, the marginal member, or some other member. For the coalition builder, these costs are especially likely to be high, for he cannot usually hide a failure. He also assumes some of the responsibility costs of other members, for in seeking to get them to join, he has to estimate their various costs and will be blamed by his colleagues if his estimates prove to be seriously in error. The costs to the coalition builder are reduced somewhat by the institutionalization of the process. Legislative party leaders and whips build coalitions routinely as part of their role. Their risk is much less than that of, say, George Norris who succeeded in trimming the powers of the Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1910. He carried his proposal around in his pocket for years waiting for the "right" moment to make his challenge. The risk of failure was great and the personal costs would have been enormous. The same kind of risk was taken by A. P. Herbert in the British House of Commons in 1936-1937, when he sought to build a cross-party coalition to change the divorce laws.

The marginal member also bears extra responsibility costs, because his act of joining permits the coalition to win. If the action of the coalition is later seen by relevant persons as having been undesirable, he will be disproportionately blamed. The risk to the marginal member may be reduced, however, by the fact that his identity may not be evident and members of the group, in private session, may agree to hide it, although exposure always remains a threat.

The size principle does not apply whenever the overwhelmingly important objective of the group is to dilute responsibility for a decision; the unanimity principle does. As a corollary, we could say that responsibility costs increase disproportionately as the irrevocability of decisions increases. Where responsibility costs rise, the pressure to minimize error by careful calculation mounts. The more irrevoachle the decision, the more important it becomes to minimize the cost of error.

One way, and very possibly the most effective way, to minimize responsibility costs is to spread them over the largest possible percentage of the total group. The coalition in a legislative body that seeks to lead a nation into war—one of the most irrevocable of decisions that can be made in modern times—would never be expected to apply the size principle. A strong effort at unanimity would be made, as in fact was the case in the United States Congress when war was decleared in 1917 and again in 1941.

⁸ Anthony Downs, An Economic Theory of Democracy (New York: Harper and Row, Publishers, 1953).

⁹ L. S. Shapley and Martin Shubik, "A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System," this Review, 48 (1954), 787-792.

Many political situations are such that the payoff involves sharing responsibility or maximizing social impact rather than dividing up the payoffs among the members of a winning coalition. Institutions wary of criticism of a particular action commonly seek unanimity. The procedure of "massing the court" has been followed many times by chief justices when the United States Supreme Court has prepared to announce an especially controversial decision. The school integration decision of 1954 was unanimous and the justices worked hard to make it so. The justices and supporters of their decisions are keenly aware of the marginal legitimacy of such decisions and of the political controversy that follows each of them.

Legislators follow the same kind of procedure when raising their own salaries, passing a concurrent resolution, or even in adopting a highly controversial bill, such as Medicare legislation. They seek maximum coalitions to avoid raising questions about the legitimacy or wisdom of such decisions, to help unite the nation in time of crisis, and to lessen the effectiveness of attacks on the decision-making institution.

(3) Intergame costs. These are costs in other games for participation in one game, in other words, they are one type of opportunity costs. All games in which an individual participates during his lifetime and all political decision-making are interrelated, although the costs of participating in one game are discounted in relation to other games at different rates. Only if we assume that each game is totally independent of others are intergame costs zero. In empirically observable situations, this is never the case, or at least cannot be observed to be such.¹⁰

If an individual is left out of a coalition, but believes he should have been included, leaders of that coalition may overcompensate in the next decision as a result of guilt feelings, a desire to be fair, or a need to keep the individual predisposed to give his help on some future issue when his support may be needed. As Morton Kaplan has pointed out, one nation does not rationally destroy another nation, because it may need that nation in a later coalition. Cato's proposal for the destruction of Carthage or a Morgenthau plan for Germany may offer emotional satisfactions to the authors, but they are poor politics.

¹⁰. The theoretical statement is found in Norton E. Long, "The Local Community as an Ecology of Games," American Journal of Sociology, 64 (1958), 251-261; some empirical testing is reported in Paul A. Smith, "The Games of Community Politics," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 9 (1965), 37-60.

Even an election is never zero-sum, since losers still commonly participate to some extent in decision making. George Romney, in 1964, paid some costs in relation to his standing with Goldwater supporters and a possible Goldwater victory in order to gain hoped-for payoffs in the 1968 game. Goldwater, likewise, paid some costs for the 1968 game by his 1964 convention attitude toward Republican moderates. Intergame costs must often be estimated and discounted before the game begins (and in anticipation that it will begin). These costs may be discounted to near the zero point, as in 1960 with some John F. Kennedy supporters in consideration of the possibility that Lyndon B. Johnson might, in the near future, become President. A more common example of intergame costs are those involved in vote trading in Congress, where a member surrenders his right to discretion on bill B in order to secure the support of a colleague for bill A.

The serial or processional characteristics of decision making also add to intergame costs. Commonly, they produce pressures for the application of the rule of unanimity, or a close approximation of it. Congressional sub-committees seek as large a vote in favor of reporting out an item as possible in order to strengthen the hand of the winning coalition at the next decision locus, that of the parent committee, which then will tend to follow the same procedure in order to influence the whole house. Congressional leaders, in turn, will sometimes seek as large a majority as possible on a controversial measure in order to reduce the chances of a presidential veto if such a possibility seems to exist. Political party leaders try to maximize the party vote in presidential elections, for the presidential and congressional election games are interrelated and the larger the margin of victory in the former, the larger the size of the party's representation in Congress tends to be.

(4) Division-of-payoffs costs. These are involved in distributing payoffs among members of a winning coalition. The cost is measured by the loss of payoff to each member by the addition of members to the winning coalition. If, for example, the total payoff for members of a seven-member group is fixed, the highest possible payoff to a member of a winning coalition is twenty-five per cent of the total. If a fifth member is added to the winning coalition, the payoff to each individual drops to twenty per cent. Other things being equal, and with a fixed payoff, a minimal coalition is the rational strategy for the participants. In zero-sum games, the size principle applies for this part of the total decision formula. However, even in zero-sum games, the size principle accounts for only a small portion of the total decision concerning coalition size. (We cannot, however, measure the proportions because we do not have the necessary data or know the weightings of the various costs involved.)

¹¹ Morton Kaplan, System and Process in International Politics (New York: John Wiley and Sons, Inc., 1957).

In the empirically more meaningful nonzero-sum situation, however, the amount of individual payoff may increase as the size of the group increases. The opposite of the size principle applies. Mancur Olson, an economist, has argued, for example, that "any group seeking an inclusive collective good is not in a zero-sum situation since the benefit payoff by definition increases in amount as more join the group, and as more of the collective good is provided."12 His point is probably applicable in forming coalitions among nuclear powers to agree upon prohibiting nuclear-bomb testing. He believes it applies for many other types of decision making, too. Such groups as the American Medical Association and labor organizations, within the limits of candidates they consider eligible, seek to maximize rather than minimize their membership in order to increase payoffs. The larger and stronger labor associations become, the larger the payoff for each member. The same is true of any international diplomatic agreement or any agreement among members of a confederation.

(5) Dissonance costs. These are the costs of conflict and disagreement within the winning coalition that result from the fact that no two persons are ever in perfect agreement with one another and, therefore, the larger the group, the more internal discord that group will experience. Any faction wishing to form a coalition with others in order to control a group will experience greater internal conflicts as the size of the proposed coalition increases. Whenever

TABLE 1. COALITIONAL DISSONANCE COSTS

Proposition

A controlling non-minimal coalition has a goal consonance less than that of a controlling minimal coalition.

Let

m = a minimal coalition

C = goal consonance (level of interpersonal agreement)

n=a potential member of a coalition, that is, a member of a committee or other small group

$$C_m(n_x n_y) < C_m$$

Proof:

Assuming (1) goal consonance (C) among any two persons in a coalition is imperfect, e.g., $Cna \times Cnb < 1$; and assuming (2) the following interpersonal goal consonance relationships:

n	1	2	3	4	5
1	_	.98	.70	.97	.50
2	.98		.89	.99	.60
3	.70	.89		.98	.30
4	.97	.99	.91	•	.20
5	.50	.60	.30	.20

The index of $C = (n_a n_b) \times (n_a n_c) \times (n_b n_c) \cdot \cdot \cdot$.

A winning coalition in a five-man committee must have at least three members (a majority).

Coalition	Index of C
1 (1, 2, 3)	.611
2(1,2,3,4)	.534
3(2,3,4)	.802
4(2,3,4,5)	.289
5(1,3,4)	.618
*6 (1, 2, 4)	.941
7(1, 2, 5)	.294
8 (1, 3, 4, 5)	.019
9(2,3,4,5)	.289
10 (1, 2, 3, 5)	.055
11 (1, 2, 3, 4, 5)	.008

NOTE: Not all 3-person coalitions involving n_5 are calculated. He is the most atypical member of the committee. No non-unanimous winning coalition would include him.

controlling coalitions seek to minimize their size, their behavior may be motivated not necessarily so much by a concern for maximizing individual payoffs from the coalition as by a desire to minimize decision costs of dissonance within the controlling group. Thus, in Table 1, ns might be a member of the Communist Party of the United States or of the John Birch Society. He would not be included in any winning coalition, except possibly only after all other possibilities have been exhausted In 1966, the German Christian Democrats accepted the Socialists as members of the government coalition despite high dissonance costs, apparently as the only way to remain in the winning coalition themselves. Maverick members of Congress are commonly excluded from many winning coalitions because of dissonance costs. (In fact, they usually exclude themselves, to avoid overt rejection.)

¹² Mancur Olson, Jr., The Logic of Collective Action (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1965).

^{*} Optimal coalition.

(6) Inertia costs. These are the costs involved in changing existing coalition patterns. William Gamson, a sociologist, in his study of coalition formation at national nominating conventions, notes that once a coalition is formed, it tends to persist.13 Inertia costs may outweigh others in determining the size of a winning coalition or they may be the marginal costs that matter. Dissolving a coalition may involve more costs than maintaining an existing coalition that may not be minimal in size or in internal dissonance. (In Table 1, Coalition Three, if already in existence, may be preferred over the more harmonious Coalition Six because of the costs involved in ousting member n3 in order to add member n1.) In other words, where inertia is a factor, a coalition that would be inefficiently large or small if inertia equaled zero, may become the actual winning coalition.

(7) Pressure-of-time costs. These are the costs involved because longitudinal factors are involved in coalition building. Time costs are often related to other costs, but are not identical with them. In some cases, the convenience of taking the most available person rather than waiting for the otherwise most appropriate person may also help reduce, say, information and inertia costs, although it may increase other costs, say, dissonance costs.

The pressures of time may introduce costs that are more important than other costs. A factional leader may be faced with having to build a winning coalition by a certain hour on a certain day. Simply getting such a group together, no matter what intergame or other costs must be paid may be the overwhelming consideration. Time costs, furthermore, increase as the decision process proceeds. The nearer to a resolution of a problem a group has progressed, the harder it is to effect a change in its direction.¹⁴

¹³ William A. Gamson, "Coalition Formation at Presidential Nominating Conventions," American Journal of Sociology, 68 (1962), 157-171.

¹⁴ James D. Barber, Power in Committees (Chicago: Rand McNally & Company, 1966), pp. 62-66.

Opportunity costs are also a type of time cost, for an individual has only a certain amount of time available to him. His decision to participate in building a coalition relative to subject A may prevent him from participating relative to subject B, in which he is also interested.

Time costs are also involved in the fact that all past and future games involve intergame costs that must be discounted for present value in the current game. The more recent the past game and its claims or the closer the future game, the more important are these costs.

(8) Persuasion costs. These are the costs of bringing a reluctant member of a group into a winning coalition. Persuasion may be difficult because the individual to be persuaded lacks information that would help convince him of the advantage of joining a coalition, or psychological factors may make him reluctant to accept responsibility costs, or he may see intergame costs as being too high (perhaps because he sees the potential payoff in some other game as being much more valuable than do other members of the coalition), or he may psychologically be unwilling to pay the dissonance costs of being a member of the winning coalition. Persuasion costs certainly vary according to the point at which a member is called upon to make a decision or voluntarily decides to do so. If he is called upon to make the marginal choice that will create a majority, his power is relatively great, but persuasion costs may be high. Once a majority is reached, persuasion costs of other members of the group decline sharply, however. In many cases, it may be that persuasion costs are problems of overcoming ideological commitment. Glendon Schubert, in examining Supreme Court decisions, has noted the difficulty involved in seeking to bring members at the ideological extremes together in the same coalition.15 Persuasion costs in convincing ideological extremists to enter into a coalition led by nonextremists are always higher than are those for capturing individuals near the ideological center. It is probable that persuasion costs increase disproportionately as ideology becomes increasingly deviant.

II. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

We have argued that decision costs are the major factors to be observed in the empirical study of coalition formation. We conclude that the size principle as developed by Riker is of rather limited explanatory power for such purposes. His argument is that if all other items are assumed to be constant, the size principle will prevail in zero-sum situations. We believe this does not always hold even when Riker's conditions are met, for they assume that the purpose for which a coalition is to be built is to divide resources, to win the spoils. But we have indicated that in many cases involving coalition building, no direct psychological or economic payoffs may exist and even when they do, other decision costs may outweigh the desire to win them.

¹⁵ Glendon A. Schubert, Quantitative Analysis of Judicial Behavior (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1959).

The zero-sum assumption seems especially inappropriate. There is probably never a simple winner or loser in any political game. A contestant who fails to win a presidential nomination may be named Secretary of State after the election. A consolation prize is not equal to the first prize, but having played the game and "lost" may also have been the marginal factor that gave the player the stillimportant win in the second game. A Congressman who fails to muster a necessary majority vote from a committee in order to have reported out a bill he introduced and considers important, knows that he may well have gained support or good will that may help him succeed at a later time. Furthermore, his having made the effort will have communicated information to the committee members and will have introduced a certain amount of tension and pressure upon members which will have a cumulative effect the next time the matter is raised. And every baseball player knows that no decision by the umpire is completely zero-sum: he may lose one close call, but the umpire will probably tend to give him the benefit of the doubt the next time.

Riker's formulation also assumes a static game and a static payoff. He attempts to avoid the resulting problem by considering all payoffs in future games or in games involving utilities other than the winning of political power as side payments. But this is defining the zero-sum condition out of existence. In considering utilities, all utilities in past, present, and future games must be considered (discounted for present value and future probability) as part of the game. Otherwise to speak of zero-sum conditions is meaningless.

In cases of empirical observation, it is rarely true that members of a coalition are interchangeable—that is, that all count as of equal value because each has a vote. As Thomas Schelling has pointed out, the participants in bargaining do make a difference in the result.¹⁶

16 Thomas C. Schelling, The Strategy of Con-

Pavoffs to a coalition will depend upon who is in it. The winning coalition in the United States Senate in 1919 to defeat the Treaty of Versailles might have made much less impact on history if it had not included a man of the political skill and personal prestige of Henry Cabot Lodge; a coalition to seize control of a political-party organization may depend for its success more upon the resources brought to the coalition by its members than the number of persons involved. The critical question in coalition formation may, in any given case, be on the willingness of the participants to commit resources and on the skills of the participants in reaching their goals. Five skillful men may well out maneuver eight clumsy or naive men. In a formal vote, a numerical majority is needed, of course, but the effective coalition may actually consist of less than a majority. A few members may count upon their ability to secure the needed additional votes through log-rolling (side payments), by status gained from seniority, intimidation, or through some other attribute, and thus may gain the necessary support at low cost from those who have less interest, incentive, information, or ability. Alternatively, the leaders may assume that a sufficient number of persons to create a formal majority will go along with aggressive, confident leaders who seem to have a plausible plan because no other reasonable alternative appears to exist.

The problem of coalition payoff determination is complex: Being in a winning coalition is not necessarily in itself an indication of winning. Interpersonal valuation of utilities varies. A naive person or one simply lacking in sufficient information may cast a vote along with that of the dominant coalition, but may receive no payoff because no commitment, direct or implied, had ever been made to him. Or an individual may be drawn into a coalition that wins a particular office or other payoff, but the payoff may not be the one the individual wants. When conservative Republicans selected Theodore Roosevelt for the Vice-Presidency in 1900, they did so in the belief that they had forestalled his presidential ambitions, and Roosevelt himself moaned his fears of having "shot my bolt."

In conclusion, we have argued that the precise membership in the winning coalition in any group must be determined by an algebraic summation of at least eight decision costs and that these costs are determined by various economic and psychological factors existing in the political setting. In this first approximation, we have not isolated the various factors. They overlap to some extent and present knowledge has not enabled us to make even rough estimates of the weight to be assigned to each of the factors, but like all algebraic equations, each of the components may potentially have either a positive or a negative sign. Because many variables are involved, no one will necessarily be dominant. A winning coalition of minimal size is not necessarily the one that costs participants the least and winning marginally is not always to be preferred to winning by a unanimous or other supra-minimal vote.

flict (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1960).

In the absence of necessary empirical data, it is not possible to answer such questions as to whether a particular sub-committee will seek to apply the unanimity principle or the size principle in its deliberations, or which members of a group (if any) are indispensable for a winning coalition. The answers will depend in part upon the given case or issue before the sub-committee, but even information concerning the instance would be only a beginning in an attempt to answer the questions. We believe, however, that the concept of decision-making costs is useful in our efforts to explain the process of coalition formation.

THE MALEVOLENT LEADER: POLITICAL SOCIALIZATION IN AN AMERICAN SUB-CULTURE*

DEAN JAROS, HERBERT HIRSCH, FREDERIC J. FLERON, JR. University of Kentucky

Perhaps the most dramatic finding of recent research on the political socialization of children is that youngsters appear to be overwhelmingly favorably disposed toward political objects which cross their vision. Officers and institutions of government are regarded as benevolent, worthy, competent, serving and powerful. The implications of such findings are striking indeed. Childhood political dispositions may represent the roots of later patriotism; we may be observing the building of basic regime-level supportive values at a very young age.²

These findings are by no means new; in fact, they might be classified as part of the conventional wisdom of the discipline. Moreover, they are extremely well documented, and the study of childhood political socialization has advanced to consider far more than basic regime-level norms. Despite all this, however, there are still many empirical questions to be asked about such norms. Perhaps the recent assertion that the political scientist's model of socialization is "static and homogeneous" is

- * The data on which this paper is based were collected under Contract #693 between the University of Kentucky Research Foundation and the Office of Economic Opportunity.
- 1 Robert D. Hess and David Easton, "The Child's Changing Image of the President," Public Opinion Quarterly, 14 (Winter, 1960), 632-642; Fred I. Greenstein, Children and Politics (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1965), pp. 27-54; Robert D. Hess and Judith V. Tourney, "The Development of Basic Attitudes Toward Government and Citizenship During the Elementary School Years: Part I," (Cooperative Research Project No. 1078; University of Chicago, 1965), pp. 102-105; Dean Jaros, "Children's Orientations Toward the President: Some Additional Theoretical Considerations and Data," Journal of Politics, 29 (May, 1967), 368-387.
- ² David Easton and Robert D. Hess, "The Child's Political World," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 6 (August, 1962), 243; Greenstein, op. cit., 53.
- ³ Roberta S. Sigel, "Political Socialization: Some Reactions on Current Approaches and Conceptualizations," (Paper presented at the 1966 Annual Meeting of the American Political particularly apropos here. Consider two closely related characteristics of the appropriate literature: 1) the "positive image" which children have about politics and political figures has been synthesized from data gathered largely in the United States and to some extent in urban, industrialized communities within the United States; and 2) empirical explanation of the favorable disposition which children manifest has not progressed very far. Though there may be hypotheses about how children get this way, there has been little systematic testing of the relationships between variables.

There is some danger that the major findings may be essentially "culture bound." There are few data on the political values of children in other countries or even in rural, racial, or ethnic subcultures within the United States. Moreover, what evidence there is hints at important cross-cultural variations in political learning, less positive images may characterize other cultures. Political socialization is the process by which the child learns about the political culture in which he lives. The content of what is socialized may well differ from culture to culture or from sub-culture to subculture.

The failure to explain children's positive orientations toward politics may be a function of the cultural problem. If the great majority of children in one culture manifest a glowing image, variance in disposition is not prominent, and empirical explanation in terms of accounting for variance may not suggest itself as a crucial task; also it may be quite difficult. In order to explain children's political images, one has to have a distribution of affect; there have to be some relatively negative images to come Science Association, New York, Sept. 6-10, 1966), p. 14.

- ⁴ The Chicago area, New Haven, and Detroit provided the research environments for some of the studies cited in Note 1.
- ⁵ Robert D. Hess, "The Socialization of Attitudes Toward Political Authority: Some Cross-National Comparisons," International Social Science Journal, 14 (No. 4, 1963), 542–559.
- ⁶ Gabriel A. Almond and G. Bingham Powell, Jr., Comparative Politics: A Developmental Approach (Boston: Little, Erown, and Co., 1966), pp. 23-24.

by. Research into children's political views in other cultures or sub-cultures may provide us with such negative images. But even if it does not generate the necessary data to conduct explanatory analysis, it would lessen the culture bound nature of findings in political socialization.

This paper attempts to realize these desiderata through a study of childhood socialization in the Appalachian region of eastern Kentucky. Appalachia may be classified as a subculture within the United States for at least two reasons. First, the poverty and isolation of the region impose characteristics that differentiate it from most other areas in the country. Secondly and relatedly, many cultural norms of Appalachia differ radically from those considered to be standard middle-class imperatives.⁸

I. TWO EXPLANATIONS OF CHILDREN'S POLITICAL AUTHORITY ORIENTATIONS

There are several relatively untested hypotheses about the sources of the positive notions children are observed to hold toward the political. Many of them prominently involve the family as a socializing agent. Because of the intriguing nature of family-related variables in Appalachia, the region provides an excellent context in which to investigate these assertions.

Among these explanations is the view that the family directly transmits positive values about government and politics to the child while shielding him from stimuli which have negative connotations, such as stories of political corruption, expedient bargaining, etc. In short, the family directly indoctrinates the child as to the benevolent nature of political authority, to view the political world in essentially the same terms as characterize the parents' generally supportive outlook on the political regime. In Appalachia, in contrast to

- ⁷ Michael Argyle and Peter Delin, "Non-Universal Laws of Socialization," *Human Rela*tions, 18 (February, 1965), 77–86.
- ⁸ Several analyses contributory to this assertion are: Virgil C. Jones, The Hatfields and the McCoys (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1948); Jack E. Weller, Yesterday's People (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1965); Harry M. Caudill, Night Comes to the Cumberlands (Boston: Little, Bowrn and Co., 1963).
- ⁹ Greenstein, op. cit., pp. 45-46; Easton and Hess, Midwest Journal of Political Science, 6 (November, 1962), 229-235.
 - 10 Herbert Hyman, Political Socialization (Glen-most of the rest of the United States, there is a great deal of overt, anti-government sentiment in the adult population. Rejection of and hostility toward political authority, especially federal authority, has long characterized the region. It is very difficult to believe that here parents could transmit positive images of regime symbols to their children. In fact, "... the civic instruction which goes on incidental to normal activities in the family," suggested as a likely cause of children's favorable affect, would in Appalachia be a source of political cynicism.

Secondly, we might take the thesis that the family is an important socializing agent because the child's experiences with his immediate authority figures (parents) are somehow projected to include more remote agencies, including the political. The father, perceived as providing and benevolent, supposedly becomes the prototypical authority figure. 13 For the child, the regime becomes "the family writ large,"14 especially sacred as its image benefits from the emotional kind of bond that exists between parent and child. In Appalachia, there is a high degree of family disruption. The father may well not live at home. Far from providing a glowing prototype of authority, he may be a pitifully inadequate figure, unemployed or absent, not providing for his family, deserving of (and receiving) scorn.15 If the coe, Ill.: Free Press, 1959), Chapter 4; Leonard W. Doob, Patriotism and Nationalism (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964), pp. 119-126.

11 Weller, pp. 33-56, 163; Also Thomas R. Ford (ed). The Southern Appalachian Region: A Survey (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1960), pp. 12-15. These may characterize the entire American South. Indeed, some basic socialization data from the South could be most interestingly compared with that gathered elsewhere. But apart from South-wide considerations, there are historical reasons why one would expect such values to be especially strong in Appalachia.

- 12 Greenstein, op. cit., p. 44.
- ¹³ Harold D. Lasswell, Power and Personality (New York: Viking Press, 1962), pp. 156-159; Sebastian DeGrazia, The Political Community (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), pp. 11-21; James C. Davies, "The Family's Role in Political Socialization," Annals, 361 (September, 1965), 10-19.
- ¹⁴ Easton and Hess, Midwest Journal of Political Science, 6 (November, 1962), 242-243.
- ¹⁵ The effects of widespread unemployment in the coal industry and other economic malaises

Appalachian child generalizes the father figure or the family authority structure to the political, he is not very likely to be generalizing a positive configuration.¹⁶

II. METHOD

Data were gathered from a nearly complete enumeration (N=2,432) of rural public school children in grades 5-12 in Knox County, Kentucky during March, 1967. Paper-and-pencil questionnaires were administered in classrooms in connection with an evaluation of a Community Action Program of the Office of Economic Opportunity. This paper is based on the responses of a random sample of 305 of these subjects.¹⁷ are well known. Because they are unable to provide, men reportedly invent physical disabilities or contrive "abandonments" of their dependents in order to qualify their families for public assistance. Such men become ciphers: Weller, op. cit., pp. 76-78; Ford, op. cit., pp. 245-256. In addition to anecdotal accounts of such situations, there are some hard data which are consistent with these assertions. The great proportion of Appalachian men who are not in the labor force (23% in Knox County, site of the present study, as opposed to 11% in the U.S. as a whole) plus a high unemployment rate (11% in Knox County) suggests a large number of non-providing fathers (Source: U.S. Census of Population, 1960). A high incidence of incomplete families can also be confirmed. Fully 22% of the Appalachian children sampled for the present study reported father-absence, while only 12% of the Survey Research Center's national sample of high-school seniors are from fatherless homes. The authors wish to thank Richard Niemi for the last datum.

16 At this point, it should be noted that these two general hypotheses do not exhaust the list of suggested socialization processes. In fact, some observers stress the efficacy of altogether different agencies, for example the public school: Hess and Tourney, op. cit., pp. 193-200. But even with this emphasis, such observers believe that some political values are implanted in youth by their parents, namely, those which "insure the stability of basic institutions" (p. 191). This is a reference to what we have called "regime level" values, which are the sole topic of this paper. At least for socialization to this kind of political affect, testing of family-related hypotheses is of undoubted importance. See M. Kent Jennings and Richard Niemi, "Family Structure and the Transmission of Political Values," (Paper presented at the 1966 annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, New York, Sept. 6-10, 1966).

¹⁷ A few schools, not accessible by road, did

Affect toward political authority was measured in two ways: through reports of images of the President, 18 and through "political cynicism" scale scores. 19 Images of the President were used because this figure apparently occupies a key position in the development of both cognitions of and affect toward the regime. 20 The Presidency provides an introduction; notions first held toward this role are probably subsequently generalized to other political institutions and to the entity of government itself. 21 The specific instrumentation is that developed by Hess and Easton. 22

By contrast, political cynicism, "rather than referring to specific political issues and actors ... is a basic orientation toward political actors and activity. It presumably pervades all not participate in the study. The cost of including them would have been very high and the returns realized very small. These schools had a total enrollment of less than fifty and a somewhat smaller number than this in grades five through eight. The questionnaire was administered by regular classroom teachers who had been instructed in its use. Every attempt was made, however, to convince the subjects that despite the context, they were not being tested. Teachers were asked explicitly to communicate this notion. This mode of administration probably produced fewer invalid responses than exposing the subjects to a non-indigenous investigator who would have aroused suspicion.

Knox County was chosen as the site for this study because it to some extent typifies Appalachia. That is, it is isolated, rural, and poor. No air or rail passenger transportation is available and only one U.S. highway crosses the county. Knox county has an annual per capita income of $501 as compared with $2223 for the U.S. as a whole. It is 84% rural while the nation is only 30%. (Source: U.S. Census of Population, 1960).

18 For commentary on images of the President, see Fred I. Greenstein, "More on Children's Images of the President," Public Opinion Quarterly, 25 (Winter, 1961), 648-654.

¹⁹ For remarks on political cynicism, see Robert E. Agger, Marshall N. Goldstein, and Stanley A. Pearl, "Political Cynicism: Measurements and Meaning," Journal of Politics, 23 (August, 1961), 477–506.

²⁰ Fred I. Greenstein, "The Benevolent Leader: Children's Images of Political Authority," this Review, 54 (December, 1960), 936; Easton and Hess, Midwest Journal of Political Science, 6, 241.

21 Greenstein, Children and Politics, p. 54.

²² Hess and Easton, Public Opinion Quarterly, 14, 639.

encounters with political objects."²³ In short, political cynicism relates to a basic, general evaluative posture toward politics. Though perhaps a developmental descendant of images of the President, this variable represents far less specifically focussed regime-level affect. The specific instrumentation is the political cynicism scale developed by Jennings and Niemi.²⁴

In addition to desiring variables important in the introduction of children to politics and ones which seem to encapsulate a more generalized and developed kind of regime-level affect, we chose these measures because of the fact that they have generated reliable data. We wished to take advantage of direct replicative possibilities.

Unfortunately, no direct information about the political values of the parents of our sample is presently available.25 Though the aggregate view of political institutions and personalities held by Appalachian adults is reportedly less positive than those of other Americans, the only personal level data available are childreported. Our indicators of parental affect toward political authority consist of two familyrelated items from Easton and Dennis' scale of political efficacy.26 Two problems arise in using these items as indicators of parental values. First, the index in question was designed to measure a variable in children, not adults. However, the items "inquire about the relationship between government and the child's family. . . . " The index is not regarded as a direct reflector of children's efficacy per se. In fact, it shows how a child has come to "view expected relationships between adult members of the system and the authorities" as well as tapping a "nascent attitude" of the child himself.27 Youngsters tend to evaluate political objects in child-related terms.28 Clearly this index does not measure that kind of dynamic. The items can be interpreted as a report on family (adult) orientations to political authorities, Indeed, such a report, involving the perception of children, may be a more significant independent variable than the actual values of the parents. A person's values, of course, can have no direct impact on the behavior of another individual. Any effect must be mediated through the influencee's cognitive and evaluative processes.

Secondly, given this, can items which tap efficacy be said to reveal anything about "positive" or supportive regime-level attitudes among adults? Though it is easy to imagine people highly enthusiastic about their political authority without possessing "citizen competence," it is probable that in democratic societies sense of efficacy is in fact related to general affect toward political authority. Inefficacious feelings are related to alienation and what has been called "political negativism." These are the very antithesis of supportive dispositions. Moreover, recent scholarship has specifically considered efficacy to be a crucial variable in regime-level supports.

The nature of the family authority structure is measured by 1) "father image" items analogous to Hess and Easton's Presidential image items²² and 2) noting whether the father in fact lives at home.³³

III. THE APPALACHIAN CHILD'S AFFECT TOWARD THE POLITICAL

Our subjects' evaluations of political authority have a very prominent feature: they are dramatically less positive than those rendered by children in previously reported research.

Table 1 describes the affective responses of the Appalachian children to the President and directly compares them to Hess and Easton's findings on Chicago-area children. Though our sample includes children from fifth through twelfth grades and Hess and Easton's from second through eighth, it is possible to make comparisons using only the fifth through eighth

- ²⁹ Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1963), Chapter 6.
- ³⁰ John E. Horton and Wayne Thompson, "Powerlessness and Political Negativism," American Journal of Sociology, 67 (March, 1962), 435-493.
 - 21 Easton and Dennis, op.cit.
- ⁸² Hess and Easton, Public Opinion Quarterly, 14, 635-642.
- ³⁸ On father-absence see: David B. Lynn and William L. Sawrey, "The Effects of Father-Absence on Norwegian Boys and Girls," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 59 (September, 1959), 258-262; George R. Bach, "Father-Fantasises and Father-Typing in Father-Separated Children," Child Development, 17 (March, 1946), 63-80.

²³ Jennings and Niemi, op. cit., p. 13.

²⁴ Ibid., footnote 30.

²⁵ The evaluation of the Community Action Program in Knox County involved the solicitation of data from a sample of adults. These data can be arranged with those on youngsters to form parent-child pairs. These data are being exploited by Herbert Hirsch.

²⁶ David Easton and Jack Dennis, "The Child's Acquisition of Regime Norms: Political Efficacy," this Review, 61 (March, 1967), 25–38.

²⁷ Ibid., p. 32.

²⁸ Greenstein, this Review, 54, 938-939.

TABLE 1. FIFTH-EIGHTH GRADE CHILDREN'S EVALUATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT

	Response	Knox County data*	Chicago area data†	Smirnov two-sample test
1) View of how hard the	harder	35%	77%
President works compared with most men.	as hard	24	21
	less hard	41	3	D = .42, p < .001
	Total	100 % (N = 128)	101% (N = 214)
2) View of the honesty of	more honest	23 %	57%
the President compared with most men.	as honest	50	42
	less honest	27	1	D = .34, p < .001
	Total	100% (N = 133)	100% $(\bar{N} = 214)$
3) View of the President's liking for people as com-	like most everybody	50%	61%
pared with most men.	likes as many as most	28	37	D = .20, p < .01
	doesn't like as many	22	2
	Total	100% (N = 125)	100% ($\tilde{N} = 214$)
4) View of the President's	knows more	45%	82% knowledge compared with most men.	knows about the same	33	16	D = .37, p < .001
	knows less	22	. 2
	Total	100% (N = 124)	100% $(N = 212)$
5) View of the President	best in world	6%	11%	·····
as a person.	a good person	68	82
	not a good person	26	8	D = .19, p < .01
	Total	100% (N = 139)	101% (N = 211)

^{*} The Knox County subjects were provided with a "don't know" option apparently not available to their Chicago-area counterparts. This was done to avoid forcing the subjects, who are relatively undeveloped intellectually, to choose among possibly meaningless options. As expected, choice of the don't know alternative was very frequent. For each of the five items above, approximately 30% responded that they did not know. In the interest of comparability, the data do not include these responses. Reported non-responses (about 1%) to items 4 and 5 are likewise excluded from the Chicago-area data.

[†] These data are compiled from those reported in Hess and Easton, op. cit., pp. 636-637.

grade portions of both. It is clear that for all five President-evaluation items, the distribution of responses of the Knox County youngsters is significantly less favorable than that of the Hess and Easton sample. In fact, when compared against "most men," the President does not do particularly well. In aggregate, he is not a paramount figure, and there are a fair number of youngsters (about a fourth) that express overtly unfavorable reactions to him.

Hess and Easton, it will be recalled, note that age greatly affects the nature of their sample's responses. Generally, they showed that the very favorable view that the very young have of the President's personal qualities (Items 2, 3, and 5) declines with increasing age, while high regard for his performance capabilities is maintained or even increased as the child grows older.34 The diminution of "personal" portions of the image is not interpreted as a disillusionment with authority, but as in-, creasing realism. The maintenance of the rolefilling portions is regarded as most relevant to future adult behavior, translating into respect for political institutions. 35 In short, the changes of children's images of the President with age present a very fortunate configuration considered from the standpoint of loyalty and support for the regime. The Knox County data, bleak to begin with, show few such encouraging tendencies when controls are imposed for age. Even extending the analysis to the older portions of the sample does little to effect change. To be sure, the personal portions of the image appear slightly less positive than those of younger children. Only 31% of the high-school seniors think the President likes almost everybody, while 31% think he likes fewer people than most men; no twelfth graders think the President is the best person in the world, while 31% think he is not a good person. But overall, the picture is static. Tau correlations between age and positive responses to the three personal image items range between .02 and .04 and are not significant.

In those portions of the image supposedly more crucial to adult regime-level behavior, there is no increase in favorable response to the President. However, a decline in the proportion of overtly unfavorable reactions does produce a significant relationship between age and positiveness on the item dealing with how hard the President works ($\tau_c = .14$, p < .05) and a perceptible though not significant relationship between age and positiveness on the item dealing with the President's knowledge ($\tau_c = .09$, p > .05). At best, these are modest trends. There is relatively little ground for saying, "The President is increasingly seen as a person whose abilities are appropriate to the demands of his office. . . . "36"

Furthermore, the very high incidence of "don't knows" does not decline significantly with age (see note to Table 1). Such a high rate was to be expected of a deprived, unsophisticated population. But the fact that it remains high even among high-school seniors (mean non-response rate is 27%) provides further evidence that, politically speaking, nothing is happening to these Appalachian youth as they mature, They certainly do not appear to be developing into adults devoted to symbols of extant political authority.

Finally, the stark contrast of these data to those on other American children is heightened when the consideration of social class is introduced. It has often been observed that lower class children have a greater propensity to idealize political figures.37 This may well be due to the fact that such children are less politicized than their middle-class counterparts. Being less developed and less knowledgeable, they have developed fewer critical faculties and continue to exhibit the "immature" response of excessive deference. It is impossible to determine whether the same class phenomenon operates within Appalachia, for the sample as a whole is overwhelmingly lower class.38 But because of their lower class position relative to the rest of the country, Knox County youngsters generally should be highly idealizing. The data, of course, reveal the diametric opposite. It is clear that Appalachia constitutes a distinct sub-culture, one in which there are operative variables sufficiently powerful to prevent the occurrence of what is by now expected as a matter of course.

²⁴ Hess and Easton, Public Opinion Quarterly, 14, 635-642.

³⁵ Ibid.

³⁶ Ibid., p. 639.

³⁷ See for example, Greenstein, Children and Politics, Chapter 5.

³⁸ No reliable information on social class could be secured from the children themselves. Information on occupation or estimated family income simply was not given by these youngsters. Assigning class on the basis of the neighborhood in which individuals live, as Greenstein did, requires that virtually every subject be placed in the lowest social stratum. These rural residents are universally poor. Only 9% of the county's families have incomes over $6,000, and these are almost entirely to be found in the "urban" county seat, which was not sampled. (Source: U.S. Census of Population 1960).

TABLE 2. POLITICAL CYNICISM SCORES*

		Knox County data (whole sample)	Knox County data (high school only)	SRC national sample	Smirnov two sample test
most cynical	6	8%	26%	5%	Knox County data (whole sample)
	5	11	22	3	and SRC national sample, $D = .16$,
	4	19	11	13	p < .001
	3	19	20	37	Knox County data (High school
	2	23	15	25	only) and SRC national sample, least cynical	1	21	6	17	D = .40, p < .001
Total		101% N=305	100% N=54	100% N=1869

^{*} It has been assumed that the Political Cyricism Scale generated Guttman scalar patterns in the Knox County Data as it did in the SRC National Sample. To compensate for the possible invalidity of this assumption, the items were conservatively dichotomized and conservatively scored. Only choice of the most cynical available alternative was considered a cynical response. Failure of a respondent to choose the most cynical alternative for whatever reason, including non-response, resulted in the recording of a non-cynical item score.

Table 2 describes the more generalized affect manifested in political cynicism. The scores of the Knox County youngsters are compared to those of the Survey Research Center's nation-wide sample of high school seniors.³⁹

The greater cynicism of the sub-culture sample is evident. Since the Survey Research Center deals only with high school students, perhaps comparisons should be made only with the high school portion (grades 10-12) of the Knox County sample. Though this portion is significantly more cynical, the small number of subjects in it perhaps recommends use of the entire sample. One might think that the introduction of younger respondents would depress cynicism scores (age and cynicism are reportedly positively related in children),40 but this does not happen to any great degree. In any event, even the entire 5-12 grade Knox County sample is significantly more cynical than the SRC twelfth graders. The implication of this, of course, is that in Appalachia, unlike the rest of the United States, there is relatively little change in cynicism with maturation. That this is the case is revealed by the nonsignificant $\tau_c = -.02$ between school grade and political cynicism score. Early in life these children appear to become relatively cynical and they stay that way.

Thus, though at this point it remains unexplained, there is no doubt that Appalachian children manifest far less favorable political affect than do their counterparts elsewhere in the United States. Regardless of the index in question, the responses of our sample stand in sharp contrast to other research. Just as supportive dispositions in citizens have been asserted to have early roots, so may the Appalachians' often-noted rejection of political authority germinate during early years. Moreover, also in some contrast to findings of other research, the affective orientations of these subjects does not change greatly with increasing age. These negative images are relatively static. This nonvariant affect suggests the operation of a pervasive socialization agent early in the lives of these children.41 This in turn suggests the desirability of examining the causal efficacy of variables related to an early 41 This non-variance, a preliminary look at our data suggests, may be due to the homogeneity and isolation of the area. Family, peer groups, schools and other possible agents of socialization indigenous to the region probably manifest substantially the same configuration of values. Thus if families transmit an initial set of political notions to children, subsequent exposure to school, peers, etc., is likely to reinforce rather than change values. The remote location of the county probably insulates it from electronic or printed media and other external stimuli. Any value implications at variance with indigenous norms which such sources might transmit are thus prevented from having a widespread effect on maturing children.

³⁹ Jennings and Niemi, op. cit., p. 15.

⁴⁰ Greenstein, Children and Politics, pp. 39-40.

TABLE 3. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAMILY POLITICAL ORIENTATION AND CHILD'S POLITICAL AFFECT

Family political orientation item	Child's political affect measure	те	Significance
"I don't think people in the government care much what people like my family think"*	view of how hard President works	.23	p < .001 people like my lamily onlik	view of the honesty of the President	.06	p > .05
	view of the President's liking for people	.18	p < .001
	view of the President's knowledge	.01	p > .05
e.	view of the President as a person	.05	p > .05
	political cynicism scale	20	p < .001
"My family doesn't have any say about what the govern- ment does."*	view of how hard President works	.10	p>.05
mont does.	view of the honesty of the President	.06	p>.05
	view of the President's liking for people	.07	p>.05
	view of the President's knowledge	.13	p < .01
	view of the President as a person	.06	p > .05
	political cynicism scale	13	p < .01

^{*} Disagreement scored as positive value.

agent frequently assumed to be an important socializer: the family. It is to this task that we now turn.

IV. THE FAMILY AS TRANSMITTER OF SPECIFIC POLITICAL VALUES

What kinds of general explanatory propositions about the socialization process are consistent with these data? If parents typically transmit the substantive content of their values about government to their children, then the very negative political affect observed among Appalachian youngsters should be related to similar assessments on the part of their mothers and fathers.⁴² Evidence on this cal authority. However, responses to the family political value items, when the distribution is dichotomized, reveal about equal number of agreements (negative dispositions) and disagreements (positive dispositions). Following each item is the percentage of respondents expressing agreement:

⁴² In the absence of additional data, it is difficult to show empirically that the parents of this sample have negative dispositions toward politican be gained by examining the nature of the relationship between our family political orientation items and childrens' political affect (Table 3).

"I don't think people in the government care much about what people like my family think," 58%;

"My family doesn't have any say about what the government does," 43%.

The authors are fully aware of the precarious nature of the family value measures. Their

Since responses to family political orientation items were recorded in terms of degree of agreement (from disagree very much to agree very much), they constitute ordinal variables as do the presidential image and cynicism measures. The evidence on the amount of impact they have on these child political affect variables, however, is mixed. Some fairly substantial taus are accompanied by others approaching zero. But it is interesting to note where the significant relationships occur. Primarily, they involve Presidential competence items and the cynicism scale. These may be the most important dependent variables. Several scholars have observed that childhood evaluations of the personal qualities of the President, which here do not relate to family political orientation, are "less functionally relevant" to future adult behavior than are assessments of role-filling capabilities. As stated above, these observers express no alarm at the decline with age of evaluations of Presidential benevolence. Similarly, the fact that parental values do not seem to influence them may not be great evidence about the inefficacy of familial values in conditioning important childhood orientations.

If political cynicism represents a more developed kind of evaluation, it is significant that it appears to depend upon these parental variables. Regarded as an important encapsulator of youthful political affect, this construct may be a crucial indicator whose antecedents should be known.

Family political values, then, appear to have some effect on children's political affect. Especially given the fact that the affective variables in question appear to be among the most significant, the direct transmission hypothesis takes on some credibility. This suggests the desirability of more detailed investigations of the content of intra-familial political communication.

V. THE FAMILY AS PROTOTYPICAL AUTHORITY STRUCTURE

A totally different kind of dynamic is implied in the notion of relations with the family as a model for political affect. It is not, how-proxy nature makes them somewhat suspect. The data they generate are displayed, however, because they are suggestive and because they indicate the kind of research which, in the authors' opinions, should be performed more often. In subsequent publications based on the Appalachian data, direct information on parental values and children's perceptions thereof will be available (See note 25).

ever, incompatible with the notion that the family transmits specific value content to the young. It is entirely possible that both processes operate simultaneously. Moreover, since the relationships are relatively small, our data on value transmission fair y demand that additional explanatory tacks be taken. Table 4 demonstrates the effects of father-image and integrity of the family on Appalachian children's political orientations. Again, evidence is somewhat mixed. Three father image items⁴³ are placed against their Presidential-image parallels and against cynicism. There is almost a complete lack of relationship. Not only does the "great overlap of the images of father and President"44 fail to appear among these children, but the more generalized political affect measured by cynicism does not depend on how they see their fathers. In short, there is no evidence at all to support the hypothesis that evaluations of family authority figures are directly projected to remote, political ones.

If the father image hypothesis thus suffers, another dynamic by which the family might serve as a model for regime affect fares even worse. The presence or absence of the father might be thought to have political consequences for children. A fatherless home is disrupted and generally thought to have negative implications. Children might project their negative evaluations of such homes onto the political authority.45 If this were the case, children from fatherless homes should have less positive views. Table 4 revels exactly the opposite. There are generally low to moderate, but significant, negative relationships between having a father at home and evaluating the President in a favorable light. Fatherless children are more positive toward the political. How can this remarkable result be interpreted? One could argue that there is a cathartic process at work; that there is some sort of psychic necessity (possibly anxiety-related) to regard authority as benign. Perhaps unfortunate home life heightens this need which is then manifested in positive evaluations of the political.46

⁴³ The father image items are analogous to the Presidential image items used by Hess and Easton. Though there are five Presidential image items, only three father image analogues are used because of objection to asking respondents to evaluate their fathers' honesty or diligence at work.

44 Hess and Easton, Public Opinion Quarterly, 14, 640.

45 Davies, op. cit., 13-15.

⁴⁸ Judith V. Tourney, The Child's Idealization of Authority (unpublished M.A. thesis, University of Chicago, 1962).

•	TABLE 4.	RELATIONSHIP	BETWEEN	FAMILY	AUTHORITY	CHARACTERISTICS AND CHILD'S POLITICAL AFFECT
	· .	·ANI	CHILD'S I	POLITICA	L AFFECT

Family authority characteristics	Child's political affect	$ au_c$	Significance
View of father's liking for people	view of President's liking for people	.05 .	p>.05
	political cynicism	07	p > .05
View of father's knowledge	view of President's knowledge	.02	p > .05
;	political cynicism	.02	p > .05
View of father as a person	view of President as a person	.05	p > .05
	political cynicism	03	p > .05
	view of how hard President works	08	p < .05
	view of President's honesty	09	p < .05
Father living with family*	view of President's liking of people	12	p < .05
	view of President's knowledge	23	p < .001
•	view of President as a person	.00	p > .05
	political cynicism	.05	p > .05

^{*} This is a dichotomous variable—either the father lives at home or he does not. However, since father's living at home constitutes a less disrupted family authority structure, we continue to apply ordinal statistics.

This does not seem likely, for as we have just seen, specific negative evaluations of their fathers are not related to childrens' positive political orientations.

Rather than resulting in negative authority orientations, father-absence could interfere with the transfer of specific political value content from family to child. A major agent in the transfer process may be absent. Though mixed, there is some evidence in previous research of "male political dominance" in the family. Fathers may be particularly important communicators of political values.⁴⁷ Children ⁴⁷ Greenstein, Children and Politics, p. 119; Kenneth P. Langton, The Political Socialization Process: The Case of Secondary School Students in Jamaica, (Unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Oregon, 1965), p. 119. On the other hand, male dominance in the political learning of the young fails to appear in some research: Hyman, Political Socialization, pp. 83-89; Eleanor from fatherless homes become more dependent upon their mothers. But mothers are not typically strong political cue-givers. Hence, the typical adult political values of Appalachia will not be so effectively transmitted in the fatherless home. These adult values supposedly involve relatively unfavorable assessments of political authority. The fatherless child escapes close contacts with these values and emerges more positively disposed toward political authority. When this agent is absent, perhaps the media, or other agents bearing more favorable cues, assume a more prominent role in the socialization process.

This interpretation, which of course returns us to the transmission-of-specific-values hypothesis, is strongly supported by additional

E. Maccoby, Richard E. Matthews, and Anton S. Morton, "Youth and Political Change," Public Opinion Quarterly, 18 (Spring, 1954), 23-39

TABLE 5. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAMILY POLITICAL ORIENTATION AND CHILD'S POLITICAL AFFICT, WITH FATHEL-PRESENCE CONTROLLED

Family political orientation item	Child's political affect measure	Father-present children $ au_c$	Father-absent children $ au_{m{o}}$	Significance of the difference
I don't think people in the government care much what	view of how hard the President works	.25	.12	p < .001 people like my family think*	view of honesty of the President	.12	10	p < .001
	view of President's liking for people	.23	.04	p < .001
	view of President's knowledge	.00	.06	p < .01†
	view of President as a person	.10	11	p < .001
	political cynicism scale	18	26	p < .01†
My family doesn't have any say about what the govern-	view of how hard the President works	.17	15	p < .001
ment does*	view of honesty of the President	.10	06	p < .001
	view of President's liking for people	.17	23	p < .001
	view of President's knowledge	.17	.03	p < .001
	view of President as a person	06	.08	p < .001†
	political cynicism	13	16	$p < .05\dagger$

^{*} Disagreement scored as positive value.

analysis of the data. First, it is clear that there is no unknown process operating to produce more positive adult political values in fatherless families. Fatherless and two-parent families are identical in this regard (tau's between father at home and family political value items are -.03 and .00). Though the starting point is the same, it is also clear that the transmission process is greatly attenuated in fatherless homes. This can be seen by imposing a control for father-presence on the relationship between family political orientation and child's political affect (Table 5). The data for fatherpresent children are very similar to the collapsed data shown in Table 3, except that the relationship between family value and child affect is generally somewhat stronger. But for father-absent children, the relationship generally declines and in several cases is actually reversed. Not only can the fatherless family not promulgate its political values, but it seems to leave its children very vulnerable to the socialization of other agents, agents with rather different (more positive) values. To be sure, child political cynicism, which is related to family political values, does not appear to be governed by these considerations. Other family-related roots may affect this variable—perhaps those which relate to generalized cynicism.

VI. CONCLUSION

Children in the relatively poor, rural Appalachian region of the United States are dramatically less favorably inclined toward political objects than are their counterparts in other portions of the nation. Moreover, the image which these children have does not appear to develop with age in the fashion observed for others; there is no indication that a process conducive to the development of political support is operative in Appalachia. Here, children's views appear to be relatively static. These findings have two implications. First, they point to the possibility that the oftenemphasized highly positive character of children's views of politics may be a culturally bound phenomenon. One should exercise much caution in accepting such views as a universal norm. Secondly, the occurrence of such divergent findings underscores the desirability of explaining children's political orientations.

[†] Relationship not in predicted direction.

Since, at the sub-cultural level, these atypical findings are paralleled by 1) atypical adult (parent) political values, and 2) atypical family structure, two broad hypotheses involving the effect of family-related variables on children's political affect were tested. Examination of the hypothesis that parents directly transmit the content of their political values to their children produced some confirming evidence. Reported parental values showed moderate relationship to certain aspects of children's political affect. This was especially true of the competence items in Presidential images (supposedly the most important for subsequent behavior) and of political cynicism, a more generalized kind of system affect.

The thesis which posits the family as prototypical authority structure fares less well, however. There is no support at all for the notion that affect toward the father is extended to remote, political authority. Relationships between specific aspects of children's father images and parallel components of Presidential images are not significant. Nor is there evidence that disrupted family structure, measured by father-absence, contributes to negative political evaluations. In fact, father-absence is associated with more favorable political valuations in Appalachian children! This remarkable result is interpreted as supporting the first hypothesis regarding the direct transfer of value-content from family to child. Where the father is absent, an agent communicating the predominantly negative adult political values to youngsters is lost. This notion seems the more plausible when it is observed that there is a marked relationship between family political values and child political affect among father-present families, but no such relationship—if anything a slight negative gradient—among father-absent families.

Thus, of the two broad hypotheses posited at the outset, our data support the notion of direct value transfer, while leading us to doubt that the family is an effective authority prototype. Though these findings are offered as significant in and of themselves—they certainly suggest the importance of closer examination of parent-child political communication processes in the understanding of regime-level values—there are other implications. The explanatory relationships presented here are of relatively modest magnitudes. The small amount of variance in children's political affect which is explained here by the family suggests that we should search for other agents of socialization, or for other dynamics which may operate within the family. A preliminary view of other of the Knox County data suggests that there may be conditions under which other, less personal agents assume a great role. Fortunately, the move toward cross-cultural and explanatory analysis of childhood socialization will proceed and these and related questions will be joined.48

⁴⁸ The forthcoming doctoral dissertation by Herbert Hirsch explores other socialization agents at greater length.

COMMUNICATIONS

If, As Lipsitz Thinks, Political Science Is To Save Our Souls, God Help Us!

TO THE EDITOR:

Professor Lipsitz raises a number of questions. I suppose the main ones are: "Did I say it?", "If so, is it true?", and "If true, is it a good thing or a bad thing or a mixed thing or what?"

I did say it, and I think I meant it. But I do not think I was suggesting anything as extreme as Professor Lipsitz finds. I was suggesting that what has been said about many of the new nations might apply to a society as "secular" as the United States—i.e., that politics might function as religion. The parallels between the kind of ceremony Shils and Young observed at the British coronation and the ceremony associated with the assassination crisis were quite striking, and triggered off a comparison between the functions of such ceremonies and the functions of religious ceremonies that Durkheim noted—the reinforcement of collective identity and the re-dedication to continuity. The parallel can be drawn without assuming identity with political religions in the new states or with political religions like Naziism. A similarity of pattern does not imply a similarity in intensity.

The purpose of the essay was not to argue that such commitments are good or bad. Its purpose was to use the information available on the reaction to the assassination to suggest that such a religious-type commitment existed in the United States and to relate it to political stability.

Is the argument true? I agree with Lipsitz that a lot of evidence supports the general point of view, but that we need more precise definitions and better data.

But what really concerns Lipsitz is the normative question of whether this is a good or bad thing. This represents a different realm of discourse. The argument about the overlap between political and religious beliefs does imply that religious-type beliefs in the political sphere foster acquiescence to political authority and, in turn, stability. That's good if you like stability; bad if you don't. Whether you do or not depends upon your evaluation of the present state of society, and your estimate as to the type of change that would be instituted if there were less acquiescence and more questioning.

On such a question different people will have different views. If my essay implied to Lipsitz that I believe that unquestioning acquiescence because of belief in the sanctity of state authority is a good thing, I am sorry. I am not sure it was appropriate or necessary in that earlier essay to "raise a normative eyebrow," but in reply to Lipsitz it seems proper to raise two. There are times when political authority becomes unworthy of support and should be challenged, and in the spring of 1968 many serious men in the United States are considering such a challenge. But though such challenges may be appropriate now, I would part company with Lipsitz in that I both welcome them and fear them. And here the argument about political acquiescence is relevant. The great tragedy of American politics in 1968—a tragedy centered around Vietnam-is that it has led to a fundamental loss of respect for and confidence in the government among significant groups. One can understand why this has happened and may, indeed, welcome it. But if this implies a long-run decline in fundamental loyalty, the future of the American political community becomes problematic and we may be in for a great time of troubles.

And it is in relation to this normative question that Lipsitz and Thoreau are inadequate guides. To stress acquiescence and stability as the only normative goals is, I believe, a mistake, but it is equally mistaken to stress only the opposite. Thoreau makes an eloquent case for civil disobedience but he ignores the complexity of the problem and one cannot take him fully seriously. He argues for a fully rational and voluntaristic obedience to law. "The only obligation which I have a right to assume." he wrote in "Civil Disobedience," "is to do at any time what I think right." And he says he has no obligation to "the societies which I have never signed in to." But surely Lipsitz knows —though he hardly mentions—the arguments as to why this just will not work. In part it cannot work because citizens are not able and would be foolish to try constantly to "examine the costs, and compare it with the advantages" of their relationships with the government (as Lipsitz quotes Thomas Paine as telling us to do). And a stable system of rule cannot be built on such voluntaristic and easily changeable commitments.

And because Thoreau and Lipsitz look at one side of the argument, they ignore the tough normative question of when civil disobedience is justified: in what kind of society and in response to what kind of governmental action? Does one refuse cooperation with any governmental act of which one disapproves or only with certain severely important acts? Perhaps one can hope for the following from religious type commitments to political authorities: that they will prevent civil disobedience from being triggered off by trivial governmental acts (as can happen when people have no "primitive" respect for authorities whatsoever) but they will not be so intensely held that they prevent protest in cases where governmental activities are felt to be major evils. This would all call for some "balance." This I admit is a vague notion and Lipsitz does not like it, but I am not sure how one can avoid considering it.

All this goes beyond social science, but Lipsitz is writing normative theory (which I do not think I was, though he clearly thinks so). Social science can, however, be useful in dealing with normative questions of this sort. This requires, however, that one deal with more complex relationships than Lipsitz considers. Political quiescence—to use Edelman's term—has different consequences depending upon who is quiescent. And we have some data that would help predict the consequences of greater political activity and involvement of different groups. One is not sure whether Lipsitz wants everyone involved; or just intellectuals, or liberals, or who. One gets the impression that Lipsitz is looking for people committed to peace and to a reduction of abuse of freedom by the state. But he cannot dismiss as easily as he does the information from recent polls which suggest that many quiescent Americans (that is, people who are politically inactive and relatively passive before government authority and who only speak up when questioned by a pollster) are committed to more bombing in Vietnam and believe by two to one that people should not have the right to demonstrate against the Vietnam war.1 Would heightened political consciousness among such a group maximize the values Lipsitz wants? He answers that it is just "state worship" that leads to such attitudes; but the quiescence that goes with deference to political authority keeps such attitudes from being converted into actual pressures for repression of others.

In any case, these are speculations to place against Lipsitz's speculations. He clearly does not like the normative implications of my article. If the implications are the ones he draws from it, neither do I. But I think things are more complicated than he does. I find unquestioned commitment normatively inadequate but pure voluntarism inadequate as well. And whether he likes some implications of my essay or not, the question remains as to whether what I wrote is true. I believe that the kind of commitment I described exists and has a relationship to stability—whether we like it or not. But I am not sure-my original essay was speculative also. Indeed, the essay he cites was written in reply to a request to speculate on the political implications of the more precise studies of reaction to the Kennedy Assassination—which may be the reason (though hardly the excuse) for some of its vagueness. Like Lipsitz, I would welcome some hard and careful research on the subject.

¹ See S. M. Lipset, "The President, the Polls and Vietnam," Transaction (September/October 1966), p. 24; and the Harris Poll of December 1967 (New York Times, December 19, 1967).

SIDNEY VERBA

Stanford University

TO THE EDITOR:

Sidney Verba seems to maintain that the "not-too-intense" political religion we have is somehow what we need. He doesn't seem to take seriously the question of how such a "religion" affects democratic life. Why? The issue is not whether Sidney Verba was personally endorsing unthinking obedience to political authority. The issue is whether we want to ignore the implications of our work. In Verba's case, that work has implications which can only make one complacent about the quality of our political life.

What we need, as Almond and Verba once told us, is "a more sober and informed appreciation of the nature and complexity of the problems of democratization." As a first step toward such soberness, we must stop talking about contemporary America (or England) as if it were the very model of democratic life, or, worse yet, of the good life. We need standards which transcend existing systems unless we are prepared to defend the idea that what already exists exhausts all possibilities of democratization or happiness. Sidney Verba suggests in his reply that activating the undemocratic in America might be disastrous, yet only a few years ago he argued that this same America (with these same "dangerous" people) could serve as something of a model for democracy. Wasn't it short-sighted not to have taken up these undemocratic attitudes as a deep and unfinished problem of our politics? It is exactly this sort of short-sightedness that grows out of theories that build only on what "is" right at the moment, ignoring both history and the tasks of the future. It is here (among other places) that normative and empirical matters get confused. A theory of under-development that included exacting norms of democratization and paid careful attention to human needs, would help us maintain a perspective on these questions. I tried to move into the thinly populated neighborhood of such a theory in the conclusion of my article where I suggested a few steps that might enhance democracy in the United States.

Still, the question of who is activated is a real one. The possibility that dissent may be suppressed or become self-destructive is real. Yet here the possibilities are more complicated than Verba suggests. There is no one-to-one correspondence between attitudes and behavior. Involving more Americans in discussion or action concerning the war in Vietnam does not necessarily mean suppression of civil liberties. Also, without mass involvement, suppression can still occur. Why doesn't Verba mention the kind of public atmosphere created by HUAC, General Hershey and those leading public figures who find dissent close to treason? Is that also mass behavior? You would think that in this generation the civil rights movement would have demonstrated that mass movements are not necessarily threats to such democracy as we have.

Verba says he welcomes as well as fears challenges to authority. That might be sensible, depending on the kind of challenge and the nature of the authority. Yet his emphasis is on the fear, not the welcome. He looks with dread toward the possibility of a decline in fundamental loyalty, yet he makes no mention of how present challenges may make new policies possible, and may in fact alter the nature of national loyalty for the better. Why? Beyond this, isn't it reasonable to fear also the acquiesence that allows authority to go unchallenged when challenge is needed? The issues involved are not only democracy and stability, but survival and human decency itself. Why, ten years ago, were so few political scientists telling us that what we needed was a dose of humane and democratic instability?

Lewis Lipsitz
University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill

TO THE EDITOR:

The authors of "Socio-economic Variables and Voting for the Radical Left: Chile, 1952" (December, 1967) stated their study concerned alienation. Yet, it is difficult to understand how the vote for Socialist candidate Salvador Allende can be interpreted as an expression of alienation, no matter how sophisticated the indices. Since their formation in the early 20th century the Socialist and Communist parties of Chile have performed demand aggregation and recruitment functions and have otherwise abided by the norms and laws of a constitutional democracy. Certainly they have not attempted to organize the masses for revolution and the destruction of the "Old Regime."

The vote for Allende well may have reflected dissatisfaction with the policies of the preceding Radical governments, but not alienation. Voting for an "out-party" in U.S. politics usually is interpreted as dissatisfaction with the "in-party," not rejection of the system. Why should that differ in Chile? If there was an alienated vote in 1952, that more probably was the vote for the winner, Carlos Ibanez del Campo who, during his campaign, stated that the traditional parties of Chile were responsible for the existing social-economic problems. He presented himself as a charismatic leader who would rule for the "good of the country" as he perceived that good unrestricted by political parties. Indeed, many people believed, and perhaps even hoped, that Ibanez, if elected, would establish his second dictatorship of the century.

SANDRA POWELL

The American University

TO THE EDITOR:

Deane E. Neubauer's "Some Conditions of Democracy," this Review, (1967), pp. 1002–1009, claims to demonstrate that after a certain level of socio-economic development has been achieved, continued development is irrelevant to democratic institutions.

Neubauer erroneously ascribes to me the view that political development (which he interprets as meaning democratization) will increase indefinitely with further gains in social and economic development. It is obvious from the context of the 1963 article² cited by Neubauer that I was not speaking of democratization, but of "the degree of complexity and specialization of its [a nation's] national political institutions." The Political Development Index (PDI) used in that article was not intended as a measure of democracy.

A Political Representativeness Index (PRI) appeared in 1965.³ In 1967 I added electoral participation to the index, an addition which slightly increases the correlations between the various political indices and socio-economic indicators.⁴

So, even with the post-1963 measurement changes, the general results of the 1963 analysis remain. For the sake of argument, let us assume that I was talking about democratization, rather than political development, in the

- ¹ My thanks to Benjamin Walter for his comments on this rejoinder, and for bringing Neubauer's article to my attention.
- ² Phillips Cutright, "National Political Development: Its Measurement and Social Correlates," in Nelson W. Polsby, Robert A. Dentler and Paul A. Smith (eds.), Politics and Social Life (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1963), pp. 569–582.
- ³ Phillips Cutright, "Political Structure, Economic Development and National Social Security Programs," American Journal of Sociology, 70 (1965), 537-543.
- ⁴ Phillips Cutright and James A. Wiley, "Modernization and Political Representation: 1927-1966," mimeo, Nashville, Tennessee, Department of Sociology, Vanderbilt University, 1967.

1963 article. Is Neubauer's interpretation of my position correct? My major prediction about change in the level of democratization and changes on modernization applied to one type of nation: a nation at a low level of modernization and a low level of democratization was expected to increase its level of democratization, if its modernization program was successful.

Neubauer seems shocked to find that "very many" (actually 9 of 76) nations received maximum "democratization" scores, but varied in their level of modernization. Yet, I am sure that he would not be surprised to learn that in spite of the correlation between height (independent variable) and weight (dependent variable), men with identical weights will vary in height. Dissatisfaction with the measurement "ceiling" stimulated Professor Neubauer to develop an index of Democratic Performance.

Neubauer wants to test two hypotheses. The first is that nations with maximum PDI scores and varying socio-economic development will fail to show a positive correlation between socio-economic development and his Democratic Performance measure. This hypothesis is not tested since his sample (sic) contains countries with widely different PDI scores.

The second hypothesis is that beyond a certain threshold of socio-economic development, variation in socio-economic development will be unrelated to PDI or to his Democratic Performance measure. He does not test this hypothesis either, since his "sample" of nations contains only democratic countries, rather than all nations which exceed a certain (unspecified) threshold.

It is important to inspect Neubauer's measure of Democratic Performance in some detail, since he believes it measures degrees of democratization that are not discriminated by my PDI or PRI measures. The Democratic Performance index is composed of four equally weighted (summed T-scored) indicators. The first, "the percent of the adult population eligible to vote," starts off well, but ends up ignoring: (1) whether an election actually occurred; (2) whether the representatives thus elected were seated; and (3) whether the parliament continued over its full term. Obviously the indicator has no general value, except when it is applied to completely stable democraciesnearly all of which have universal suffrage.

The second indicator, "equality of representation," is insufficiently explained. One cannot perform the operations necessary to reproduce it. It appears that a pure proportional representation system would get the highest number of points on this indicator. I wonder whether Neubauer really believes that proportional representation is superior to single-member, winner-take-all methods of electing party candidates to legislative assemblies.

The third indicator, "information equality," purports to measure the extent to which "all individuals (in the nation) possess identical information about the alternatives." Lacking adequate data, Neubauer takes per capita newspaper circulation in the capital city and multiplies this figure by the number of "independently" owned newspapers. One can calculate that the same score can be achieved in spite of huge differences in newspaper circulation, so long as the number of newspapers varies. As a yardstick for what is going on in the nation, the measure is inadequate; only one of every 250 Americans lives in Washington. D.C. Finally, giving this indicator 25 percent of the weight in the composite index contaminates the dependent variable, since all of the measures of socio-economic development are related to newspaper circulation.

The fourth component is "competition." This indicator awards points to nations that have frequent changes in party leadership, and also rewards nations in which the vote was close. But a population satisfied with its leadership may overwhelmingly return a party to power in free and competitive elections for many years. Or a population may reject the leadership of a party in power and replace it with a competitive party by an overwhelming margin. In either case the nation loses points—it is lower on "competition" (hence, Democratic Performance) than a nation repeatedly voting parties in and out of office by narrow margins.

The sources of information for all indicators are unlisted, the procedures are unspecified, and even the time period used is not mentioned. This makes replication impossible.

Neubauer's "sample" of 23 "democratic" nations omits Australia, Iceland, Panama, Costa Rica, and Uruguay, but includes Mexico, Venezuela and India. Clearly some criterion other than my PDI index was used in selecting "democratic" nations, but Neubauer never gets around to saying exactly what that criterion contained.

Neubauer states that "Once above this (socio-economic) threshold, however, the degree to which a country will 'maximize' certain forms of democratic practice is no longer a function of continued socio-economic development." (p. 1007) Since he included India in his sample, one would expect that to test this hypothesis he would have taken all nations at and above India's development level, and seen whether a correlation exists between political and socio-economic scores.

His test is laid out in his Table 1. The test is labeled a "multiple regression analysis." It is the only multiple regression analysis I have ever seen that consists entirely of zero order correlation coefficients. With the exception of the modest correlation between the communications index and Democratic Performance (a a result of index contamination), all correlations with the dependent variable are near zero. The author then concludes that there is no relation between socio-economic development and Democratic Performance. But, given our examination of his measure, one may wonder whether Professor Neubauer has simply created a very difficult technique to apply random numbers to nations.

Although different Democratic Performance scores are assigned to nations, the lack of correlation with socio-economic indicators is meaningless (setting aside the sample design problem) unless the validity of the indicator is proven. Neubauer simply assumes that differences in his measure really mean what he wants them to mean. Since Professor Neubauer failed to deal with this problem, I have correlated the Democratic Performance measure against five measures to which a reasonable man might think it should be related. For example, we might expect that nation high on Democratic Performance would also be relatively high on redistribution of income through social security programs, but the rank correlation (N=22) of Democratic Performance with the percent of GNP allocated to social security programs is only .15, controlling years of program experience, voting participation, and percent of labor force in industry.5 Nor is the measure related to income inequality; the rank correlation (N=20) is positive .19, controlling economic development, PRI, and percent of labor force in agriculture.6 Perhaps governments high on Democratic Performance will be relatively more active in securing opportunities for occupational mobility; the rank correlation, (N=11) with the degree to which sons have inherited their fathers' occupation is positive .11. Are governments high on Democratic Performance more attentive than low performance governments in fulfilling the educational needs of their populations? The rank correlation with the percent of children 5-19 enrolled in school⁸ (N=17) is only .11. Finally, the rank correlation with a measure of "freedom of the press" (N=18) is .13. One concludes that the measure's pragmatic validity has yet to be established.

⁵ See Phillips Cutright, "Income Redistribution: A Cross National Analysis," Social Forces, 46 (1967), 180-190 for data and analysis. The number of cases used in this and the following correlations vary according to the availability of data, unless other reasons for omitting cases are given.

⁶ See Phillips Cutright, "Inequality: A Cross National Analysis," American Sociological Review, 32 (1967), 562-578 for data and analysis.

⁷ See Phillips Cutright, "Occupational Inheritance: A Cross National Analysis," American Journal of Sociology, 73 (1968), for data and analysis.

Failure to establish the validity of the Democratic Performance measure leads one to the reasonable conclusion that assigning more than one nation to the same PRI score may not be such a sin after all. For if we cannot explain differences in important nation-wide consequences presumably related to democratization (with Neubauer's measure), this may simply mean that the causes of variation in these consequences do not result from minor variations in electoral participation, party competition, etc., but are a function of other social and economic characteristics that are independent of the political system, as Neu-

* Data from Bruce M. Russett, et al., World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964, pp. 218-219. Nations below $400 per capita GNP (data from Russett, et al., op. cit. pp. 155-156) are omitted to put a rough control on economic development; Switzerland and Norway are also dropped since only public school enrollments in these nations were available to Russett.

⁹ Data from Ralph L. Lowenstein, "World Press Freedom, 1966", Columbia, Missouri: School of Journalism, University of Missouri at Columbia, May. 1967, Table III. In this report nations are grouped into eight levels on a measure of "Press Freedom." Removal of the four nations in Neubauer's list with less than $400 per capita GNP (plus Luxemburg, for which no Press Freedom rating was listed) leaves 18 cases. Ten of the 18 nations are in the upper level and the remaining eight are in the second level on Press Freedom. Within the upper level a rank order is available for the top six nations. (See "A Charter Subscription Offering for Interplay: A Review of European/American Affairs," New York: Interplay, 200 West 57th Street (January, 1968), p. 1. A common rank was assigned to the remaining four nations in the upper level and a common rank assigned to the eight nations in the second level. For example, Great Britain and France were ranked first and second on Democratic Performance by Neubauer, but were both in the second level (assigned a rank of 14.5) on Press Freedom: Switzerland is ranked in 18th position on Democratic Performance, but is second on Press Freedom.

bauer defines it.

PHILLIPS CUTRIGHT

Vanderbilt University

TO THE EDITOR:

Almost ten years ago in what is now a wellknown article, S. M. Lipset presented some not very firm evidence illustrating the already familiar proposition that democratic government is more likely to occur in plentiful than wanting environments. More recently Phillips Cutright has attempted to validate the proposition that political development, per se, comes about as a result of nations achieving specified levels of social and economic development. In short, Lipset asserts that democracy, as a discrete variable, requires some social and economic requisites, while Cutright suggests that political development is a continuous variable and is related linearly with social and economic development.

The argument and evidence provided by Cutright to support this assertion have confused the whole question of democratic requisites. The empirical support for Cutright's assertion rests upon the relatively high correlations which he obtains between selected socio-economic indices and an index of "national political development" using aggregate statistical data for 76 countries. It is this result which leads him to conclude that there is a strong, linear relationship between social-economic development and "national political development." This index, however, is constructed such that scores are assigned to countries on the basis of whether they sustain institutional patterns which are explicitly democratic in nature, and thus his index is in fact not about political development at all, but simply a more "sophisticated" version of Lipset's explicitly "democratic" measure. Inspection of Cutright's data indicates that all democratic countries cluster toward the high end. One may conclude, then, from his own evidence, that Cutright is asserting a direct and positive relationship between socio-economic development and democratic development, not political development, and that, unfortunately, he is misinterpreting the meaning of his own "findings."

The purpose of my article, "Some Conditions of Democracy," this Review, 1967, pp. 1002–1009, is to demonstrate this. Since the primary question now involves the relation, if any, between social-economic factors and democracy, it will be useful to examine the variation in these variables for those countries for which an index of democraticness is sensible. The following procedures were therefore employed: (a) I select 23 democratic countries from among those for which Cutright reported data. (b) I obtain the same social-economic data for these countries used by Cutright. (c) I create an index of democracy with which to measure the relative degree of democracy of the 23 countries. This last step is necessary because Cutright's index does not permit one to differentiate degrees of democratic behavior among manifestly democratic countries (he insists he is measuring all political development, not merely democrationess). The results indicate an almost zero order correlation between Cutright's and Lipset's social-economic indices and my index of democratic performance. I therefore conclude that the model proposed by Cutright is overly simple as a political development model (since such a model "should" include things besides democratic institutional features) and incorrect as a democratic development model.

I fail to find these issues addressed in his above remarks. Let me, however, offer two comments. He attempts to make much of the fact that I have not in this one article tied my index of democratic development to some set of output variables which he thinks should be related to it. He asserts that the low rank-order correlations between my index and his selected variables impeach the validity of my argument. On its face this line of reasoning can only lead to nonsense. Besides the obvious fact that I am under no obligation to provide evidence supporting his hypothetical assertations, his argument, were it to be believed, would strip all researchers of the right and obligation to report evidence disconfirming hypotheses no matter how important such disconfirmations. Indeed, the logic of his argument precludes the rationale of establishing null hypotheses for testing. To the specific point raised, however, Cutright unfortunately is not aware of the fact that I have long been interested in the relationship between democratic performance and system output characteristics and have discovered some interesting relationships of my own which will be contained in a forthcoming report.

Finally, it is understandable that Cutright should be defensive about his index of political development—he has a great deal invested in it. It has appeared in one guise or another in at least four publications (conveniently cited in his above comment), sporting minor modifications to suit the immediate purpose of the day. My remarks concerning its utility as a measuring device stand. It measures the institutionalization of liberal democracy, not "the degree of complexity and specialization of its (a nation's) national political institutions." In short, it does not suit the purpose to which it has been put.

DEANE E. NEUBAUER University of California, Irvine

BOOK REVIEWS AND NOTES

BOOK REVIEWS
Holt and Turner, The Political Basis of Economic Development: An Exploration In Comparative Political Analysis. Gerald A. Weiner	583
Weiner, Party Building in a New Nation: The Indian National Congress. AVERY LEISERSON	584
Wainhouse and Associates, International Feace Observation: A History and Forecast. Ross, The United Nations: Peace and Progress. Lincoln P. Bloomfield	586
Ashford, Perspectives of a Moroccan Nationalist. Ashford, Morocco-Tunisia: Politics and Planning. Ashford, National Development and Local Reform: Political Participation in Morocco, Tunisia, and Pakistan. George Lenczowski	587
Barnett, China After Mao. Geoffroy-Dechcume, China Looks at the World. Goldman, Literary Dissent in Communist China. Granqvist, The Red Guard. Roger W. Benjamin.	588
Friedlander, Prelude to Downfall: Hitler and the United States, 1939–1941. O'Neill, The German Army and the Nazi Party, 1933–39. Nyomarkay, Charisma and Factionalism in the Nazi Party. H. P. Sechen	590
Spinelli, The Eurocrats. Ronald Inglehart	593
Young, The Democratic Republicans of New York: The Origins, 1763–1797. Prince, New Jersey's Jeffersonian Republicans: The Genesis of an Early Party Machine. Manning J. Dauer.	594
Blau and Duncan, The American Occupational Structure. M. Kent Jennings	596
Howe, The Garden and the Wilderness: Religion and Government in American Constitutional History. Thomas S. Schrock	597
BOOK NOTES
POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY	599
American Government and Politics	619
Foreign Governments and Comparative Politics.	643
International Politics, Law, and Organization	671

BOOK REVIEWS

The Political Basis of Economic Development:

An Exploration In Comparative Political
Analysis. By Robert T. Holt and John E.
Turner. (Princeton, New Jersey: D. Van
Nostrand & Company, 1966. Pp. iii, 410.
$4.50, paper.)

Robert T. Holt and John E. Turner have written an imaginative book that is a welcome addition to the growing literature on modernization and political development. They reveal a lack of timidity in their usage of comparative analysis, as they rise above the usual procrustean attempts in Political Science at comparative methodology. The main purpose of their exploratory study is to develop hypotheses which can be tested in future studies. As they admit, they want to generate hypotheses and not to test them. Basically, they are presenting a conceptual framework for the analysis of political factors in economic growth, and they develop hypotheses on the role of these at certain stages of economic development. In order to do this, they utilize an adapted structuralfunctional perspective based upon pattern variables developed by Talcott Parsons and his associates. These are: (1) adaptation, (2) goal attainment, (3) pattern maintenance and tension management, and (4) integration. They also borrow some of W. W. Rostow's terminology and use his concept of the stages of economic growth, but they do not employ a Rostowian scheme because of their differences on crucial definitions.

The data in their book is taken from four selected societies, France (1600-1789), Manchu China (1644-1911), Tokugawa Japan (1603-1868), and England (1588-1780). According to Holt and Turner, "shortly after the final dates listed, Japan and England entered upon a period of rapid industrialization, whereas France and China lagged behind in varying degrees. If there are significant political requirements for economic growth, and if there was no obvious technological factor at work, we should expect to find certain political similarities between France and China, on the one hand, that distinguish them from Japan and England on the other." It was the patterns of similarity and difference that supposedly provided them with the basis for developing hypotheses concerning the political requirements for economic growth at the stage of early industrialization. Even though the empirical analysis of their four cases was not presented to provide an explanation of why England and Japan managed to achieve take-off quickly after the techniques of industrial production became known, while France and China lagged behind, they did this to a great extent by their excellent handling of the historical data.

A minor flaw that mars Holt and Turner's book is their concern only with domestic political factors that had an influence upon economic growth. They are aware of this problem and dismiss it in their prologue. They realize that there were other factors that were important, such as foreign wars and international involvements, but these lie outside the boundaries of their present interest. I am afraid that in their search for analytical rigor, they sacrifice empirical proof for logical consistency, perhaps, fully knowing that it may well not be epistemologically possible to have both. In two of their cases, Japan and China, domestic political factors that had an influence upon economic growth may be considered secondary compared to the importance of external threats and intervention. In the 19th century, China may have slowly modernized and overcome her national inadequacies had it not been for the depressive and exploitative influences of foreign imperialism. Granted, that the major determinants of China's response lay within Chinese society and not outside it, but if China had not been beaten to her feet by foreign powers, there may have been a greater chance for her to change and modernize. Western imperialism stimulated Japan and the fear of the "White Peril" was a major factor in motivating the samurai elite to bring about many reforms that were responsible for Japan's leap into the industrial age. I think Holt and Turner should have paid more attention to the problem of exogenous forces influencing economic growth even though they do not entirely ignore them. Either way, this is not a major defect and their arguments stand well enough on their

In Chapter 1, Holt and Turner give a critique of what they claim to be the most significant methodological works that are related to their research. According to them, "this critique is focused upon the writings of scholars who have made the most significant contributions to the solution of crucial methodological problems." Though they warn the readers who are not especially interested in methodological issues to begin their reading in Chapter 2, there is still a doubt in my mind as to the value of the first chapter. It would appear to be incidental to the main thrust of the book even though it is a lucid attempt to explicate and criticize some of the major approaches to the study of the process of political development. The short treatment of the Soviet Union from 1930 to 1965 in the Appendix also seems apart from the main thrust of the book even though Holt and Turner include it in order to demonstrate how their conceptual framework might be applied at other stages of economic development. They really do not need the section on the Soviet Union since they accomplish the same purpose in Chapter 6—"The Take-off Stage: Japan and England."

Holt and Turner give a series of controversial and challenging hypotheses in Chapter 7. They not only posit a series of stimulating hypotheses on the impact of the functions of government and the procedures of governing upon economic development, but also make an important methodological contribution in their approach to empirically generated hypotheses. They point out that they consider empirically generated hypotheses that are derived from a very small number of cases to possess three marked weaknesses. (1) There is always a probability that the patterns of similarity and difference which emerge from the analysis are idiosyncratic. (2) The scholar has little notion of the level of generality of the hypotheses. (3) It is difficult to develop a research design which can test such hypotheses and at the same time be useful in the testing of a significant theory. In order to avoid these problems as much as possible they attempt to introduce a special step in the development of their hypotheses. First, they examine the patterns of similarity and difference which emerge from their data and formulate hypotheses that appear to be most consistent with these patterns. Second, they examine these empirically generated hypotheses in relationship to a number of social science theories from which the hypotheses could conceivably have been deduced. Third, they modify the hypotheses so that they are consistent both with the empirical data of the exploratory study and with the theories they have examined. Where they have problems with the complexity of the theoretical argument, the two forms of a given hypothesis are kept distinct by labeling the empirically generated form as the preliminary hypothesis. The hypothesis that has been modified in light of what they consider to be relevant theories in the social sciences and is supposed to be ready for "testing" is designated as the final hypothesis.

In summary, the substance of this book is superb. The authors have done an excellent job, although they could have shortened their book by excluding what I consider to be an overabundance of theorization. They also provide a very comprehensive bibliography that shows the extensiveness of their research. All in all, Holt and Turner have written a book that is certainly a major contribution to the study of the problems of development.

GERALD A. WEINER

Indiana University

Party Building in a New Nation: The Indian National Congress. By Myron Weiner. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967. Pp. viii, 509, $12.50.)

This is Myron Weiner's third volume on Indian politics, rounding out his two earlier studies of the leadership, history and ideological range of all national parties, and how the national regime "manages" the emerging interest-group "infrastructure." The field work for the volume under review was done during 1961-62. The author has steadfastly maintained two only-partly reconcilable objectives (p. 3). He has sought, first, through five intensive case studies at the local-state level in three rural-urban and two primarily urban districts.* to explain "why the Congress party has been relatively successful in winning elections and providing the country with stable government." Second, he has tried to place his work in the context of contemporary development theory in comparative politics "by exploring the conditions under which a modern political organization develops." The latter objective evidently requires a different analytical apparatus than the case studies; at any rate, it turned out to involve no less than an overall appraisal of the impact of the Congress party upon the policy output and structural evolution of the Indian political system. This final report amply confirms Weiner's high status among the well-informed observers and interpreters of Indian society and politics. In overall perspective, however, a fascinating puzzle remains: Why has Weiner apparently been unwilling to join such men as Rajni Kothari, Gopal Krishna, W. H. Morris-Jones and George Rosen, who have ventured to conceptualize "the Congress system," distinct from the party organization of the I.N.C., as the principal agent and vehicle of Indian political development?

* In India the district is the basic common unit of local government and party organization above the village and taluka. It usually contains a dozen or more state assembly districts, two or more parliamentary constituencies, and from one to three million population.

The main body of the book, comprising eighteen chapters, presents case analyses of five differing, local political situations (Calcutta, West Bengal; Madurai, Madras; Belgaum, Mysore; Kaira, Gujarat; Guntur, Andhra Pradesh). Three introductory chapters deal with the methodological and historical aspects of the project; two summarize the author's conclusions concerning Congress' contribution to India's national economic and political development.

In analyzing organization performance at the district level, the author employs an implicit functional approach. He marshalls an impressive array of evidence relating Congress' success to its leaders' unflagging attention, commitment and capacity for: (1) steadily-increasing voter participation, (2) organizational maintenance, (3) open recruitment of "primary" and "active" members, (4) helping individuals from all social strata to satisfy their material needs, mobility aspirations, group (caste, language, religious) identities, and cultural ideals, (5) sharing power with, and accommodating the conflicting demands of traditional and modernizing elites, (6) conciliating and adjusting disputes both within its own ranks and in the community's status and power structure. The materials are relevant, penetrating, always fascinating; but of course case study methods do not produce statistical measures of the relation between party electoral success or failure and variations in voter and elite attitudes with respect to the six variables (see the forthcoming Eldersveld-Marvick study of the Fourth General Elections).

Weiner brings out quite clearly the structural features of Congress party organization that were associated with its success in winning elections and providing stable governments from 1947-57. These were extreme factionalism, reliance upon personal and historical charisma, parochial and particularistic bases of support, constantly shifting coalitions of power, frequent defections from and re-absorptions into the party. But he does not squarely face the problem posed by the question: Were not these institutional characteristics of the party simultaneously both functional and dysfunctional to the successful operation of the political system (let alone nation-building)? In this and in his previous books he has shown how many intellectuals and spiritual leaders (the saintly tradition) have been alienated from Congress. He might have gone much further in demonstrating how these and other features of Congress party politics have produced decisions and policy-making practices that retard modernization and economic development; how they foster and sometimes reward groupism and defection from the party; and above all, how they help to undermine attitudes of willing respect, voluntary collaboration and presumptive legitimacy toward the centralizing, nationalizing institutions of both party and the regime with which Congress is identified.

In the final chapter, obviously written after the 1967 General Elections which (aside from Kerala) first produced widespread evidence of the Congress' declining power to govern at the state level, the author contemplates the inevitability of the party's defeat nationally, but in the same breath he rejects the inevitability of its disintegration. In line with the professed purposes of the study, it would have been enlightening if the author's field studies had enabled him to construct more systematically the shape of the more likely alternatives to Congress party dominance at state and local levels, and if he could have specified the organizational conditions necessary for a developing nation "to establish a balanced relationship between the interests and ambitions of individuals and the goals of the institutions to which they belong" (p. 495). His final theoretical position is scarcely distinguishable from that of those formalists and dialecticians who edify us with the truism that if a political system fails to satisfy its structural-functional requisites it will be replaced by another.

Perhaps because of his and LaPalombara's preoccupation with parties instead of party sustems. Weiner evidently has little use for the "developing" typology of political systems (Shils, Almond-Coleman, Apter, Riggs). We can only infer that he would classify India somewhere between (1) the "participantlibertarian, alternating-majority" system-type of political recruitment and policy formation, and (2) the "reconciliatory-adaptive, coalitional-consensus" type, closer to the latter than the former. He would probably agree that continued postponement of economic performance, plus other internal and external pressures, might result in transforming the Indian polity into a (3) "hegemonic-mobilization, pyramidal, mass-indoctrination" system, and he would presumably join most Indian specialists in doubting that she will swing as far as the (4) "sacred-collectivity, hierarchical, modernizing autocracy."

Party Building In A New Nation greatly advances our understanding of the conditions under which one dominant-party system guided the transition during the first twenty years of post-colonial, independent nation-building. Much remains to be done, however, in clarifying and elaborating our empirical theories of how the dominant-party, reconciliation-coalition system increases or decreases legitimacy and consensus, and, further, in improving our analytical instruments for comparing nations as their politico-economic systems converge or diverge under the pressures of time, international conflict, technological change and unsatisfied human demands.

AVERY LEISERSON

Vanderbilt University

International Peace Observation: A History and Forecast. By DAVID W. WAINHOUSE AND ASSOCIATES. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1966. Pp. xvii, 663. $10.00.)

The United Nations: Peace and Progress. By ALF Ross. (Totowa, New Jersey: The Bedminster Press, 1966. Pp. xi, 443. $8.00.)

International Peace Observation is a solid and uniquely comprehensive examination of a political art invented and put into practice in this epoch. As a source book it fills a gap in the literature and will be a mine of reference for scholars and others for years to come. Its value lies both in its generalities, and in the 70 cases drawn from the experience since 1920 in the League of Nations, the United Nations, and the Organization of American States, as well as several multinational cases outside these formal organizations.

If I may pick one major nit at the outset, by opting for the label "Peace Observation," the authors have, I fear, not necessarily clarified the semantics of what is an already confused lexicon. They define "Peace Observation" as a method "whereby the organized international community initiates a third party intervention as soon as possible in a threatening situation with a view to permitting calmer judgments to allay the potential or actual conflict." This covers far more than observing, patrolling, and reporting. It subsumes much that has in the past been called "Peacekeeping" (which they unaccountably limit to collective acts by "considerable" military forces to bring about a cessation of hostilites). Their definition of "peace observation" also includes other kinds of activities that have in the past paraded under the label of "Pacific Settlement of Disputes." The functions of ascertaining facts and calling for as well as supervising a ceasefire in fact lend themselves to all three rubrics. But it is certainly far too late to quarrel with the authors about this, and we should gracefully accept their idiom while making the best use possible of their splendid research efforts.

Their treatment of cases usefully describes and evaluates international action for each.

They remind us that under the League of Nations, when Great Britain and France were in accord, the League succeeded (for example between 1920 and 1930, except for the Vilna dispute), but after 1930 the presence of other great powers fouled up this harmonious situation. It is helpful to be reminded of some of the useful modalities of pacific settlement under the League of Nations such as the Commissions of Enquiry, and of fact-finding efforts which were able to suggest solutions as well (there were some who would call this "Peacemaking"!). Their findings for the League of Nations successes, while not surprising, are useful: speed in taking up the case was most important, as was the cooperation of the parties, the agreement of great powers, and the quality of observers. My only quarrel with this section is with such extraordinarily guarded statements as: "Whether Facist or Communist governments after 1931 would have permitted their nationals such freedom from government control, or whether such freedom is enjoyed by Soviet officials operating under the United Nations today, is a question of some significance" (p. 11).

Useful data, gathered here on OAS actions, are not usually presented in conjunction with United Nations material. The Inter-American Peace Committee has exercised peace observation functions, the authors tell us, bringing the parties together and suggesting procedures to them (didn't we used to call that "Pacific Settlement of Dispute"?). Written in June 1965, the authors assert "there has never been a peace-keeping operation in Latin America"; it is too bad they did not wait a month or so. Also, it is not clear why the Guatemalan case study is included, since no peace observation was carried out by any international organization. The conclusion is that OAS peace observation machinery is ample, "effective, and useful." But I cannot help feeling that the authors dismiss OAS-type peace observation operations elsewhere—for example Africa—a bit too cavalierly, considering for example the OAU peace observation operation actually conducted in 1964 in the Algerian-Moroccan border dispute. As for the UN, their discussion of cases is comprehensive and generally excellent.

In the last hundred pages the authors look at the future character and role of peace observation arrangements under the UN, including an examination of possible conditions in a disarming or disarmed world. They consider the establishment of a UN peace observation corps and the earmarking of observation units by member states. They examine such practical problems as the selection, training, size, and composition of standing or ad hoc peace observation groups; terms of reference; procedures and methods of activating such an operation under the UN; reports and reporting procedures; and the relation of a peace observation corps to international military peacekeeping operations. An annex contains a detailed plan for organizing and equiping such a corps.

In terms of thoroughness, exhaustive coverage, and sound scholarship, the work in question is of high value. Despite my quarrels with its semantics, I do not choose to be anti-semantic, and salute the authors for a splendid piece of work.

Professor Ross teaches law at the University of Copenhagen. The purpose of his book is the always commendable one of seeking to understand the United Nations as a political phenomenon, and the author succeeds in wisely conjoining realism with idealism. He correctly presupposes that only a Soviet-American rapprochement can save the world. He not so correctly is critical of the United States but not its potential partner, for lack of foresight in this regard.

The book is less a text than a series of essays. It covers the history, functions, membership, and what Mr. Ross calls the "apparatus" of the UN. Unlike some other professors of law, Mr. Ross seems to see clearly the relationship between the development of community and consensus, and the growth of law. In his eagerness to criticize McCarthyism in the United States I found him a little naive concerning the use of the United Nations by the Soviets as an espionage base—a fact that is well established and available on inquiry even in Copenhagen.

The principal problem with this book is that, although it was published in 1966 and was written in early 1965, many of his references are considerably out of date. I could find only one reference in the entire book later than 1962, nothing later than 1961 in most sections, and most of the references date back to the 1950's. Surely American and Western European literature is not that slow in penetrating to Denmark.

Lincoln P. Bloomfield Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Perspectives of a Moroccan Nationalist. By Douglas E. Ashford. (Totowa, New Jersey: The Bedminister Press, 1964. Pp. xiii, 171. $6.00.)

Morocco-Tunisia: Politics and Planning. By Douglas E. Ashford. (Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1965. Pp. xx, 65. $2.75 paper.)

National Development and Local Reform: Political Participation in Morocco, Tunisia, and Pakistan. By Douglas E. Ashford. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. xi, 439. $10.00.)

Professor Ashford's three studies have a common theme in that they all explore problems of nation-building and modernization in recently emancipated ex-colonial Islamic societies. Each, however, deals with a different aspect of development and their geographic coverage is not identical.

In his Perspectives of a Moroccan Nationalist, the earliest of the three studies, the author describes and analyzes the Moroccan Istiglal Party on the basis of an extensive questionnaire circulated among the party members in 1958. The implied assumption of this procedure has been that the Istiglal, as the main political instrument of the Moroccan struggle for independence, should be considered as representative of Moroccan nationalism. The questionnaire was addressed to over 1,200 party secretaries, of whom 337 responded. Of the latter number the replies of those who had more than five omissions and/or partial responses were rejected. As a result, 93 dulyfilled questionnaires served as a basis for this study. The detailed character and careful organization of the questionnaire provided the author with ample material for analysis, thus offsetting the disadvantage of having to deal with a sample representing only one-sixteenth of the party secretaries. No important facet of the secretaries' personal background and service as functionaries of a major organization was neglected. A number of questions addressed themselves to the respondents' attitudes on questions of national and local interest. What emerged was a detailed profile of an important segment of society throwing light on the problems and challenges of the Moroccan polity in transition.

In his brief, comparative monograph on planning in Morocco and Tunisia, the author deals with the often neglected (by economic planners) political aspects of planning. As Bertram M. Gross justly observes in his preface to the study, plan implementation "requires, in addition to economic plans that are technically implementable, institutional change, managerial capacity, and political action." Professor Ashford employs in his discussion of planning two notions borrowed from cultural anthropology, those of "symbolic change" and "ritual change." The first of these represents a change in attitudes, the second a change in behavior. One without another cannot assure success of the planning process. What is needed is the interaction of the two. In the two central chapters the author discusses, first, the political forces in the commitment to planning, and, secondly, participation and the planning effort. His conclusions regarding Morocco tend toward pessimism largely on account of "the capricious political system" which may "prevent adaptation to the needs of planning... and growing political awareness." By contrast, according to the author, Tunisia's "single-party system has shown itself well suited to mobilizing popular opinion and influential groups on behalf of planning." The author warns, however, that "the single party may operate with effectiveness at Tunisia's present stage of development, but it may also be contributing to the social transformation that will make its hegemony more difficult to sustain."

Compared with the two preceding studies, National Development and Local Reform: Political Participation in Morocco, Tunisia, and Pakistan is a major work of comparative politics in which the author focuses on political participation, especially on the local level, as a key to the process of development affecting the totality of an emerging new nation. His inquiry embraces three systems: "the traditional approach of the Moroccan monarchy, the activist solution advocated by the Tunisian singleparty system, and the highly professional view of politics represented by Pakistan." "The burden of inquiry," states the author, "is to elaborate and describe how each government does indeed respond to the developmental challenge." The book is divided into four major sections of varying length. The first contains a thought-provoking discussion of broader issues arising from the quality and intensity of the government's purposeful intervention in the process of modernization. The second, entitled "National Politics and Localized Authority" offers a detailed historical and contemporary review of the Moroccan commune, the Tunisian municipal council, and the Pakistani system of Basic Democracies. The third, devoted to planning and rural development, deals with problems of land reform, public works, education, and administrative reform. The fourth aims at an analysis of the national development and "attitudinal change." In this last section the author further develops some of the themes initially introduced in his monograph on planning in Morocco and Tunisia; namely the conceptual articulation and ideological manifestation with regard to perceptions of national development in the three countries under review. He also distinguishes three periods in the shaping of attitudes: the pre-national, the national, and the postnational. He claims that "in the national phase it is difficult to use institutions to build participation and involvement" inasmuch as, as Tunisia's case illustrates, the main motive force for development is to be found in "a high degree of ideological manifestation." Throughout his study Dr. Ashford lays emphasis on the primacy of politics in the developmental process, a view which today will find considerable consensus as against the earlier oversimplified technoeconomic approaches.

Well organized, combining a wealth of empirical data with the depth of analysis, Dr. Ashford's volume constitutes a significant contribution to the understanding of the problems of modernization in the three selected Islamic countries.

George Lenczowski University of California, Berkeley

China After Mao. By A. DOAK BARNETT. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. 287. $6.00.)

China Looks at the World. By Francois Geoffroy-Dechaume. (New York: Random House, 1967. Pp. 237. $4.95.)

Literary Dissent in Communist China. By MERLE GOLDMAN. (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1967. Pp. xvii, 343. $7.95.)

The Red Guard. By Hans Granqvist. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. ix, 159. $5.95.)

The Geoffroy-Dechaume and Granqvist volumes are relevant for the non-specialist. Barnett's work is also primarily for the non-specialist and teachers of Chinese politics. Merle Goldman has published a serious piece of scholarship. All four books are concerned about various aspects of the Communist Chinese revolution.

Hans Granovist is a Swedish journalist who has twice in the past four years taken trips of two months duration to mainland China. He has woven an account of events leading to the "cultural revolution." The author sets the stage for the "cultural revolution" by discussing the economic and political environment prior to 1966. Though the author's observations add little of substance to our small store of knowledge about Communist China, the reader might profit by reflecting on this latest set of journalistic images brought from the mainland. The author feels, for example, that confidence in the regime had returned by 1964 and that Mao "... had clearly arrived at the point where he was able to launch a new revolutionary tidal wave." Perhaps more startling is the statement, apropos of 1964, that the Chinese in Peking seemed better off materially than the Russians in Moscow. No evidence is offered for these statements. The author is content to put the rise of the Red Guard down to Mao's continuing attempt to legislate equality and achieve a Utopia where no groups are superior to the masses. To reach this conclusion it is assumed that Mao is a "revolutionary romantic," one who is "happier" in times of revolution than periods of peaceful change.

The central theme of Geoffroy-Dechaume's China Looks at the World is Chinese culture or civilization and inter-societal images about China and the West. The author is a French diplomat with extensive training and experience in Sinological affairs. His personal effort toward greater understanding between the Chinese and Western world results in a curious Spenglarian-like historical synthesis. An erudition of a very personal and metaphysical quality characterizes this work which ranges from writing systems to political conflict to the broadest eclectic intellectual history imaginable. The author states that he is aware of the pitfalls of this effort, but feels that scholars too often remain on the "platonic" level.

Doak Barnett's latest effort, China After Mao, falls also in the food for non-specialists' category with one qualification. Political scientists not primarily concerned with China may ignore the first two works, but would profit from the summary essay provided by Barnett. Barnett, one of the most sensitive and prolific China watchers, presents no new material, but focuses on the social, political, and economic background factors which provide the environment for current events on the mainland. The author reviews the considerable achievements of the Communist Chinese elite, creation of a disciplined and successful revolutionary movement, a mass political party without parallel, and the initiation of "... a significant program of industrialization." The major section of the introductory essay deals with the basic economic and social challenges facing the regime, the imminence of a very critical change in political leadership in the Party, and the basic prescriptions in Mao's ideological dream for the future. The rest of the volume reprints selected key documents emanating from the Chinese Communist Central Committee on the "cultural revolution," Lin Piao's "Long Live the Victory of People's War," and other documents reflecting Mao's thought.

Merle Goldman offers an original piece of scholarship on the problem of conflict between the Chinese Communist party and leading leftwing Chinese writers in the 1940's and 1950's. The conflict between the Party and the literary intellectuals, one of conflicting values—ideological conformity versus the need for free inquiry—has left many scars. The author presents impressive evidence that the Party leaders have not entirely succeeded in purifying their writers of unorthodox tendencies.

The basic problem is that imperatives guiding writers of any, and including Maoist, ideological inclination demand a degree of independence of thought often found unacceptable to political elites attempting to industrialize. The author does not speculate on the reasons for the tension, but rather unrayels the Kafka-like environment in which, in historical order, writers of the ilk of Hu Feng, Hsiao Chun, and Ting Ling were "constructively criticized" through Cheng Feng campaigns. Cheng Feng movements, originating in the early 1940's, were designed to create a disciplined devoted cadre and intellectual core. The movement was developed in order to alter basic behavior patterns of intellectuals to conform with the Party line. We are taken through a series of Cheng Feng campaigns and thus see the development of the most extreme psychological techniques, such as public criticism, self-criticism, and re-criticism, which are used against the writers. Yet the author concludes that after two decades of denunciation and self-depreciation, the writers remain alienated, often counter-productive, and independent. The one sanction the writers apparently unconsciously exploit, namely the political elite's dependence on their productivity as a group, may partially explain the series of relaxation periods throughout the 1950's culminating in the Hundred Flowers Movement.

Literary Dissent in Communist China joins the painfully small group of volumes which provide valuable information about contemporary China. An excellent bibliography and glossary citing major Chinese language source material adds to the usefulness of the work.

It would be unfair to criticize the historian Goldman for not writing a sociological analysis of the problem investigated. Likewise, Barnett's work is introductory and historical. Yet the two works reflect a general malaise in works on China of potential relevance for political scientists. Perhaps the most crucial difficulty is that of concept formation and evidence. Nowhere does Goldman define the concept intellectual; rather, and improperly, common intersubjective understanding of the term is assumed. Neither author attempts to explain events under analysis. Without dwelling on the problem of "facts speaking for themselves," frameworks of considerable power are available for application. If, for example, central political organizations such as the Chinese Communist party are viewed as reference groups and ideologies as guides for societa-communication networks which are very difficult to maintain in the absence of a set of relatively stable social values and norms, the political elite's constant attempts to exorcise ideological deviation may be more understandable. Imaginative comparative analysis of other regime's efforts at controlling their intellectual class might yield generalizations of improved value.

Major difficulties paralyze our attempts to create a genuinely profitable academic political science dialogue about Communist China. First, there is the absence of scholars who have the sufficient language and area training plus enough political science discipline concentration. Second, analysis of political problems in a closed society poses critical data problems. Granting these difficulties, more careful explication of the unit of analysis and the elements of the research design apparatus, and the enployment of strategies such as content analysis on substantive questions and comparative aralysis of social background characteristics of inter-societal political elites may facilitate the dialogue thus far conspicuous by its absence.

ROGER W. BENJAMIN

University of Minnesota

Prelude to Downfall: Hitler and the United States, 1939-1941. By Saul Friedlander. (New York: Alfred E. Knopf, 1967. Pp. xi, 328. $6.95.)

The German Army and the Nazi Party, 1933-39.

By Robert O'Neill. (New York: J. E. Heinemann, 1966. Pp. xiii, 286. $8.50.)

Charisma and Factionalism in the Nazi Party.

By Joseph Nyomarkay. (Minneapolis:
University of Minnesota Press, 1967. Pp.
161. $5.00.)

Three separate but very intriguing facets of the rise and fall of the Nazi regime are highlighted by these penetrating scholarly studies: the internal convulsions of the movement on its way to power (Nyomarkay), the crucial rivalry between the party hierarchy and the officer corps (O'Neill), and the policies of moderation vis-à-vis the U.S. pursued by the Third Reich to keep the U.S. from abandoning its isolationist stance which abetted Hitler's control over the Continent (Friedlander). An unexpected but distinctly discernible theme underlying all three works would seem to be the obstacles that lay in the way of Hitler's ascendancy to power. That he could mold the rabble of his early followers into a compact political force. that he could prevail over prestigious and established representatives of the military and, at a later date, through skillful diplomatic maneuvering keep the U.S. at least at arms length, would seem to be less the result of well thought out and prepared plans than of Hitler's almost uncanny ability to take advantage of the weaknesses and unimaginativeness of his adversaries. The ideologically unsophisticated, even primitive character of his early following was no match for Hitler's unscrupulous techniques of persuasion, the officer corps was blinded by its own arrogance, and the Western powers' hesitancy always left most foreign policy options at the discretion of Hitler.

It is especially Friedlander's competent and profuse documentation that conveys a sense of the opportunistic rather than carefully planned nature of Hitler's foreign policy. From Friedlander's meticulous perusal of diplomatic correspondence and other foreign policy documents Hitler emerges as a much less arrogant or politically naive dictator than later assessments have portraved him. Surprisingly it is FDR who, in his determination to foil Nazi policies in Europe even at the risk of war, barely escapes being cast in the role of sinister Machiavellian. If evidence as presented by a scholar of Friedlander's acknowledged sympathetic objectivity to the Allied cause can give this impression, there is reason to be apprehensive about the interpretations of future generations of scholars who may have less cause to skew their impartiality in the direction of the democracies! Between 1939 and 1941 Hitler was extremely careful to keep the U.S. out of the war, to the point even of wanting to avoid a confrontation at all costs. Despite the urgings of his admirality to the contrary, he gave strict orders not to provoke any naval incidents with the U.S. FDR, on the other hand, wanted to assist England in every possible way without necessarily foregoing the risk of involvement. To be sure, much of Hitler's diplomatic moves vis-à-vis the U.S. derived from his continued probing of the strategic potential of the U.S.; he did not want the U.S. to mobilize its full military strength prior to the successful completion of the campaign against Russia. Certainly the influence of neutralists and isolationists in the U.S. was sufficiently strong to lend a great deal of plausibility to Hitler's political calculations. Foremost among those was his speculation that Japan's entrance in the war against England and the Soviet Union would keep the U.S. neutral because of her fear of becoming involved in a two-front war. But somehow FDR had long since decided that a risk of a twofront war could be borne and that Japan's expansionist policies would not act as a deterrent to legitimate American goals in the Pacific: thus American diplomatic maneuvers were deliberately designed to give Japan only the option between war or a total reversal of her foreign policy. Toward Germany, American policy was quite openly one of entrapping her into a crass act of aggression against American shipping on the high seas. But Hitler simply would not oblige—and then obliged only too well by issuing his declaration of war subsequent to Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor. It will probably always remain one of the more fascinating exercises to speculate on whether in the absence of such a declaration the U.S. and the Third Reich would have gone to war against each other. Friedlander does not make a wholly convincing case for the inevitability of Hitler's action. He suggests Hitler's loyalty to his Asian allies and his conviction that a quick victory over Russia would confront the U.S. with a nearly invincible Germany dominating a vast, monolithic continental bloc. Friedlander's own exposition of the logic of Hitler's action up to that point weaken this explanation. Undoubtedly Hitler did believe that he could yet destroy Russia militarily according to the timetable he had set for himself—but might not such a quick defeat of Bolshevism have created entirely new opportunities for the relationship between the Reich and a still non-belligerent U.S.?

The second work before us is yet another attempt to penetrate the real attitudes of the German Generals toward Nazism and to provide evidence that even if the Generals cannot be relieved of the parts played by them in putting Hitler into power they can at least be shown as having fought his aggressive and criminal designs for world conquest every step of the way. The author has engaged in very serious and careful scholarship designed to overcome the picture of the German General Staff as willing and pliable tools for the execution of the Führer's will. Based on the minute investigation of official documents, as well as unofficial records and conversations with surviving German Generals, Dr. O'Neill has tried to arrive at an explanation as to why the conservative, exceedingly professional and Christian German High Command could allow itself to be used as it was by Hitler and his cynical political supporters. Briefly his argument is that this highly patriotic, professional officercorps fought Hitler's unprincipled machinations every step along the way toward rearmament and aggression; that certainly prior to Hitler's personal assumption of the office of Minister of War in 1938, the army never harbored any independent aggressive design.

Though many officers certainly had clear ideas with respect to the restoration of German military strength and appreciated the favorable climate for such policy offered by the Nazi government, they were also equally repelled by the intrusion of Nazism in the form of political indoctrination and made a determined effort to keep the army free of such contamination. O'Neill is especially concerned to cast the person and role of General v. Fritsch in a new and more favorable light by showing that he was among those who manfully tried to stem the tide of Nazification of the military. But the author's labors cannot be said to introduce any new evidence that would justify a reversal of the impression that Fritsch and most of his peers left to the world: of a military leadership that was undoubtedly disdainful of Hitler's methods, and some of whom even despised him personally, but who supported his policies willingly enough as long as they could be expected to lead to a militarily powerful, internationally respected and economically autonomous Germany. Even O'Neill has to admit disconsolatedly in the end that "there was much about the Third Reich in its prewar vears which seemed to the German Army at large wholly right and proper."

What the work does provide is less an explanation of the ambiguous role of the Generals than a series of rather sketchy portraits of the personal views of a selected number of Generals. The overall impression is that of the self-serving and sycophantic nature of Generals Blomberg, Reichenau and Keitel whose personal ambitions and weak character alone contributed to making Hitler's policy of breaking the will of the army a success. This is a decided oversimplification of the known circumstances that surrounded the subjugation of the army to the party. Much more than personal predilections, there was a distinct orientation away from real political involvement bred into the army under the leadership of von Seeckt who correctly, if arrogantly, assumed that the state owed its existence to the army. The estrangement of the army from the republic played directly into the hands of the Nazis who could play upon the hostility of the officer corps to the republic. That officercorps became the prisoner of its own ideology when it equated Hitler's vulgar nationalism with its own and permitted, especially its younger officers, to embrace Nazism with enthusiasm because of its promises of new opportunities, adventure and prestige. But even those who supported the republic feared the power of the one group, the military, with whose aid that republic would have to be defended against its enemies. A fearful liberalism either ignored or retreated before the Reichswehr and it became the tragedy of the Weimar republic that the initial attempt to build a republican army following the armistice had to give way so quickly to the forces of tradition and restoration that succeeded in the establishment of the Versailles decreed 100,000 man army. Thus it was the spirit of the arrogant General von Seeckt which imbued the Reichswehr and led to its near alienation from political leadership. That the counter revolution from which Hitler drew his strength could succeed, was made possible by the fact that the state in which an alienated army merely "camped" felt indebted to that army for having redressed the balance between civilian and military authorities in favor of the former. No one ever addressed himself directly to the basic problem of how to integrate a professional army, and especially an officercorps shaped along specific, i.e., monarchic, concepts of duty, honor and loyalty, within a democratic state that did not accord with its own conception of nation or state! The Reichswehr, as Benoist-Mechin has pointed out so perceptively was an army without a nation. It was not merely Hitler's promises of rearmament and universal military training that intrigued the army but his ability to recapture the "nation" again for its soldiers that made him so invincible in the eyes of the Generals. Also, Hitler was very careful during the early years of power to recognize and respect the insistence of the military on autonomy vis-à-vis the political organs of the state—and he could do this the better because of the reliability of the two key-figures among the Generals: Blomberg and Reichenau. Blomberg was only following von Seeckt's guidelines when he saw in Hitler's policies the opportunity for the Reichswehr to be relieved of political problems and intrigues so that it could dedicate itself wholeheartedly to its original task of the creation of a military expertise. It was this withdrawal of the officercorps into "purely" expert problems of military strategy and rearmament that made possible its ignoring of the brutal realities that led to the bloodbath of June 30, 1934. It was none other than v. Fritsch, Commander-in-Chief of the Army at the time, who noted the murder of two of his fellow officers, with the recorded remark: "We cannot change Politics, but we must do our duty." Because the Reichswehr ideal was that of autonomous power within the state, it could no more oppose the trauma of dictatorial government than it could fulfill its correct role within a democratic framework.

Professor Nyomarkay's extremely provocative study centers on the role of Hitler's charisma as a factor which elevated him above the factional strife of his movement making him thereby the object rather than the subject of rivalries among his followers. In discussing the differences between Nazi factionalism and that of other totalitarian movements, the author hopes to generate fresh thinking on the relationship of factional behavior to the legitimacy of power leading toward a new typology for factional behavior based on the nature and degree of group cohesion. Nyomarkay's theory hinges on two considerations: his distinction between ideology and Weltanschauung and his use of charisma as a means for the integration of widely diverging factional behavior. Weltanschauung, according to Nyomarkay, unlike ideology, projects the metaphysically unlimited world of thought, denoting its necessarily esoteric and vague content, unconcerned with any immediacy of action. Consequently it lends itself admirably to personification by an imaginative leader who bends its essentially unshaped form to suit his highly personal goals. Thus general feelings of racial superiority, veneration of tradition, and suspicion of the outside world could be exploited to accept antisemitism, authoritarianism, and militarism as means to control a hostile environment. Because the success of such sentiments depended primarily on their effective articulation by a personal leader, it was less important to test their validity than believe in the integrity of the leader. Thus factions caused by disagreements on certain programmatic points could be permitted to exist as long as their members did not waver in their loyalty to the leader. By contrast, the highly complex philosophical and scientific apparatus of an ideology such as Marxism, with its process of constant refinement and reinterpretation fosters exactly the kind of splinter groups, sects and deviations that resist the integrative effect of a powerful personality unless they are subjected to outright, violent, repression. This distinction between ideology and Weltanschauung is indeed useful since it restores to ideology its role as the creator of authoritative concepts that make politics more meaningful by infusing it with a systematic and central organizing principle. Also, Hitler emerges as an essentially antipolitical personality whose goal was not the reconciliation of divergent facets of his program but the undving loyalty of his lieutenants to his person.

While the proposition concerning factional behavior in the early Nazi movement merits serious attention and contributes to our understanding of its powers of attraction for those who needed a mythos to overcome their insecurities, the use of the charismatic category would appear to suffer from a lack of theoretical precision. Certainly Hitler's personality acted as an important crystallizing force and his singular dedication provided the kind of psychological comfort that permitted the concentration on his person of many of the aspirations that agitated his contemporaries caught in the throes of a disintegrating political system. But can irresponsible, ruthless, albeit skillful manipulation be equated with the power radiating from charisma? Must the ability to deal successfully with variously aligned factions be necessarily attributable to the kind of power that precludes rational explanation? Even the author appears to hesitate over his use of this category since he supports his argument with examples of leaders who were patently not charismatic types yet successfully dealt with factions among their supporters. Besides, such attribution courts the danger of circular reasoning since the very recognition of Hitler's charisma presupposes solidarity among his followers without providing any cogent explanation for its existence. Would not the really charismatic leader ignore factions altogether, refusing to deal with them either positively or negatively? Factionalism implies sectarianism and such a process has been known to accompany the demise of charisma rather than its ascendancy. As used in this work the principle of charisma could easily be applied to nearly every powerful American president thereby leading unavoidably to its dilution. If charisma is to retain operational significance it should be reserved for those whose inspirational, prophetary, ethical, and aesthetic qualities enable them to lead by the power of their example rather than by manipulation of those whose weaknesses seduce them into attaching themselves to an irrational personality.

All three volumes provide worthwhile new and stimulating insights into the nature of Hitler's National Socialist regime. Their shortcomings also would seem to indicate that a great deal of painstaking scholarship remains to be done before we can arrive at operationally useful and objective criteria for the evaluation of totalitarian movements.

H. P. SECHER

Case Western Reserve University

The Eurocrats. By Altiero Spinelli. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1966. Pp. xi, 229, $5.95.)

Written for a broader audience than the academic community, The Eurocrats nevertheless provides a valuable complement to the leading scholarly accounts of the process of European integration. Its author furnishes a concise and thoroughly readable introduction to the background and institutions of the European Communities—but his emphasis is on the problems of unification, told in terms of contending concepts and their partisans. Spinelli is one of the partisans. For him, the central issue has been a struggle between federalists, functionalists and confederalists. A dedicated federalist, his targets include not only the Gaullists, but also the "Eurocrats"—top-level administrators of the European Communities.

Chief among the pro-European forces today, this last group's functionalist techniques have failed to adequately exploit Europe's opportunities. Spinelli charges, and this failure reflects their bureaucratic mentality: cautious, orderly and suspicious of parliaments and publics, those creators of disorder. More specifically, Spinelli criticizes the European Commission for its failure to treat the European Parliament as a real decision center: it could have been developed as a basis for democratic legitimation of the European institutions. Unduly influenced by Monnet's success with the French Plan, the Eurocrats fell into the trap of placing excessive confidence in technocratic methods of gaining acceptance for potentially controversial policies. Their source of legitimacy was based on the myths of economic rationality rather than the myths of popular representation. Their concept of European unity became one of a community founded on economic interests, regulated by professional administrators, rather than one based on a popular consensus, and hence governed by political insti-

Spinelli rejects this "Europe of Offices"—not only because he finds it undemocratic, but because it can furnish no basis for ultimate political choices—choices which had to be made. His goal would be a federal "Europe of Peoples," drawing authority directly from the electorate.

Given the existing decision-making structure, however, the functionalist alternative was probably necessary. Despite the fact that by the 1950's, a pro-European popular majority already existed, decisions in the Communities could be blocked by any one government; virtually since the Common Market came into being, one government has been in the hands of confederalists, dedicated to a "Europe of Nations." It would not tolerate any change which gave European institutions direct contact with the electorate. Faced with this situation, the Eurocrats made shift to justify decisions having strong political implications on technical grounds. As Spinelli concedes, they were quite skillful at expanding the role of the Brussels institutions in this way. In his book he seems torn between a painful awareness that power based on a direct popular mandate was not immediately possible, and a conviction that it should have remained foremost among the goals, with a tendency to blame the administrators for the current European stalemate.

The lag in European unification does not seem due to the functionalists' failure to choose sufficiently ambitious goals; we must recall that they were attempting to depart from existing patterns. Spinelli may be right in saying that the easiest time to do this would have been in the immediate post-war period, if we corsider solely the problems of institutional resistance: it was a time of relative flux. But it was also a time of relative weakness and pessimism in Europe. The self-confidence necessary for great innovating ventures was not yet present; time was needed to develop the new institutions which were to replace the familiar nation-state; and time was also needed to heal the animosities engendered by the war. By the early 50's, with a considerable measure of recovery—and with the stimulating example of the European Coal and Steel Community in view-bold ventures were proposed. France's rejection of the European Defense Community and the stillbirth of the European Political Community were a defeat for the federalist cause. Though the defeat was narrow, it indicated that, for the time being, traditional fears and passions were still strong enough to block a federal solution. The European strategists shifted back to functionalism—a policy designed to gradually work around traditional opposition, rather than attempt another frontal assault. It seems clear that they retained federalist goals, even if in the background. A decade later, with a series of incremental successes behind them, the Eurocrats attempted another major move toward supranationalism; the European Commission's ambitious package of proposals was countered by France's boycott of the Community institutions in 1965-66. This time, unlike in 1954, action was not met with widespread indications of nationalistic feeling in France (quite the contrary happened); nor was it rejected by broad-based groups in Parliament: it was blocked by the will of one man. For de Gaulle has at least one thing in common with Monnet: he, too, sees the European Commission's version of functionalism as all too likely to lead toward federalism. Given the policy preferences of his five partners (and their frequent reluctance to submit to leadership from the Elysée), this would bring with it an intolerable limitation of France's freedom of action.

In short, Spinelli's basic charge against the Eurocrats is not necessarily convincing. Nevertheless, his book performs an important service. Arguing with eloquence and grace, he calls attention to an area which tends to be underemphasized in much of the leading empirical work on European integration—the realm of ideas and values. It is underemphasized, perhaps, because these things do not fit readily into the leading analytic schemes (which tend to be written from a functionalist point of view and to share its emphasis on socioeconomic determinants). Yet, clearly, they can carry great importance. To cite a prominent example, the policies of de Gaulle, which often dominate the European scene, can not readily be derived from the imperatives of economic, technological or strategic reality, but reflect a bold and dramatic assertion of traditional values. In a protest against the greyness which threatens to overtake the "Europe of Offices." Spinelli seems to be calling for an equally bold assertion of new ideas and policy initiatives.

Spinelli never quite spells out how this is to be done, but the success of Servan-Schreiber's recent book Le Dést Américain,* illustrates the impact which a new statement of the European idea can have. Like the Eurocrats, Servan-Schreiber draws on the symbols of modernism, rather than the mythology of a glorious past. He takes a new course, however, as he rechannels existing anti-Americanism into a new but more restrained form (one which takes as its first premise the overwhelming success of American society). Playing on fears of American domination, he appeals to European desires to play a significant role on the world stage and to maintain an "advanced civilization." based on advanced technology and computerized management. In his estimation of both the success of American society, and the degree to which it constitutes a threat to Europe, he may be overstating his case. He has, however, assembled a set of arguments for a united Europe (including Britain) which has generated widespread interest and even excitement among elite groups within the Europe of the Six. It is a Europe which would, almost necessarily, be federalist enough for Spinelli.

RONALD INGLEHART

University of Michigan

The Democratic Republicans of New York: The Origins, 1763-1797. By Alfred F. Young. (Chapel Hill: Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Virginia, by The University of North Carolina Press, 1967. Pp. xv, 636. $12.25.)

* Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber, Le Défi Américain (Paris: Denoël, 1967).

New Jersey's Jeffersonian Republicans: The Genesis of an Early Party Machine. By Carl F. Prince. (Chapel Hill: Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Virginia, by The University of North Carolina Press, 1967. Pp. xvi, 266. $7.50.)

These two studies of the beginning of political parties and party machinery in the United States are of excellent quality. Furthermore they add to our understanding of a number of problems pertaining to the role of parties in the democratic process, problems which continue to the present day. There are also other problems treated in these books that are common to the process of development, and that still appear in some countries which today are in a comparatively early stage of development.

To come to specifics. Both works are the product of diligent examination of much new material. Each author has examined all the newspapers that are available for the years covered in the respective states-New York and New Jersey. Furthermore the surviving manuscripts of national, state and local political leaders have been systematically culled. The result is a wealth of new information. The work by Young on the Democratic Republicans of New York is the broader of the two. It covers political coalitions, the class conflicts of the period, the development of party organization, the decision process, and the relationship to national politics. While long and detailed, it is very rewarding. So, too, is Prince's book on New Jersey's Jeffersonian Republicans but in a more restricted scope, that of party organization, machinery, and leadership.

What is new that emerges from these studies and what confirms earlier findings? Both writers agree with the recent figures of Chilton Williamson in his book American Suffrage . . . 1760-1869, that after the American Revolution the suffrage in the states extended to 65 percent of the white male population. Earlier estimates had been for a numerically much smaller electorate. Furthermore this electorate divided according to socio-economic groups. In this respect Young and Prince confirm, although with many changes and refinements, the basic concepts of the economic and social basis of parties. The studies of Charles A. Beard on the Economic Origins of Jeffersonian Democracy and on the movement for the Constitution are basically confirmed with changes as to detail by Young. There is an excellent bibliographic essay at the end of Young's book, covering the Beard literature and other writings relevant to the period. At the same time the writers confirm the earlier findings of Wilfred Binkley, Peter Charles, Noble Cunninghain, and myself on the economic and social forces behind the Federalists and Republicans. There is also confirmation of the thesis of such writers as Robert Dahl in Who Governs, on the transition from aristocracy to democracy.

On the other hand there are many refinements in comparison with the above works and such refinements are developed by Young. In the Colonial period of New York much of the legislative struggle had been between two proprietor factions, the Delanceys and the Livingstons. The Delancey's became Tories. After that the conflict developed between the Federalists and Anti-Federalists over the movement for the Constitution. Politics developed on a broader scale. The larger families and commercial interests supported the Constitution. The Clintons and a few other large proprietors, led the opposition. The Federalists led by the Schuyler, Hamilton, and Jay families broadened the basis of their support by adopting popular slogans and bringing in broader participation. But most of the small landholders followed the Clinton faction. An exception should be made of the squatters, who organized movements for acquisition of land without compensation. In contrast, the Federalists and Republicans, with an overwhelming majority, supported the system of property and there was no serious threat to the basic system. Mechanics (laborers) in the cities at first supported the Federalist commercial leadership. But after 1793, with the development of a state-federal political party around Jefferson, the mechanics changed to the Democratic Republicans. Some commercial interests, such as those around Aaron Burr, supported the rising Democratic Republicans and Clintonians. This was because the Federalists had access to the Bank of the United States. Therefore others accepted in the commercial groups, but excluded by the Federalists, desired access to banking resources through the channels of a state charter. Also they desired access to state government for land sales, for political positions, for access to power. The outcome was two parties, each providing for vertical mobility within. This likewise provided multiple access to political and social leadership.

It is also true that the frontier threat from the British (until Jay's treaty of 1795), and from the Indians, produced Federalist strength in the frontier area. There was demand from the frontiersmen for the stronger policies of the national government.

The politics of the New Jersey picture is treated in less detail, but the role of party organization is clearly developed in Prince's book.

Party organization played a dominant role as New Jersey was transformed from a Federalist to a Democratic Republic state. The term caucus was used by the early New Jersey Democratic Republicans for the state party legislative caucus during the period of sympathy for the French Revolution, in the early 1790's. Link and others have previously shown the importance of the Democratic Republican societies in increasing the extent of political participation and in broadening the basis of political authority. But the development of party organization also shows what may well be a heritage from the committees of correspondence of the pre-Revolutionary War period. These were revived as campaign committees at the township and county level. Then by 1800 there was the convention that was added at the county and then at the state level. Also in each county there was the party weekly or daily newspaper. Finally the party activists were at the head of this apparatus. These individuals were well rewarded. Over a sixteen-year period from 1801 to 1816, 64 percent of 256 identified party activists received political jobs or other rewards. Citizen participation was broadened but the new leadership received specific rewards. This may raise a question for other developing countries if in modern times complete stress is placed on professionalization of the civil service. Such may well be necessary in complex organizations but the problems of reward for political activism still remain.

In summary, what is presented in these works is the picture of a pluralist society, and a society offering considerable social mobility. Definite rewards for political activity emerged. These included bank charters, land leases, job preferment, social advance, and the use of power. But there also was a spirit of accommodation to new policies, to social change, to emerging new groups of the population, and to new leadership. Fortunately many of the leaders supported policies which were broadly based and, in the end, political opponents were not proscribed. Some of these changes were embraced by the Federalists. But the Democratic Republican Party was the more popular vehicle. Hence except for a revival by the Federalists during the War of 1812, the Democratic Republicans ultimately overwhelmed the opposition. But no single party could encompass all the rival demands. After the demise of the Federalists, new policy differences developed to prevent one-party rule. Even as the Democratic Republicans emerged victorious there developed the seeds of later divisions, and the party struggle continued.

University of Florida

Manning J. Dauer

The American Occupational Structure. By Peter Blau and Otis Dudley Duncan. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1967. Pp.xi, 520. $14.95.)

Ever so often a work appears which is not about political phenomena in a strict sense, but which many political scientists find valuable. Such a work is represented by this inquiry, in which two of the foremost students of occupational sociology combine their talents. Observers of political life have long been intrigued by the interrelationships between a man's work orientations and his political values, between the allocation of occupational status and political power, and between the occupational structure and political development. I doubt that political scientists concerned with the interlacing of political life and such matters as social stratification, occupational mobility, socialization, achievement orientations, and minority group behavior (to name a few) can ignore this work.

It is well-nigh impossible to summarize the undertaking. Perhaps the best way to begin is to describe the study design. Through cooperation with the Bureau of the Census the authors were able to utilize the interviews obtained with 20 to 64-year-old males as part of the Current Population Survey in March 1962. This was supplemented by questionnaires left with the eligible males; approximately five-sixths of the latter filled out this instrument. The questionnaire and interview data were then collated. In all an unadjusted N of 20,700 resulted, easily the largest and best sample ever obtained for a study of this type.

One of the acknowledged limitations of the study is that no attitudinal, motivational, or perceptual information was gathered. That is, the survey data are almost exclusively "hard" rather than "soft." While this is a handicap in developing a comprehensive model of occupational achievement, it at least has the virtue of highly valid and reliable measurement. Another constraint is that the authors were allowed very little interaction with their data. Due to the special circumstances of the project, all tabulations had to be specified in advance. It is a tribute to their knowledge and perspicacity that the analysis suffers only occasionally from this handicap. In the eyes of some readers a final limitation will be the lack of an explicit theory to guide the research and analysis. The authors are quite clear about why they have not pursued this course, and in any event various theoretical perspectives are found throughout.

In examining the dynamics of the American occupational structure Blau and Duncan employ five keystone variables: the respondent's 1962 occupational status, his first-job status, his education level, father's occupational status, and father's education. With these five variables alone an impressive story can be unfolded about inter- and intra-generational mobility, the relative determinants of status beginnings and destinations, and secular trends.

The initial task was to make a broad sweep of movements among occupational groups (not individuals). Of the many conclusions two seem especially salient for political scientists. First, the white-collar, blue-collar, farm occupational classes serve as more than convenient handles for typing occupations. They also form distinct psychological and skill boundaries severely limiting the flow of downward mobility while permitting upward mobility of greater than chance proportions. The archetype here is the lackluster son of a white-collar father who elects a low-level white-collar position rather than a more remunerative job across the blue-collar boundary. A second salient conclusion deals with structural rigidities. Some observers have claimed that the traditional opportunity structure associated with an egalitarian and open society shows signs of hardening. Using varied data, including four age cohorts from their sample, Blau and Duncan argue that the impact of social origins on occupational destinations has changed hardly at all in the last few decades. Despite changes in immigration flows and fertility rates there seem to be inherent factors facilitating continued mobility.

Having charted the broad movements, the authors then turn to the major task of unravelling the determinants of occupational status and mobility. Among the four major predictors—father's occupation and education, and respondent's education and first job—it is respondent's education which exerts the most powerful effect and first job second most, even though social origins do have an enduring effect. These variables are most assuredly interrelated, but it is one of the great virtues of the book that a basic model employing path coefficients has been utilized to tackle such knotty problems.

A number of additional factors help determine a man's eventual status, although a convincing case is made that such factors are primarily important because they affect educational attainments. Political scientists may be most interested in the several chapters dealing with these other matters. For example, there is a timely chapter on "Inequality of Opportunity" which portrays the fashion in which region, race, and immigration affect occupational chances. While the authors demolish the popular conception of self-perpetuated status, they do demonstrate how the American Negro becomes the victim of an accumulation of disadvantages, resulting in a vicious circle. It appears, incidentally, that it is the better educated Negro who suffers the most from racial discrimination per se.

The bearing of kinship and marriage patterns on careers is taken up in some detail and carried off with consummate skill. Classic and tantalizing questions are considered: the importance of birth order, family size, broken families, social origins of spouse, assortative mating, and so forth. Students of political socialization will find these chapters particularly engaging. By the same token those concerned with the effects of spatial mobility and urbanization on the political process will find the extended material on these topics enlightening.

Most political scientists who use this book will probably be selective since not all of the subject matter is of equal pertinence. At least one set of readers, however, might value the entire effort because it is a virtual primer on data manipulation. There is a dazzling array of analytic and presentation techniques, including transition matrices, smallest space analysis, multiple classification analysis, regression, covariance, path coefficients, and cohort analysis. Furthermore, the authors provide clear and contextually related descriptions of their techniques. They also pinpoint the crucial linkage of methodology to questions of theory and substance.

For the political scientist there is a sobering afterthought. Occupational status is of singular importance in the real world, and it is susceptible to powerful analytic techniques and theoretical treatment. Starting from the single construct of occupational status the sociologist can generate an immense amount of vital information about society, across generations and throughout the life cycle. The question arises as to whether there are any such constructs in the political world, constructs which are of analogous importance, which are amenable to rigorous and quantitative treatment, and which can be extended over time.

M. Kent Jennings

University of Michigan

The Garden and the Wilderness: Religion and Government in American Constitutional History. By Mark DeWolfe Howe. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965. Pp. 180. $4.50.)

This book is written with grace and good nature. It leaves the reader feeling he has been instructed by a master teacher who must also have been a "genuine, solid, humble, thoughtful man."

Howe's concern in these Weil Lectures was the theory and therefore the history of church-state law in this country. He accepted the Supreme Court's working maxim that theory and decision must be supported by history in all cases where professions of wisdom can be mistaken for mere assertions of preference. He went on to argue, however, that the theory of much recent church-state law has been infirm because it was based on bad history.

The Court's historical premise has been that the First Amendment was the work of men who wanted their government neutral between religion and irreligion. Howe's research led him to assert a different proposition: that, ignorant of this kind of neutrality and remote from Jeffersonian anticlericalism, the enactors of the Amendment were moved by benevolence for the cause of religion. Adoption of the First Amendment was a political decision in favor of religion, reflecting the framers' assumption "That the realm of religious interests and religious convictions occupied a special constitutional status" (p. 160). Evangelical separatists, who gave the religion clauses their purport, wanted the State voluntarily to build a wall between its Wilderness and the Church's Garden, for the sake of the Garden.

Howe believed, in other words, that one of the "most important purposes of the First Amendment was the advancement of the interests of religion" (p. 31). And he was willing to face a possible implication of this finding: that government aid to religion might be called for by the deeper intention of the Amendment. For would not a successful disputation of the minor premise that total separation is in fact beneficial to religion transform the evangelical argument against establishment into an argument for a mild form of church-state cooperation? On Howe's hypothesis, would not every argument that government can help the Garden grow without corrupting it (see p. 152) tend to the conclusion that government ought to help it grow (cf. p. 15)?

To say the least, this is a startling conclusion. Howe removed some of the paradox simply by noting that neither the original Constitution nor the First Amentment granted the national government power to sponsor religion. But, of course, the original Constitution left this power to the states, and from 1789 until long after passage of the Fourteenth Amendment few thought the First Amendment took it away from them. In that interval state courts developed their own constitutional law of church and state. And Howe insisted that the development of state-court doctrine in those years is a relevant chapter of our legal history: it too must be allowed to inform our present theory. According to Howe, Judge Alphonoso Taft of Ohio represented the nineteenth-century statecourt view tolerably well when, in 1870, he said that "'the government is neutral, and while protecting all, it prefers none, and it disparages none" (p. 150). Although this passage has been quoted recently by the Supreme Court as if it were a true anticipation of present doctrine, Howe tells us that the neutrality Taft had in mind was not the neutrality between religion and irreligion that our Court champions. Taft meant only "the government's neutrality between its associates in a common enterprise" (p. 151).

After passage of the Fourteenth Amendment the Supreme Court had the option of (1) not applying the First Amendment to the states, (2) applying it with its evangelical presuppositions, thus sanctioning the kind of non-discriminatory cooperation with churches that state courts had consistently approved, or (3) reading back into the First what Howe regarded as the a-religious presuppositions of the Fourteenth. The Court has done the latter, by "the familiar process of incorporation carried out, as it were, in reverse" (p. 31; and see, p. 157). Howe deplored this result. In particular, he insisted that the nonestablishment clause ought not have been forced to support "that broadened rule of neutrality [between religious and non-religious interests] that our times require" (p. 161). While Howe knew very well that disestablishment enhances the liberty of non-believers and heterodox believers (pp. 96-102, 106, 117), he contended nevertheless that the disestablishment clause ought to be kept true to its origin. The way to do that is to restrict it to the function, within Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence, of assuring equal treatment of the friends of religion.

Howe thought it possible for government to help religion without hindering non-religion. This belief may be hard to reconcile with his affirmation that separation of church and state enhances the liberties of the non-religious. Here I can say only that Howe typically preferred to see more evidence before choosing between apparent contraries. Disharmony didn't bother him as much as forced harmony. So, he took a bold stand on the issue of aid to religion: government can help religion without hindering irreligion and states make out a prima facie constitutional case when they argue that their acts will benefit religion. Of course, Howe promptly entered the necessary qualification, i.e., that any particular act of cooperation may impair the liberties of the non-religious. That question, however, must be resolved under the clauses designed to protect non-religious liberties, and not under the religion clauses. For, properly understood, the non-establishment clause merely assures equal governmental treatment of religious interests, while the free exercise clause itself amounts to a constitutional establishment of religion (see pp. 90, 100, 110, 154). Neither clause is the appropriate protector of the free exercise of irreligion. The office of protecting non-believers belongs to the speech and press provisions of the First Amendment and to the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth, clauses fully adequate to their office (pp. 153-54, 156-57, 160-61, 165).

¹ Griswold, "Professor Mark Howe," 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1631 (1967).

Howe contrasted his own understanding of the First Amendment with the present Court's in chapters on the cases from Cantwell to the present. In that development he saw two antagonistic efforts to the same end—constitutional parity of religion and irreligion. The first was Mr. Justice Jackson's endeavor in Barnette to assimilate religious freedom to secular freedom. It was still-born. Howe's reading of the opinions in Barnette led him to think that, Jackson's dismissal of the case's religious elements to the contrary, the Court in fact exempted the Witnesses from West Virginia's patriotic ritual because their objections were religious: he doubted that secular objections to the flag salute would have moved the Court to the same result. In other words, as late as 1943 religious freedom possessed de facto "a special constitutional status" (p. 114; see also pp. 165-66; but see pp. 109-10, 135, 148). The second effort was successful because its chief strategist, Mr. Justice Frankfurter, realized the unbelieving conscience would gain parity only when it was sheltered by the religion clauses. He overcame constitutional and judicial favoritism for religion by employing the establishment clause, neutralized to the difference between religion and irreligion, to protect the free exercise of irreligion. He accomplished parity by bringing irreligion within the sheltering confines of the religion clauses, and not by removing religion to the more exposed reaches assigned to the protection of the secular clauses. Howe quoted Justice Frankfurter from the Sunday law cases: "'The Establishment Clause withdrew from the sphere of legitimate legislative concern and competence a specific, but comprehensive, area of human conduct: man's belief or disbelief in the verity of some transcendental idea and man's expression in action of that belief or disbelief" (p. 156; and see pp. 116-18). To this simple, symmetrical, and false proposition, the closing sentence of Professor Howe's book is an adequate response: "The complexities of history deserve our respect" (p. 176).

THOMAS S. SCHROCK University of California, Santa Barbara

NOTES

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

Political Science and Ideology. By WILLIAM E. CONNOLLY. (New York: Atherton Press, 1967. Pp. viii, 179. $5.95.)

It is not unusual in the history of political thought that an idea or concept, developed and honed as a weapon against the opposition, has been captured by the latter and, with minor alternations, effectively turned against its former proponents. The concept of ideology is such a case. While radical writers, following Marx, developed it as an instrument to unmask the hypocrisies of the ruling class it has now as is commonly known, been captured and effectively employed by spokesmen of the status quo. The confusion of the concept today largely stems from the attempt of both camps to apply it in a pejorative sense to the political interpretation of their opponents and to deny its relevance to their own position. In the tradition of Karl Mannheim, William Connolly argues that it is time that ideology be neutrally defined and its applicability generalized to encompass all political interpretations, from radical polemics to orthodox and scientific treatises in political science. He further argues that political scientists are not only obliged as scientists to become aware of the ideological dimensions of their own work, but that they also have a social obligation to construct interpretations of politics sufficiently broad to meet important problems of the day. In a word, political scientists must responsibly face up to the problem of ideology rather than attempting, under the guise of science, to expunge it.

Ideology is not conceived by Connolly as moral commitment nor as basic political values that serve as criteria for judging whether a given event or position is good or bad. Rather, he defines ideology as "a set of empirical claims not fully tested, and for practical purposes not fully testable, which functions both to orient political activity and to preserve from destruction values and higher level beliefs cherished by its authors and supporters" (p. 49). Conceived in this way, ideology serves as the essential link between an individual's values and his view of reality.

In a perceptive and in a closely analytical manner. Connolly applies his concept of ideology to the conflicting "pluralist" and "power elite" interpretations of the American system by Robert Dahl and C. Wright Mills. However, in the course of showing that their ideologies pre-determine their findings, he tends to overplay his hand. Mills did not focus, to the extent that Connolly claims, on the nondecision-making process-if he had done so, his case, in my view, would have been stronger; and Connolly's effort to show that Dahl, independent of his ideology, "conveys a mood of complacency" (p. 46) toward reform of the system, is pretty thin. The significant point is not that Dahl's "cherished beliefs" are reflected and protected by his ideology, but that the implications of his ideology are profoundly conservative.

Until "empirical claims not fully tested" (ideology) are subject to empirical validation, the question of whether a given ideology is distorted (a departure from reality) cannot be completely determined. The temptation, which Connolly strenuously rejects, to solve the problem by restricting political inquiry to subjects susceptible to hypotheses that can be narrowly constructed and rigorously tested, is in reality no solution. In the first place, as Connolly points out, there is no assurance that a precisely formulated hypothesis. subject to empirical validation, will encompass every significant aspect of the problem under investigation. More importantly, for the political scientist to restrict his analysis and inquiry to that which is countable and measurable is, according to Connolly's argument, to fail to meet his intellectual and social responsibility to society. Connolly engages in a provocative and rewarding discussion on the nature and need of ideological detachment and involvement. If he had, however, applied his thesis to his own ideology, which is implicitly reflected throughout the book, and how it protects values which he strongly embraces, his case would have been even stronger.

Professor Connolly by no means lays to rest the opposition or the issues; nevertheless he offers a strong, and often penetrating, argument that should be taken into account.—Peter Bachrach, Bryn Mawr College.

The Concept of Ideology and Other Essays. By George Lichtheim. (New York: Random House, 1967. Pp. xviii, 327. $5.95.)

This book is a collection of twenty-two essays, review articles, and shorter reviews all written and published in the years 1962-66. Some of the pieces first appeared in learned journals of history and sociology; others in such literary periodicals as Commentary, Encounter, and The New York Review of Books. Lichtheim's tone, that of the politically conscious intellectual addressing other intellectuals, is uniform throughout. Lichtheim is a scholar, as his two books on Marxist thought make clear; but it is also clear that his natural mode of address to the world-a mode he doubtless prizes above the cautious neutrality most other scholars impose on themselves-is engaged, passionate, and verbally proud and virtuose. To be sure, Lichtheim pays a price: in his strain to be both readable and au courant, he is occasionally either hasty or entirely too artful. But the price is small. His best traits are abundantly displayed in The Concept of Ideology, which will appeal to all those who love politics as a complex moral phenomenon, and who sympathize with the view that the best understanding of politics comes from a humanistically trained intelligence struggling to make sense of politics in order to make sense of life.

There is no use in pretending that these pieces are held together by anything but Lichtheim's preoccupations. But certainly no apology is called for, when a miscellany is as consistently interesting as this one is. The only point is that often one wishes that an argument Lichtheim could only sketch because he had to be brief had been carried further. Even the longer articles in the book are tantalizingly inconclusive. In any case we should be satisfied with what we are given.

Lichtheim's preoccupations are with Marxist thought, its Hegelian antecedents, its influence on movements in Germany and practice in the Soviet Union, and its influence on recent radical speculation. While not the sustained theme of the book. the continuous and variegated betraval of Marx by most who claimed to act or to philosophize in his name does dominate Lichtheim's general approach. Only five of his pieces do not touch directly on Marxism and its career: an omnibus review of Toynbee (towards whom Lichtheim is unfailingly and unjustly unkind). Louis Halle, and Louis L. Snyder; a review of Hannah Arendt's On Revolution (which he spiritedly finds reactionary); a review of Guéhenno's life of Rousseau and Jack Lively's edition of de Maistre (an effort not up to Lichtheim's usual standard and that lacks the elegant subtlety of John Plamenatz's review of Guéhenno in The New York Review of Books); a review article on Hans J. Morgenthau's three-volume work, Politics in the Twentieth Century (in which Lichtheim struggles with some success to establish the difference between Morgenthau's realism and that of Hobbes); and an article on Leo Strauss's commentary of Xenophon's Hiero, and Strauss's controversy with Alexandre Kojève on the nature of tyranny (in which Lichtheim is on Kojève's side, mocking Strauss for his horror of atheism). Though the subjects of these pieces are not central to Lichtheim's concerns, and do not add to his study of Marxism, they are inherently valuable, if only for the brilliance of particular sentences and passages.

As for the remainder of the book, the student of Marxism will find much to admire. The title-essay, the longest piece in the book, usefully traces the development of the concept of ideology, from the time of the rationalists of the French Revolution, to Hegel and Marx, and beyond to Weber, Mannheim, and the positivists. Lichtheim stresses the twofold sense of the term present in Marx: ideology as faithful but unselfconscious reflection of social conditions, and ideology as narrow, selfinterested rationalization. Lichtheim finds that later so-called Marxists, as well as positivists, err in not retaining that distinction, and in abandoning altogether Marx's belief in the possibility of an intellectual transcendence of social conditions. These latter thinkers have been too eager to unmask: in the process they have carried relativism to the point of irrationality and despair. The second piece, a review article on the writing of the Polish Marxist, Ossowski, tries to point out those elements in Marx's thought which would allow an elaborated Marxism to be not only a critique of capitalist society, but also of advanced industrial society whatever its system of political economy. The third piece, "Society and Hierarchy," deals brilliantly with Marx's ambivalence towards "backward countries." Though concluding that Marx never shed his ambivalence, he shows how the younger Marx applauded Western incursions into Asiatic countries as intimations of progress, but how the mature Marx grew appalled at the human cost of such progress and wondered whether ancient communal economic forms could not, when suitably modified, remain as the basis for communism. Lichtheim's best writing, is in these three essays: they are remarkably stimulating and wide-ranging.

Mention must also be made of the review article on J. P. Nettl's life of Rosa Luxemburg, and the essay on Trotsky. Generous as he is to both revolutionary figures, Lichtheim succeeds in deflating the romanticism that has come to surround them. He gives no consolation to contemporary disillusioned radicals who go back to an earlier generation to find their heroes. Lichtheim's closing essay, "Sartre, Marxism, and History," centers on that dreadful perplexity: the link, if link there is, between the unrelenting individualism of existential morality and the collective activism of Marxist-inspired political tendencies. The perplexity is still with us after we finish Lichtheim, but at least its nature is specified more exactly. To deal thus with perplexity is, all in all, Lichtheim's great gift. He was right to collect his pieces.—George Kater. Amherst College.

The Study of Total Societies. Ed. By Samuel Z. Klausner. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967, Pp. xx, 220. $6.00.)

A decade has elapsed since Karl Wittfogel heralded the "macroanalytic revolution" to come. Since that time the "revolution in the behavioral sciences"-so far as it touched political sciencehas largely been in the opposite direction, i.e., "behavioralism." In the present volume concern with significant "larger issues" of theory and practice has finally surfaced into full view, a welcome arrival since, as William Mitchell supposes, it is a level of analysis "potentially more rewarding to political science." Political modernization, for example, can be celebrated for only so long without taking recourse to the "comprehensive analytic tools" and "big-structured concepts" advertised by Wittfogel-whatever one's views on Cold War ideological competition with Marxism as a "universal idea system" (although Ellsworth Bunker's analysis of the "political solution" in South Vietnam as an exercise in "nation-building," e.g., the conferral of political legitimacy through "democratic elections," puts the question squarely in the arena of world politics).

As a societal phenomenon, the study of political modernization necessarily evokes a general interest among social scientists and enlists a wide range of their talents. The multidisciplinary nature of societal analysis is clearly reflected in the catholicity of the contributors to this symposium and in the ecumenism of their own careers. The fields broadly represented are sociology (Klausner, Coleman, Etzioni, Levy, Tiryakian), economics (Boulding), political science (Pool), psychiatry (Kardiner), and Anatol Rapoport, who defies classification. Collectively they construe "total society" as a unit, not only of intradisciplinary analysis, but also of interdisciplinary synthesis, and for this reason the "total study" of total societies is defined as involving the formulation of cross-disciplinary, cross-level propositions. This is not a book about political modernization, but that topic may again serve as illustrative; its total study would readily engage questions of political socialization in a family setting (Levy), and through mass media exposure (Pool), to the subjectively meaningful symbols of political legitimacy (Tiryakian) as institutionalized aspects of political culture (Kardiner) the "macrolearning" (Boulding) of, or psychotic fixation (Rapoport) on, would crucially influence political articulation of institutional sectors intrasocietally (Coleman) and political unification, e.g., of "mini-states" intersocietally (Etzioni), among other things.

No apologies are necessary for the involuted last sentence: total societal analysis is that complex. The trick is being "just complicated enough" to avoid wrong simplification on the one hand and overdetermination on the other. Ways of coping with "organized complexity" in the analysis of total societies are discussed under three main headings: "methodology" (Klausner, Coleman, Pool), "conceptual issues" (Tiryakian, Boulding, Rapoport), and "opening research strategies" (Etzioni, Levy, Kardiner). Klausner's epilogue provides a skillful résumé of the conference proceedings. Inventorying the resources for rational control over the unruly topic of total societies, we may likewise identify three major areas: societal descriptions, societal indicators and societal models. As to the first, the conferees agreed that exhaustive, general purpose descriptions are impractical, and moreover, irrelevant; Pool announced "there is no consensus on any such grand schemes for the description of a total society . . . there will be none" (p. 47). Nonetheless, both he and Boulding take the creation of a representative sample of the population as a first step, while Levy would contend for basic demographic data on family size and age structure as strategic in the analysis of any society. Apart from which data are to be collected, Boulding further emphasizes methods of data collection and especially its cross-national character. "because the collection of knowledge, like any other social process, has to be legitimated if it is to be continuous" (p. 113). Reposing societal facts in a United Nations data bank would obviate compromising national interests, witness Project Camelot. At the same time, Kardiner considers United States society unique in its possession of sufficient knowledge for self-correction (p. 188).

More than descriptions of total societies, what is being requested is a basic set of societal indicators which tap its major dimensions, particularly those of a changeful nature. Along these lines Tiryakian proposes three "lead indicators": (1) rates of urbanization as measures of institutional capacity, (2) rates in the distribution and public acceptance of sexual promiscuities as measures of egoistic anomie, and (3) rates in the outbreak of non-institutional religious phenomena as measures of the extent of sharing of and commitment to societal values (pp. 92-94). These may provide upwards of 30 years "early warning" of discontinuous societal changes impending—of "revolutionary potential." Again, Boulding speculates about "key roles" in a society, a point underscored in Kardiner's discussion of occupational and other institutional factors in individuals' life organization.

The selection of societal indicators raises inescapably the question of what is being indicated. and the position of such in a total societal model, Most comprehensive in this respect is Tirvakian's explicit societalization of Parsons' "systems problems" (AGIL) schema, an exchange model relating for any social system the functional problems of Adaptation (economy), Goal attainment (polity), Integration (family) and Latent-patternmaintenance-and-tension-management (religion). Tiryakian's focus on non-institutional religion as the source, symptom and symbol of societal change is novel and valuable. What seems missing from Parsons' model is an empirical input-output analysis, a system of "societal accounts" expanding on Leontief's economic activity analysis. Also conspicuous by its absence is further development of "structural-functional requisite analysis" as originally formulated by Levy himself and strongly seconded in Almond's "Introduction" to The Politics of Developing Areas. The recession from requisite analysis impairs what is perhaps the most systematically powerful and theoretically promising method of societal analysis available (Levy here devotes himself to an illuminating discussion of family structures as the strategic factor in total societal analysis; his collaboration with Coale, Westoff and others is the most fruitful to date between sociological theory and formal demography). On the other hand, Coleman's game approach and Pool's on simulation secure new ground for future exploitation, not only as techniques for data gathering and processing but also for model and theory construction.

In closing and I cannot fail to mention that the conference was held under the auspices of the Special Operations Research Office "as a part of SORO's long-term research interests in the problems of analyzing societies" (p. xv). The image of society entertained in government circles for purposes of policy formation and programming is of urgent concern in regard to both international relations (e.g., China) and national politics (e.g., President Johnson's "macropower" model of United States society and his style of private politics adapted to it, as recently commented on by Max Frankel). It would be interesting to learn what impact, if any, this conference has made in decision-making circles. For their part, academic specialists may conclude that societal analysis has considerable distance to go, even to reach "the actual design for the study of a concrete total society" which Klausner prophesies (p. 193). The general reader may conclude that the $1.25 Doubleday paperback edition (A 574) is a better investment. In any case, it cannot be said, as G. K. Chesterton said of Christianity, "the trouble is not that it was tried and found difficult, but that it was found difficult and not tried." The difficulties of societal analysis are apparent; however gropingly, the contributors at least tried.—C. P. Wolf, Brown University.

The Technological Society. By JACQUES ELLUL. (New York: Random House, 1967. Pp. xxxvi, 449. $2.45.)

This is a recently issued paperback edition of a work by a French sociologist that was first published in France in 1954. The translation by John Wilkinson is excellent.

Once the reader has adjusted his orientation away from the concept of "technique" as being synonymous with technology and "the technological society" as being about the same thing as the industrial state, it becomes apparent that Jacques Ellul has provided a commentary on the present state, of society and the direction in which it is heading that will stand as an important contribution to the sociological explanation of the deterministic influences that shape human actions and associations.

Ellul defines "technique" as the totality of methods rationally arrived at and having absolute efficiency in every field of human endeavor. With such a definition, it is no wonder that at times his use of the term is less than precise. In fact, the term is used so ubiquitously throughout the book it acquires an almost metaphysical connotation.

Technique changes not only the structure of states, but also political doctrines. The doctrines of traditional democracy—liberty, equality, personal rights—are not adaptable, Ellul believes, to the technological society, and they must give way to the great god efficiency, which is typified in practice by the dogma of the people's democracies. Doctrine, instead of providing goals and values, has come to serve the purpose of justification for the methods of the state and reinforcement of its role as the symbol and coordinator of technical progress. The technique causes the state to become all-encompassing and totalitarian.

There is no counterbalance to technique that Ellul can visualize. Every new cultural tendency that threatens to disturb the march toward progress is restrained by the forces of morality, public opinion, the social structure, and, above all, the state. These restraining forces are all instruments in the service of technique. Performance and efficiency, whether in an athletic contest or in economic planning, have become ends in and of themselves.

The role of the state in the development of technique, as Ellul sees it, is both indispensable and inevitable. It is the state with its vast resources and control mechanisms that coordinates the integration of technique with the traditional culture, and in the process the traditional culture is bent and twisted and carried along with the tide of progress. The traditional culture is of course, dehumanized in the process and relegated to a role as part of the supporting superstructure of the technological society.

It seems appropriate that this moving and sometimes emotional critique of the technological society should have been written by a citizen of France, one of the last great bastions of the traditional culture. De Gaulle, however, since 1958 has emphasized technical progress, and the momentum of technique has wrought a gradual but profound change on French society. This serves to reinforce the validity of Ellul's predictions.

Political socialization has come to mean a process of integration and adaptation to technical methodology in all aspects of societal activity, an adaptation that leaves the actor less of an individual. As Ellul describes it, the sacrifice of personal identity is accomplished unwittingly and as an almost natural transformation, with conformity to the standards of performance and productivity accepted as the price of socialization. Although these new standards appeal to technological man with promises of happiness and material comforts, they bring tensions, insecurity, and, in many ways, more serious problems than the ones they replace.

The author presents an eloquent and persuasive plea for man to retain control over his values and goals and to resist becoming the captive of a methodology that subverts humanism for the sake of efficiency. He foretells a grim future where the scientists offer happiness, but it is a happiness purchased at a tragic price to the individual, and a happiness that may even be a fraud induced by the use of sophisticated tranquilizing drugs. This is a pessimistic outlook, but Ellul holds out some hope that man may be able to anticipate his fate and take positive measures to alter it.

He strikes a responsive chord with many political scientists when he deplores the fact that even with all of the enormous power wielded by the scientists and technologists, they are incapable of anything but the emptiest platitudes when they stray from their specialities and enter the political dialogue. Unfortunately, unless the trend is changed these are the very men who will exert the greatest influence upon governmental planning in the future.—William R. Nelson, United States Air Force Academy.

The Elite in the Welfare State. By PIET THOENES. Ed. by J. A. Banks. Translated from the Dutch by J. E. Bingham. (New York: The Free Press, 1966. Pp. 236. $6.95.)

This work is a twofold enterprise. First comes a discursive treatment of historical efforts to systematize elite theory—including concise commentaries on Mannheim and Geiger as well as Mosca and Pareto. What follows is a stimulating but inconclusive analysis of the distinctive problems created by the emergence of the kind of politically-nurtured society we call the Welfare State and by the unavoidable presence of a functionary elite, convinced of their superiority as scientifically-trained specialists. Neither part is carried out systematically, nor is much empirical evidence marshalled by Thoenes. But his work is full of distinctive formulations and suggestions.

In contrast to the Lasswellian formula that elites are those who get the most of what there is to get, Thoenes holds that an elite emerges because its members view themselves as an elite They are a chosen people: they view themselves as superior. An elite is a group that has a special quality or a special mission to perform: the instrument of God, the vanguard of ineluctable historical forces, or the custodians of as much warranted knowledge of the universe and of humanity as has yet been achieved. Thoenes does not hold that every group saddled with the job of preserving the existing order is by definition an elite, but only that the sense of spiritual superiority and the sense of a socio-political mission to perform—the hallmarks of a self-conscious elite-are likely to be engendered, among other reasons, by a fear that letting go will lead to retrogression. Quite simply, lesser breeds cannot do the job.

Historically, when men came to feel their present situation was not the end-product of a divine plan, humanistic interpretations of history were put forward. Progressives and conservatives alike came to view the existing order as a phase, either the fruition or the germination phase of man's effort to create a reasoned social order. Historical elites set themselves specific tasks—to declare a message, to carry out a plan, to conserve an order. Yet it is sometimes easy for them to regard themselves as natural elites—whose superiority is timeless and whose mission is indispensable to the maintenance of a system.

The scientific elite in the twentieth century—including the social scientists—claims a key mission, sees itself as possessing a crucial intellectual superiority, and seeks power in order to introduce or preserve the spiritual values that ought to characterize the socio-political order. We do not yet have a clear understanding of what constraints shape man's efforts or what aspirations give them direction. But at least there is a method—the scientific method—for improving our understanding and clarifying our aims.

In the twentieth century, the Welfare State came into being in the West after crises, war and depression, when people knew "what they did not want: danger, hunger, thirst or cold, unemployment, dictatorships or squandering of either food or talents" (p. 133). Without abandoning the economic hallmarks of capitalism—private property and profits—and without forsaking democratic processes—free elections and party rule—a complex system of governmental controls and services was created and staffed. Through the Welfare State, the economy could be controlled and a guarantee of collective social care could be made to all citizens.

To do the job, a new elite emerged—"an elite of scientifically-trained officials, in government departments, in semi-official departments, serving with big firms, with trade unions, and with professional organizations" (p. 129). So long as the Welfare State functioned in a context of scarcity and under-employment, and so long as basic health, education, retirement and social welfare programs needed to be set up, the scientific "functionary elite" posed no basic threat to democracy. As a plan-fulfilling elite, needed in particular historical circumstances, the functionaries helped to articulate a distinctive political program. But now, as an order-maintaining elite, the functionaries are inclined to justify their prerogatives as due to natural superiority. Politically, nobody propagates the Welfare State very enthusiastically; to each it seems like a makeshift haliway house. Nevertheless, it does perpetuate itself, as a system based on the avoidance of fatal social and economic tensions. And the experts who man the system are reasonably confident that it can continue to be a workable system. "Hence, in this system they are a natural elite. Their special task is to preserve the new order" (p. 188). And control over their actions rests with people who only occasionally and by chance are competent to judge them.

With this diagnosis, it is not surprising that Thoenes calls the functionary elite illegal, a blindfold to science and a halter to democracy. The scientific community must also be blamed, so long as it holds to its pretensions to objectivity, turns away from controversial social problems, and relies uncritically on a static picture. He calls for more deeply-probing social science inquiries, which frankly aim to stimulate political awareness. He calls for a politicized sociology, whose practitioners must be a new elite—an intelligentsia that dares to take responsibility and that formulates a free range of choices about the shape of a new society.—Dwaine Marvick, University of California, Los Angeles.

The Revolutionary Personclity: Lenin, Trotsky, Gandhi. By E. Victor Wolfenstein. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. x, 330. $7.50.)

Freud might have been referring to the difficulties of political psychobiography when he observed, in an essay on Dostovevsky in 1928, that "Before the problem of the creative artist analysis must, alas, lay down its arms." The problem of the politician and statesman is hardly less complicated, which may be why Freud himself did not attempt such analyses (excluding the highly controversial book, with Bullitt, on Woodrow Wilson to which he may or may not have contributed), although there is a sense in which his Moses and Monotheism can be regarded as a political psychobiography. The complications include the reluctance of political figures to expose themselves to public view during or after their lifetimes; they are notoriously a secretive lot, and any inkblots they have inadvertantly left behind are usually wiped clean by their loyal posterity. Crucial childhood experiences may not be remembered or recorded, and those that have not been lost may be reworked into memories of a childhood-that-never-was. And even if the past can be traced, at least in part, there is no certainty that Early Events A, B, and C were responsible for Later Events X, Y, and Z. For these reasons no completely satisfactory political psychobiography has yet been written, and it is not likely that any will be written until better techniques are developed for recapturing life histories and forging links between the experiences of childhood and adolescence and the later political behavior.

Almost all efforts to write political psychobiography, nevertheless, are to be welcomed, because without such explorations we are not likely to know or even be able to guess much that is important about certain key figures. While most political leaders neither require nor merit a psychobiography, the form is particularly appropriate when we are dealing with odd or deviant political careers. Thus right and left extremists—that is, leaders who depart sharply from the conventional political beliefs and behaviors of their eras-are especially suitable subjects for psychobiography. Those who suffer from psychosomatic illness, or whose afflictions are known to affect decision-making processes, are also eligible, as are alcoholics and those whose careers end in suicide. Another category includes political actors who compulsively (it appears) and therefore more or less consistently snatch defeat from the jaws of victory-the phenomenon of the "born loser" in politics has never been explored-and those who invariably transmute defeats into victories. Finally, there are the politicians who careen back and forth on the spectrum of ideologies and parties, or whose political belief systems seem totally divorced from the values operating in their private worlds. Anyone will think of names to fit these categories, and it may be hoped that the half dozen or so political psychobiographies so far written will not long be stranded on the bookshelf.

Professor Wolfenstein's study of Lenin, Trotsky, and Gandhi is a worthy addition to that small number although, like the others, it is not and could not be wholly successful, given his approach and the inevitable complications referred to above. The "common characteristic" of the three revolutionaries, according to Wolfenstein, was that each "carried with him into his adult life unfinished business with his parental generation. Each carried a burden of guilt he had been unable to relieve in the context of the family or, in Gandhi's case, in the context of the family extended to include his wife. Each had to come to grips with a primitive image of parental authority." But such conditions are not enough to cause revolutionary involvement. The necessary catalyst in all three cases was the harshness of treatment accorded them by the established political order, a harshness that included imprisonment, discrimination on account of color or religion, the execution of a close relative (Lenin's brother), and other repressive acts. Wolfenstein appears to be saying, in short, that guilt and unresolved internal psychological conflicts, especially unresolved Oedipal situations, plus aggressive treatment by established authority set the stage for the revolutionary personality.

The application of this equation to the lives of Lenin, Trotsky, and Gandhi illustrates the promise and the limitations of psychoanalysis as a tool for exploring political behavior. On the one hand, psychoanalysis can provide us with a psychodynamic explanation of how it is that the early life experiences of some individuals cause them to reject ordinary career choices in favor of major roles as political or religious leaders, and surely such explanations are essential to an understanding of the great traumatic events of history. But on the other hand, psychoanalysis in its present state is a rather crude device for exploring the behavior of leaders long since dead. Because it is one of the younger behavioral sciences-it is, after all, less than thirty years since the death of Freud-it is racked by disputes over theory and technique, and if there is some doubt both inside and outside the profession that it has much to offer the living patient on the couch, there is even more doubt that it can be effectively applied to the deceased statseman in his tomb who literally has taken his dreams and fantasies, his Oedipus complex and identity crisis, with him.

Hence Wolfenstein is not altogether convincing when he suggests that Lenin's "basically mistrustful nature"—a characterization that would be questioned by some authorities—may have dated back to the birth of his sister Olga when he was two years old, and that Lenin's failure to walk until he was three possibly derived from his having been "uncertain about how his environment would react." Trotsky's indecision and hesitation at certain crucial moments, on the other hand, are traced to internal conflicts in childhood and adolescence that were more complex than those of Lenin, conflicts that included contradictory feelings about his father (Trotsky allegedly was torn between being his father's favorite son and hating his father). Gandhi, who loved his mother and both respected and feared his father, suffered all of his life from guilt and anxiety partly because the "aim to be like the father implies overturning the father, which in turn leads to anxiety and guilt." Because Gandhi was having sexual intercourse with his pregnant wife when his father died, Wolfenstein hypothesizes that in Gandhi's mind the intercourse was held responsible for his father's death and the death four days after birth of the infant. Gandhi himself, in his Autobiography, confesses to his "great shame" aroused by these incidents, but is Wolfenstein justified in suggesting that Gandhi unconsciously regarded the sexual activity and the deaths as connected? Gandhi's own reference to the baby's death is almost an afterthought, and while he eventually did renounce sex in favor of abstinence, it was not until twenty years after his father's death when he was thirty-six years old. And it was then, he writes, not because of shame and guilt, but because he was opposed to contraception and wanted no more children (he and his wife had had four).

Much of this may appear to be "nit-picking," but it is well to keep in mind that it is the nits in psychoanalysis, the seemingly trivial episodes to which, at the time, little importance may be attached, that often supply the principal clues to personality development. Indeed, it is in these and other guilt-generating events that Wolfenstein finds the sources of Gandhi's later commitment to passive resistance or non-violent action, viewed by Wolfenstein as "the indirect expression of almost overwhelming guilt—and vigorous self-assertion."

Of course, he may be right in this interpretation; the point is, given the present state of psychoanalysis and the paucity of information, there is no way of ascertaining whether Wolfenstein has brilliantly illuminated the whole personality landscape of his three revolutionaries. It is a fair comment, however, that many psychoanalysts whose own work is no less enterprising would regard his use of psychoanalytic theory as rather pedantic, mechanical, and old-fashioned; a prime example is his contention that Gandhi's campaign against the salt tax may have had something to do with the fact that, according to Ernest Jones, salt is symbolically significant as semen, hence Gandhi's personal renunciation of salt (sex) in his diet and desire to claim for the Indians tax-free salt manufacturing rights (potency, virility, self-respect, etc.).

Wolfenstein may also be unduly simplifying in casting Lenin as the most effective administrator, Trotsky as the most impressive agitator, and Gandhi as surpassing the others in charismatic appeal. Lenin, according to contemporary accounts, possessed considerable charisma, and Trotsky was an extremely skilled military administrator and litterateur. It is arguable that Wolfenstein does not attach enough importance to the so-called catalytic or precipitating agents—the fact, for example, that when Trotsky was a boy Jews in Russia were restricted to a certain territory (the Pale), forbidden to take up certain professions, prohibited from owning land, and limited to quotas (the numerus clausus) of from three to ten per cent at schools and universities. The coincidence that all three revolutionaries suffered from stomach trouble (Trotsky attributed his own "chronic catarrh"-could it have been an incipient ulcer?-to "nervous shocks") is not explored.

These reservations, however, do not fundamentally detract from Wolfenstein's daring and impressive achievement in elucidating, at long range and under considerable difficulties, the personality patterns of three of the most significant figures in the twentieth century. Perhaps what is needed most now in the developing field of political psychobiography are psychoanalytic case histories of political men to clarify relationships between the early experiences and later careers. It is no secret that a number of men in public life have been psychoanalyzed or have visited psychiatrists; is it too much to hope that some of them, in the interests of behavioral science research, will authorize their doctors to make their case histories available after their deaths? Much could be learned from such histories that would lend depth and precision to studies of the type Wolfenstein has attempted. In the meantime, Wolfenstein may be congratulated for succeeding in his effort to frame tentative hypotheses about revolutionary personalities, and by so doing to remind us that the study of politics can not and will not be complete without psychological analysis.—Arnold A: Rogow, City University of New York.

The Political Consequences of Electoral Laws. By Douglas W. Rae. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1967. Pp. xii, 173. $5.00.)

Douglas Rae has produced a succinct comparative study of a classic question: How much difference do the rules make? The rules of concern are those which regulate the translation of voters' choices at the polls into partisan shares of seats in a legislative chamber. The objective of the analysis is to assess the consequences for the party system, specifically the competition among parties, of the structural variables we know as electoral laws. Rae's study is distinguished by its careful empiricism, its comparative focus, and its lack of theoretical pretension.

Roughly a third of the text is devoted to developing the variables and classification scheme used in the subsequent analyses. Rae gives a careful qualitative treatment of the major properties of electoral laws in the twenty Western democracies covered by his study. The result is a classification of the laws by the rules for assigning seats to districts (district magnitude), the rules governing the form of choice available to voters (ordinal or categorical ballots depending on the non-exclusive or exclusive choice required of the voter), and the rules specifying the translation of votes to seats (electoral formulae). The discussion of electoral formulae is extraordinarily compressed and will require close reading by one unfamiliar with different voting systems. The major distinction in formulae is, of course, that obtaining between plurality decision rules and the variety of proportional representation schemes. The principal distinction developed within the class of P. R. formulae is between "highest average" and "largest remainder" seat allocation rules. Electoral formulae are designed to deal with an inherently quantitative problem and Rae introduces a convenient notation to facilitate his comparative discussion.

The second half of Rae's methodological problem is developing descriptive measures for party systems. The choice of variables is dictated by a concern with party competition and by the data on which analyses are based. The data are aggregate election returns and the resulting distributions of partisan legislative seats for 121 lower house elections occurring between January 1, 1945 and January 1, 1965, Rae's strategy is to develop a set of parallel variables which can be used to measure a property of the party in the electorate, and simultaneously, an analogous property of the party in parliament. This strategy results in five dual variables: number of parties, competitive share of the strongest party, competitive share of the strongest two parties, fractionalization of the party system, and average change of shares between two elections. To these is added the variable of minimal number of parties required for a parliamentary majority. The most interesting of these variables is the measure of party fractionalization. It reflects both the number of parties and the distribution of seat or vote shares among the parties in one well-behaved quantity.

The simplicity of the variables is deceptive. The tools Rae fashions are designed for a particular comparative task and when applied do their work well. The basic analytic device is to compare party electoral vote outcomes with the resulting party share of parliamentary seats. This is done initially with no variation in electoral law categories to demonstrate the common effects of electoral systems. Next, plurality and P.R. formulae are compared to demonstrate differences in effect, not of kind but of degree, and a brief treatment of some special cases is given. Finally, the consequences for parties of district magnitude and ballot structure are examined. The results of analysis are set off in the text as propositions and these are brought together in an appendix.

Rae demonstrates that the consequences of electoral laws conform to the rule "them that has, gets," although the advantages to large parties are not of startling magnitude. On the other hand, the fundamental role assigned to majority rule in parliaments magnifies these mild effects into consequences of considerable significance for parties. For example, of 42 one-party parliamentary majorities, 27 were the result of electoral laws translating electoral minorities into parliamentary majorities. The British case is relatively well known but it is surprising to note the frequency of the phenomenon and also that it is widespread, not being restricted to systems operating under plurality electoral formulae.

There are many other generalizations in this monograph, not all surprising, but invariably analyzed and evaluated with great care. Perhaps of greatest general interest is the evaluation of Duverger's "sociological law" connecting multi-partism with electoral formulae. Duverger comes off well. Those who are interested in political engineering may find some results uncomfortable for they imply the impossibility of simultaneously realizing certain goals. Three classes of scholars, however, must own this book—those who concern themselves with politics in Western liberal democracies, those who specialize in political parties, and those who focus on elections and electoral politics.

Some political scientists will be disappointed in the author's decision to avoid extensive treatment of particular cases or discussion of system properties he did not measure. Rae casts this as a choice between literature and science and opts for the latter thus restricting himself to only those statements his analysis will support. The resulting product is a tightly reasoned and sharply focused empirical treatment of a classic political problem.

—John Sprague, Washington University, St. Louis.

Politics and Communication. By RICHARD R. FAGEN. (Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1966. Pp. x, 156.)

Content Analysis of Communications. By RICHARD W. Budd, Robert K. Thorp, and Lewis Dono-Hew. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1967. Pp. x. 142. $5.95.)

In current political analysis, the researcher is faced with the problem of dwindling field resources. Political officials are confronted with an increasing volume of interviewers, foreign governments are looking askance at foreigners asking prying questions of their citizens and officials. In this growing desert, there is one area of growth and increasing attention—Communications. Each nation, government official, department, governing unit, etc., pours out a greater mass of written, spoken and visual communications every year. As media technology improves, access to these materials also increases. The problem becomes one of developing analysis techniques and methods to process this data as well as evolving necessary propositions, hypotheses and definitions in this area. These two books offer different introductions into this field.

Richard Fagen considers communications as one theoretical tool to facilitate insight into the political process. His view of communications is the familiar model of Wilbur Schramm which is based on information processing. Relating this model to the Lasswellian paradigm, "Who Gets What, etc.," Fagen examines political information. He discusses the various channels through which information moves and the association of these channels in a communications network, relating the structure of this network to the functional approach to politics. Various recent surveys including the work done on the Kennedy assassination and the Almond-Verba work, help illustrate and categorize the content of information. Probably the most interesting chapter in the book is devoted to communications and change. Here Fagen presents and discusses two models, the Deutsch exogenous change model and the endogenous model arrived at during some of Fagen's own work on Cuba. Finally, Fagen poses some of the political problems in media growth, increased technology and massive communications volume. Here he tends to consider communications as those things connected with mass media or socialization.

Fagen's work is not a comprehensive treatment of politics and the communications field. Rather, it represents a survey of some of the more interesting instances of recent note where the fields have overlapped. Much current work is being done, for instance, with the problem of international images which he treats in his discussion of information content. As an introduction to current theory and research, the book provides a variety of information and some synthesis. It is unfortunate that Fagen's survey has an absence of references to other communications work. Much of interest for politics is being done today by sociologists on the problem of meaning, by psychologists and anthropologists on language, and by engineers and mechanics on the communications process. In spite of its limitations, this remains a valuable introduction to the complex field and a good look at some recent research.

Both books under consideration here begin with Schramm's model. From that point on they are completely different. Budd, Thorp and Donohew have written that rare tool for analysts, a cookbook with valuable recipes for content analysis. To them communications is a process which must be dissected and explained. To do this one particularly valuable tool is content analysis and the authors propose to instruct the uninitiated in a step-by-step way to use this method. They begin with hypothesis formulation where they reveal their preoccupation with mass media and journalism (they are all in schools of journalism or communications). Then they discuss sampling, measurement, and categories, in minute detail including most of the problems a student faces doing research. They consider sample size, show how to use a random number table, define stratification, explain coding, illustrate category development, etc. In short, they consider most of the problems encountered by a researcher in his initial attempt at work of this kind. An especially good section deals with reliability and validity, problems which plague any communications research. The authors review some of the major solutions to these problems offered by Osgood, Holsti and others while discussing alternatives of research. In their section on analysis, the authors simply offer a few of the many varieties of statistical techniques applicable to studies they propose. Obviously where so many techniques apply and there are ample illustrative possibilities some selection had to be made. But instead of presenting a few techniques, omitting such major areas as analysis of variance, and a few examples, the authors might better have discussed the process by which a researcher in this area chooses among statistical techniques and analytic methods. It is only in the last chapter of the book, a brief five pages that the authors consider content analysis by computer. With today's access to machinery and the tendency for large amounts of data, the majority of content analytic studies are going to be computer processed. Although most of the topics apply to any research of this sort, it is apparent that actual research will be computer directed. This leaves the user with the question, if the computer is used how do the authors' considerations have to be modified. In spite of these problems, the book is a valuable tool which is much needed for current work. As political analysis becomes more productive in the communications area, these books should provide a stimulus for research work and further, theoretical offerings.—Ellen B. Pirro, University of Minne-

Political Representation in England and the Origins of the American Republic. By J. R. Pole. (London: The Macmillan Company, 1966. Pp. xvii, 606. $16.50.)

This is a very scholarly analysis of the theory of suffrage, majority rule and representative government in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in England, the American colonies of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, and in the United States during its formative period by a reader in American history and government at the University of Cambridge who has spent considerable time teaching and studying in the United States. Dr. Pole begins by analyzing the political theories of James Harrington, Algernon Sydney, and John Locke. He next discusses the impact of the ideas of these theorists on the development of political institutions of the three colonies and later the three states that he selected for intensive analysis. He traces the influence of Harrington on the thinking of John Adams and William Penn and the influence of John Locke on Thomas Jefferson. In a final chapter he compares the evolution of ideas and institutions in the eight jurisdictions which he has selected. He relates the theories of suffrage, majority rule and representation to the rights and functions of local governments, landed and property rights, and individual rights. He describes how "interest representation" displaced the old notion of representation of estates.

In a brief review it is impossible to do justice to the wide range of learning and the penetrating insights contained in this lively-written volume. Dr. Pole has done his research well in the archives of New England, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and other parts of the United States. He has also done a fine job on the English archives. An Appendix furnishes election statistics on Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina from eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In a felicitous manner, Dr. Pole has combined political philosophy and detailed description of political and electoral behavior on the basis of widely scattered historical materials available.—HAROLD F. GOSNELL, Howard University.

The Moral and Political Tradition of Rome. By Donald Earl. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1967. Pp. 1,167. $4.95.)

Professor Earl has written a book about the "moral and political tradition of Rome." On the basis of what he has written, it is interesting to examine what he conceives to be the essence of that tradition, that is, the moral and political components of that tradition. At the outset, Earl makes three assumptions which dictate his eventual conclusions and totally constrain his scope of investigation. One, a moral and political tradition exists only with respect to the nobility and/or those portions of other classes which from time to time intrude into the ruling oligarchy. Two, one assesses a moral and political tradition on the basis of belief rather than behavior. And, three, the essence of that tradition is contained in a few summary concepts, the meaning of which one can examine overtime to determine the continuity and variation which occurs in the tradition.

Depending on what one wants from the book, these assumptions may or may not be detrimental. If one wants only a description of some basic Roman beliefs over time (e.g., virtus, gloria, nobilitas, and respublica) expressed through the extant writings of the major Roman writers and historians (e.g., Sallust, Cicero, Polyibus, Cato, Virgil, Horace, Livy, Marcellus, and Augustine) then the book is perfectly adequate. If, however, one wishes to investigate the manner in which certain beliefs and values affect the political world in which they exist, then the above assumptions are quite inhibiting and the book somewhat of a major disappointment. One should hasten to acknowledge that Earl is a Classicist, not a political scientist, and that he is obviously writing for different purposes than that for which he is being read. Still, the question here is to what degree such a book is useful to political scientists; consequently such questions, though hard on the author, are still appropriate.

Let us therefore examine the affect of the above assumptions on this particular exercise. First, it is not unusual to find scholars (especially historians) who treat the literary remains of a given aristocracy as evidence of the motivating values of a particular political system in a given period of time. In this respect then, Earl's description of the presumed dominant values of the ruling oligarchy as indicative of the "moral and political tradition" stands in good company. But if one is writing for any other purpose than the purely descriptive (and such is rarely the case), to make this assumption is to implicitly adopt a very simple, naive theory of politics, one which would, if made explicit, rarely if ever be defended by the same authors. Such a theory would assume, of course, that other groups outside of the political and/or social and cultural oligarchy are unimportant to the study of a "moral and political tradition." From other kinds of evidence, we know that this is obviously not the case. The urban mass of Rome was always an important factor of Roman politics. As the Republic gave way to the Empire, it became increasingly clear that the values and attitudes of a variety of groups outside the oligarchy, administrators, the army, allied citizenries, were as important to the continuance of Roman power as were those of the oligarchy. The consummate skill of the Roman Empire was organization, perfected to a degree unmatched in the Western world prior to the industrial revolution. This organizational skill, a central part of the political, if not the moral, tradition of Rome, was to a significant degree held and transmitted by groups other than the dominant oligarchy. In sum, by studying only the values and beliefs of the dominant oligarchies, Earl is forced to ignore other kinds of values and beliefs (such as the beliefs of the urban mass as to what constituted a legitimate government) which are useful for explaining the course of Roman History.

Second, one must ask of this, as of all intellectual histories, what does one know of a political tradition if one knows only the values upon which it is ostensibly predicated? As we are only too aware, professions of value, especially when stated in the abstract, frequently differ from practices. One wonders especially about the relevance of the views of a Virgil or a Horace in the assessment of a moral and political tradition. That powerful figures in art are frequent contributors and critics of the moral language of an age is acknowledged; that they are representative of the motivating intellectual tradition of an age is a subject for considerable empirical research.

And, finally, given the above two caveats, what is the significance of tracing this intellectual development over eight centuries through the medium of a few basic summary concepts? At the least we are forced to accept the word of the expert, in this case Professor Earl, that these are the ideas central to Roman thought. But, again, one is sceptical about the relevance of these particular ideas with respect to others which might be equally interesting for suggesting how the Roman Republic and Empire sustained themselves over such an extended period of time.

In sum, Professor Earl has presented us with a pleasant, descriptive statement of what he calls the Roman idea, a set of beliefs characteristic of Roman civilization, beliefs presumably of high relevance for understanding the moral and political tradition of Rome. Political scientists, I fear, will find the definition of what constitutes the political a bit thin.—Deane E. Neubauer, University of California, Irvine.

Peter and Caesar: The Catholic Church and Political Authority. By E. A. Georner. (New York: Herder and Herder, 1965. Pp. 282. $5.95.)

Professor Goerner has written a good preparatory discussion of the relations of church and state. It is good in that it expresses learning and distinction of mind. It is merely preparatory, however, in that it provides little more than an introduction to the problems with which it is concerned. It concentrates on the Catholic Church. And, contrary perhaps to the aims of the author, it does not arrive at the kind of broad, ultimate principles that constitute political theory.

The contents of the book are easily described. They consist in descriptive and critical comments concerning several theories of church-state relations, these covering an historical and philosophical range as wide as that bounded by Giles of Rome and John Courtney Murray. The final three chapters of the book are the author's own reflections. These in general are on the side of a Church which uncompromisingly stands by the faith in its own infallibility in matters of doctrine and teaching but gives up the lingering notion that the "special graces" of its clergy fit them for political sovereignty.

Professor Goerner skillfully summarizes and criticizes the thinkers whom he considers. He is graceful and judicious. And he is concerned with a great problem: not simply the relations of the Catholic Church and the state, but also the spiritual quality of earthly society. He powerfully expresses his apprehension of this problem, and suggests a noble conception of the political role of the Catholic clergy, when he asks of the Church, "Is it too much to hope that it discover a mode whereby it might give new birth and sustenance to statesmen who could speak with such a voice as spoke in Lincoln's Second Inaugural? Is it too much to hope that it discover a mode whereby it might give new birth and sustenance to a people that could hearken to such a voice?"

Professor Goerner's central problem, however, is that of obviating the hierocratic principles which seem to follow from the infallibility claimed by the Church. He emphatically resists such principles, but it does not seem to this reviewer that he found any solid philosophical ground on which to do so. His main contention seems to be that the sanctity of the Church does not imply any special political competence. But does it not? Can political matters be cleanly severed from the moral and theological matters on which the Church is, according to Catholic faith, infallible? Can an institution with unconditional authority in morals and faith be denied such authority in politics? At several points in the book Professor Goerner seems to rely simply on the practical impossibility of instituting hierocratic regimes in the twentieth century. Yet he is clearly aware that this is a consideration without weight as political theory.

The traditional claims of the Catholic Church can be reconciled with the idea of freedom, if at all, only through the idea of a community embracing Catholics and all others. Why should Catholics speak and listen to obdurate non-Catholics? In the absence of a philosophical answer to this question it seems that proposals for institutional reorganization, such as Professor Goerner discusses at length, cannot be of much avail. Peter and Caesar explores the borders of this realm of speculation but hardly enters it.

Among the chief problems in this realm are the nature of truth and the manner in which it is known. In one of his few reckless statements Professor Goerner asserts, in an attack on "Victorian superficialities," that "after Auschwitz, Mill is irrelevant." But one of the reasons for thinking Mill is not irrelevant—especially after Auschwitz—is that he wrote a humane and moving essay on liberty, part of which was a meditation on the relationship of men to the truth. Can an organization claim to be infallible and still engage in genuine communication? This is the sort of question Mill reflected on in his essay On Liberty and Professor Goerner will surely have to join in such reflection if he continues to work upon these problems.

And if men who care for freedom must consider the nature of truth, Christians who care for freedom must devote particular attention to the nature of Christian truth. In what way is it different from scientific truth? Can it be fully and accurately embodied in words? Christianity is a religion of love and thus of community; yet Christians have not been very good at entering into community with, as distinguished from imposing their faith upon, non-Christians. Tolerance has flourished only as faith has waned. In an effort to moderate the monarchical structure of the Catholic Church Professor Goerner suggests, on the grounds that grace is not restricted to the clergy, the idea of the priesthood of all members of the Church. But the problem he is concerned with points to the idea of a priesthood reaching beyond Catholic laymen and even beyond all believers. If a Christian is fully in earnest about entering into community with all men must he not go so far as to entertain the notion that there is in some sense a priesthood of non-believers?

Professor Goerner suggests that excommunication should not be commanded without lay assent. But—to take the concept of excommunication in its literal sense—can a Christian ever have adequate grounds for so drastic an act as severing communication with another human being?

Such questions of course open heretical doors. But does the concept of heresy have any place in a religion of love (and thus of openness to all men), in a religion of humility (thus alive to the imperfection of all human doctrines), in a religion of faith in the sovereignty and indefeasibility of God's address to men?

Liberal Christians must open these heretical doors, even if only to allow them to be closed again in the assurance that their use will not contribute to freedom and unrestricted community. And it will be well if this is done by scholars with the learning, the seriousness, and the analytical skill which are manifest, despite its failure to dwell upon the most radical questions, in Peter and Caesar.—Glenn Tinder, University of Massachusetts, Boston.

History of Indian Social and Political Ideas—From Rammohun to Dayananda. By BIMANBEHARI MAJUMDAR. (Calcutta: Bookland Private Ltd., 1967. Pp. xi, 332. Thirty rupees.)

For some thirty years now, an item entitled, History of Political Thought from Rammohun to Dayananda, 1821-84, Volume I: Bengal (Calcutta, 1934) by Bimanbehari Majumdar has been staring at me from my library shelves. I have often wondered what Professor Majumdar did with his projected second volume. Comes now this new title with the author's prefatory explanation that "The present volume completes the work undertaken in 1931, possibly establishing a record in perseverance or procrastination as may diversely be interpreted by friendly or hostile critics." Two questions present themselves immediately: How does the new work relate to the earlier study? What effect has the thirty-three year delay had on the quality of the final product?

The present work is not entirely new. Eight of its fourteen chapters are a revised version of the original Volume I, with identical chapter titles. Of these, seven are substantially unchanged, while the chapter on "The Muslim School of Political Thought" is thoroughly recast and extended, to give a greatly improved picture of muslim ideas. The new compilation adds an introductory chapter on "The State and Society-the Problem of Social Reform," and another on "Social Thinkers and Reformers of the pre-Congress Era." The author thus justifies his use of the new title. History of Indian Social and Political Ideas, which, he states in his Preface, was advisable because "the condition prevailing in the last century in this country made it impossible to separate these two aspects." Finally, in response to the implied promise of the 1934 volume, he has added four chapters, covering Western India, South India, and Davananda and Harischandra in the North. The author's new Introduction puts the whole in much better perspective than did the prefatory material of Volume I.

As to the effect of a third of a century delay in bringing out the final version of this study of the 1821-84 period: The later chapters appear to be in the same style and consistent with the earlier sections. From the perspective of the present, however, there is a distinct aura about these discussions which savors of earlier times. Bacon, Bentham, Blackstone, Calvin, Hobbes, John Stuart Mill, Proudhon, Rousseau and Spencer are the principal Western theorists cited. This is all in the spirit of the nineteenth century British India of which Majumdar writes. Marx is mentioned only once: to point out that Das Kapital had not been translated into English and was therefore not mentioned by Bankimchandra when he wrote his Samya. It is instructive of the profound change in the premises and issues and personages of political thought during the last century to read through the dialogues of the Victorian era in India which this volume presents.

The author has provided a wealth of historical insights. In a passage on the nineteenth century he comments that "the proper climate necessary for propounding political philosophy was totally absent in India . . . Intellectual leaders . . . took recourse to journalism, therefore, as the vehicle of expression. A major portion of the social and political ideas of India . . . is to be found in the . . . journals owned and edited by Indians" Davananda, is, of course, an exception and the author gives an excellent analysis of the Swami's contributions and his relationship to Rammohun Rov. Despite a style which may strike the reader as a bit flowery at times (Roy: "the great Vedantist... one of the earliest champions of the noble ideal of international co-operation"; Dayananda: "the Rishi or Divine Seer of modern India,") he is capable of sharp critical evaluation of leading writers—a quality sometimes lacking in other Indian historians of the period. He quotes, for instance, the now discredited theories of Indian political thought held by K. P. Jayaswal and says that he seems to support Dayananda's views on kingship and dictatorship. But he is very careful not to assume that such views are valid and, in fact, refers to Dayananda's claims of "Republicanism in the Vedas" as the product of "distorted vision." In summary, the book is well written, informed, scholarly. It presents a most useful analysis of the period, richly larded with citations from contemporary sources.

Professor Majumdar is well known to South Asian scholars, having served as President of the Indian Political Science Association and written or edited various works, including Public Administration in India, The Gandhian Concept of the State, and Militant Nationalism in India. It is to be hoped that the projected two volume History of Social and Political Ideas from Ranade to Nehru, completing the series of studies from 1821-1964 (which Majumdar advises us is to be brought out by the same publisher) will now be promptly available.—D. Mackenzie Brown, Prescott College.

Russian Political Thought: An Introduction. By THORNTON ANDERSON. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1967. Pp. xiii, 444. $9.75.)

"Political thought" can mean two things—what politicians think, or what thinkers say about politics. Professor Anderson's history of political thought in Russia is devoted almost exclusively to the first kind, but of necessity: the history of Russia is singularly deficient among great nations in the production of original and significant treatises on the nature of government. From Kievan to Soviet times, public political discussions in Russia have been almost exclusively confined to sloganeering and propagandizing, whether by the government or the opposition. It is as though the history of American political thought had to be written from provincial editorials and Washington news releases.

Professor of Government at the University of Maryland, Thornton Anderson has shifted, after some eminent work in the history of American political theory, to the field of Russian intellectual history. He recently edited a useful anthology, Masters of Russian Marxism (New York, 1963). In the work under review, he has produced a most readable and well-organized introduction to the history of political ideology and controversy in Russia. With its copious Western-language bibliography, Russian Political Thought will be an excellent text for courses in general political theory or Soviet government where an account of the opinions of Russia's leaders, pre- and post-revolutionary, is desired with a good deal of historical context. Of systematic philosophical depth, on the other hand, there is very little, particularly in Anderson's section on the Soviet period. Even where Lenin's State and Revolution invites some exposition and critique, the author slows down for no more than a couple of paragraphs of summary.

The thesis emerging from Professor Anderson's pages and re-affirmed in his conclusion is the inseparable link of Russian political thought, as ideology, with the concerns of governmental power. Such were the political formulations of the Orthodox Church, the messianic pretensions of the Muscovite Tsars, and the ethereal reform notions of the eighteenth century, which Anderson pursues chronologically for the first third of his book. The same was true for the nineteenth century, with the difference that various schools of opposition-Anderson has chapters on Westerners, Slavophils, Anarchists, Populists, Liberals, and Marxists-declaimed their views along with the Official Ideology of Orthodoxy-Autocracy-Nationality. And the Soviet period (comprising the last quarter or so of the book) saw a return to the one official belief, enforced with all the authority of the state.

Marxism, Anderson feels, fitted in psychologically with the Russian bent for messianic commitment despite its logical incompatibility with the revolutionary movement of a backward country where the bourgeoisie had been too weak to accomplish its own revolution. The Russian Marxists (even Plekhanov, Anderson points out) had to contrive a rationale for the party of the proletariat to accomplish the bourgeois revolution, a prospect that did considerable violence to the prescriptions of historical materialism. They were Anderson observes, "under pressure from the urgencies of the revolutionary movement to deny strict economic determinism and to act through politics without being unduly restrained by the backwardness of the national economy. The habits acquired and the theories that justified them led ultimately to Lenin's explicit assertion of the priority of politics over economics and to Stalin's idea of revolution from above."

On the Bolsheviks and the Soviet period Anderson is on firm ground in stressing the subordination of theory to practice and the subjection of political doctrine to constant manipulation. There are some unfortunate omissions of independent and interesting people-Bogdanov and the prerevolutionary Left Bolsheviks, and the legal theorists of the 1920's and '30's. But the principal controversies of the 1920's are well described, and the maneuvers of Stalin and Khrushchev are recognized for what they are, even to the extent of Khrushchev's amendment of the theoretical triumph of Communism to exclude any Soviet obligation to give aid to China. Anderson wisely cautions against the notion that the Soviets have cynically abandoned theory: "It is important to remember that, at each step along the way, the new departures were integrated into the remaining fabric of Marxist theory. This was accomplished through a polemical process of exceptional vigor, which set a pattern that continues to prevail in international Communism. A new orthodoxy was established, again connected with the government but standing above it and not below it as the Orthodox Church had stood."—R. V. DANIELS, University of Vermont.

VMarx in the Mid-Twentieth Century: A Yugoslav Philosopher Reconsiders Karl Marx's Writings. By Gajo Petrovic. (New York: Doubleday & Company, 1967, Pp. 237. $1.25.)

The task that Petrovic sets for himself in this collection of essays is "to penetrate to the essence of Marx's original thought and to think further in its spirit about the momentous philosophical questions of the contemporary world and man."

In Part I. Petrovic deals both directly and indirectly with the first half of this task; the penetration of the rigid dogmatism of Stalinism that has surrounded some Marxist philosophy, to the essence of Marx's original thought. The "original" Marx is not to be confused with the "young" Marx, however, since Petrovic rejects any analysis that does not acknowledge the essential unity of Marx's thought. Capital and Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts possess "an essential identity" in that they represent a philosophical critique that is based on a concept of man as a "free creative being of praxis." The deficiency of Stalinism, therefore, lies not only in its rejection of Marx's early writings but also in its distortion of his later works.

According to Petrovic, the return from Stalin to Marx is a return from a system of philosophical dogma to a "creative Marxism" that questions old solutions and new problems. The duty of a renewed Marxist philosophy, then, is to critically expand Marx's thought to include new realities and to examine new philosophical trends "in the spirit of Marx." This is the second half of the task Petrovic has set for himself, and the rest of his book is devoted to essays which attempt to explore the possibilities of applying a renewed, critical, creative Marxism to various questions about man and the contemporary world.

Thus in Part II, in what is probably the most interesting section of the book, Petrovic deals with the topics of "Marx's Concept of Man," "Man as Economic Animal and Man as Praxis," "What is Freedom," "Alienation and De-alienation," and "Philosophy and Politics in Socialism." A review of this length cannot do justice to the wealth of detail and interesting comment in these essays, but a brief summary of some of Petrovic's conclusions will indicate the direction of his argument.

Among other things, Petrovic rejects the idea that man, according to Marx, is an "economic animal" whose "entire activity is determined by the economic sphere of his existence." He sees Marx instead as emphasizing man as a "universal, creative and self-creative social being." In his essay on "What is Freedom" the author commits himself to a view of freedom as self-determination in repudiation of those who consider freedom to be either the knowledge of necessity or the absence of external restraints on activity. In line with this argument, Petrovic also claims that the problem of "de-alienation" cannot be reduced to the problem of social transformation or the abolition of private property as some "Marxists" have claimed. He does not think it possible that a social system could be created that would automatically produce non-alienated individuals. De-alienation results from an individual's own activity and not from some external source.

Finally, in Part III, Petrovic examines certain apparently epistemological and ontological topics; "What is Meaning," "Truth and Reflection," "Praxis and Being," "Logic and Mathematics." He reviews the writings of Kant, Hegel, Heidegger, Feuerbach and others on these questions and critically analyzes them "in the spirit of Marx." As Petrovic points out, however, his essays in Part III are no less "anthropological" than those in Part II, and the essays in Part II also deal with ontological problems. Traditional terminology, therefore, cannot adequately characterize all the elements of their essays.

Petrovic realizes that the type of critical discussion he is advocating will be questioned by some "Marxist critics" who might feel that such discussion can only lead to a weakening of Marxist philosophy. To this charge he answers "why should a living Marxism be weaker than a dead one?" and he expresses a hope that the time will soon come when it can no longer be said that "Jesuits have written more studies about Marx and Marxism than Marxists themselves." This collection of essays is welcome evidence of the potentialities of a living Marxism that rejects both a blind acceptance of Stalinist orthodoxy and a mere compilation of Stalinist "errors," and attempts to creatively interpret new realities.—Edward D. Wilde, Moravian College.

Two Tracts on Government. By JOHN LOCKE. Edited, with an introduction, notes, and translation by Philip Abrams. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967, Pp. x, 264. $7.50.)

This book contains the first English publication of Locke's earliest writings on politics (an Italian edition appeared in 1961). These are two short untitled works that have been culled from the Lovelace Collection of Locke manuscripts in the Bodleian Library. The first is an English tract written in 1660, the second a Latin essay composed a year or two later. Both works represent defenses of the affirmative position on the question (to quote the heading of the English tract): "Whether the Civil Magistrate may lawfully impose and determine the use of indifferent things in reference to Religious Worship." This was, of course, an emotion-charged political issue in the England of 1660, but it is difficult to get very excited about or even vicariously involved in it today. Furthermore, for the most part Locke's handling of the argument strikes me as heavyhanded, tedious, and pedestrian. On the surface, these tracts seem to possess only a tenuous antiquarian or biographical interest for the contemporary reader and thus to be scarcely worth the trouble of publishing them.

I do not, however, believe that this is so. The real value of these early works is lucidly explained in a lengthy introduction written by the editor, a Fellow of Peterhouse College and Lecturer in Economics in the University of Cambridge, Students of political thought-especially those who are interested in the origins of modern, secularized political theorizing—can acquire from this volume considerable insight into the assumptions and problems of the intellectually pivotal seventeenth century. And the mind of John Locke-one of the most deceptively complex writers in the history of political philosophy-is much clarified as well. Pre-eminently, this book helps us to begin to understand precisely how and to some degree why Locke's thought served as a bridge between the antecedent classical-Christian tradition and the predominant science-minded, secularized framework of modern political thought.

It is certainly true that Locke's two early tracts support a conservative viewpoint, upholding the right of authoritarian government, rather than the individual conscience, to set standards of religious behavior. Yet, as Dr. Abrams points out, Locke defended his position in such a way as to call into question the fundamental assumptions of the scholastic tradition. Divine and natural law are merely asserted as true, but no effort is made to buttress their authority by demonstration. In large measure, Locke's attempt to justify authoritarian government is utilitarian, premised upon the threats to social order posed by human ignorance, passion and partiality.

Furthermore, even at this early stage of his development Locke presents a contractual justification of governmental authority. At this juncture he claimed not necessarily to believe in this theory, but in fact he attempted to present at least a minimal defense of it and none at all of the divine right doctrine. The latter is only mentioned as another possible theoretical support for government. In sum, the philosophical assumptions—and dilemmas—which undergirded Locke's mature "liberal" political thought are presented embryonically or at least hinted at in these expressions of a youthful conservatism.

Dr. Abrams is to be commended for his excellent editorial work and even more for his successful and illuminating effort to place these early works in the context of Locke's intellectual development. I have only two minor criticisms of points in his introduction. He maintains that Locke's tracts represent a late statement of an "old ideology" but set the terms for a career culminating in the formulation, by the 1690's, of a "new ideology." I assume that the editor does not use the term "ideology" in Marx's sense but rather as short-hand for philosophical system. But his meaning would have been clearer on this point if he had avoided the equivocal and, in this context, tendentious-sounding term, ideology. Finally, Dr. Abrams contends that Locke's argument ended in an epistemological crisis (concerning the status of traditional claims to moral knowledge) which no one prior to Locke was willing to face. Surely Hobbes, at least, had previously confronted this problem in an even more head-on and unequivocal fashion than Locke ever did. None of this critical commentary should be taken, however, as minimizing in any sense the value of this excellent work of editorial and interpretative scholarship.-FRED H. WILLHOITE, Louisiana State University.

The Phenomenology of the Social World. By ALFRED SCHUTZ. Translated By George Walsh and Frederick Lehnert. (Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1967. Pp. xxxvi 255. $9.00.)

Within the past decade or so, English translations of European phenomenological literature have been appearing at a rapid pace. The "Northwestern University Studies in Phenomenology and Existential Philosophy" has added the welcomed, invaluable translation of Alfred Schutz's (1899-1959) pioneering work, Der sinnhafte Aufbau der sozialen Welt: Eine Einleitung in die verstehende Soziologie (1932; 2d ed., 1960) which was highly praised by the founder of phenomenology, Edmund Husserl (1859-1938). The translated version includes George Walsh's "Introduction" (pp. xv-xxix), a short German-English "Glossary" (pp. xv-xxxvi), a "Selected Bibliography" (pp. 251-52) and an expanded "Index" (pp. 253-55).

Schutz's Phenomenology is an analysis of the meaning-structure of the social world and suggests a new way of investigating the social sciences. In describing the invariant and typical structure of the social world, Schutz utilizes the central categories of Husserl's early phenomenology such as intentionality, internal time-consciousness and intersubjectivity. Schutz attempts to describe social "phenomena" and to establish the meaning of "objectivity" in the social sciences from the perspective of the lived experience of man in the "natural attitude" (natürliche Einstellung). He accepts the fact with justification that what is essentially human is qualitatively different from what is natural and, accordingly, adopts radically different procedures in the social sciences from those of the natural sciences.

Schutz's Phenomenology is divided into five sections (a total of 50 sub-sections). In Section I, he formulates the basic methodological problems of "interpretive sociology," clarifies the basic ambiguities in a series of tacit presuppositions of Max Weber's sociological concepts such as the "intended meaning" and "motive" of action, and attempts to go beyond Weber. Section II shows the meaningstructure of action as a lived experience (Erlebnis) from the standpoint of the solitary ego by means of Bergson's notion of lived time as "duration" (durée) and above all of Husserl's analysis of internal time-consciousness. Section III deals with the problem of intersubjective understanding (Fremdverstehen) or our knowledge of the alter ego. In Section IV, Schutz describes the structure of the social world and formulates a typology of social relationship. In Section V, he reformulates some basic questions concerning "interpretive sociology" in view of the four preceding sections and hints at a direction in which sociological problems may be more fully analyzed. In the remainder of this review, I shall attempt to state the focal insights of Schutz in Sections II, III and IV of his Phenomenology.

1. By action Schutz means something more than a mere physical event; it is the unity of an actor's lived experience. Action has its temporal, meaningful and motivational dimensions. It is a uni-directional and irreversible on-going process. It acquires meaning when it is grasped by the Act of attention (i.e., reflectively). This reflective glance is called "Act" (Akt) which has a reference to "having behaved," never "behaving." Thus a distinction is made between "action in process" (Hendeln) and "the completed act" (Handlung). Moreover, the distinct element of an action is its "project" (Entwurf) which is a preconceived plan by the actor in advance before the execution of his action. It is thought of in the future perfect tense (modo futuri exacti), i.e., "I shall have done." As "a phantasying of action," project is in principle independent of the actual performance of action. Now, motive is the meaningful ground for action. There are two kinds of motive: (1) the "'in-order-to' motive" (Um-zu-Motiv) and (2) the "because-motive" (Weil-Motiv). The first refers to the orientation of action to a future event and the second to a past lived experience. Hence they have the temporal character of futurity and of pastness respectively.

2. The realm of intersubjectivity begins as soon as we assume the existence of others. Since all the social sciences take intersubjectivity for granted, the philosopher of social science must clarify the structure of intersubjectivity. In a genuine intersubjective understanding, it is not sufficient to know the external "indications" (Anzeichen) of other's behavior. In direct social experience, the body is a field of expression. In case of a "sign" (Zeichen) intended for communication, it is always the "sign for" (1) what it signifies and (2) what is expressive of the lived experience of its user. In "a sign system," the user and the interpreter place a sign or a group of signs in a configurative context of meaning expressive of their lived experiences. Intersubjective understanding thus takes into account the lived experience of the other self. This is possible because (1) I know that the structure of other's lived experience is analogous to mine or has the same form as mine, (2) the idea "I and you co-exist" suggest that the stream of your intentional acts is "simultaneous" or "contemporaneous" with my own, and (3) I can observe the course of your action as it actually takes place in a direct social encounter, whereas I must attend to my lived experience reflectively in order to observe it. Schutz, however, is advancing neither a "projective theory of empathy" nor a solipsism. In Schutz's theory, I recognize another self other than mine and I comprehend this lived experience as other than mine (i.e., the distinction between the "intended meaning" of my lived experience and my interpretation of his).

3. Section IV is by far the most important and original contribution of Schutz's Phenomenology to the theory of social science. By the social world, he means a complex network of relationships. The starting point of all social science is found in our ordinary social life, and other people are both our "objects of experience" and "objects of thought" as well. Four regions of social relationship are (1) the Umwelt (the world of consociates), (2) the Mitwelt (the world of contemporaries), (3) the Vorwelt (the world of predecessors or "history") and (4) the Folgewelt (the world successors). The Vorwelt and the Folgewelt have the temporal character of the past and the future respectively. The Umwelt is the social world in which we directly experience others as "consociates" (Mitmenschen) here and now. In "We-relationship" I encounter the bodily presence of the other in the face-to-face situation. Only in the Umwelt and the Mitwelt, can I be both actor and observer. The distance of social relationship ranges from "We-relationship" to collective entities such as "state," "government," "law," etc., with of course the varying degrees of anonymity. The Mitwelt which has a reference to "They-orientation" is of immediate significance to the political world. In it we do not directly experience our "contemporaries" (Nebenmenschen) but only infer their typical characteristics on the basis of our immediate social relationships, namely, we understand the "contemporary" as "an ideal type." Thus he is always experienced predicatively (Erfahrung). Moreover, there are two ideal types of knowing (by inference) the behavior of others as "contemporaries": (1) "personal ideal type" and (2) "course-of-action type." Both types are used together because to know another person as a "diplomat" or "politician" we must know the job or functions he performs. The anonymous collective entities such as "state" can also be reduced to these ideal types: "every 'action' of the state can. be reduced to the actions of its functionaries" and "the term 'state' is merely an abbreviation for a highly complex network of interdependent personal ideal types" (p. 199).

In conclusion, Schutz's Phenomenology contributes to a philosophical clarification of the very roots of human social existence. It is (or was) the significant beginning of a new way of theorizing about social science. To evaluate and appreciate his thought fully, one has to read his available and posthumously forthcoming writings. The phenomenological movement today is far broader and richer than when Husserl initiated it. Moreover, phenomenology as a philosophy also seeks the value of science for human existence. Now political theorists of all persuasions can and should no longer ignore the wealth of phenomenological insights, although they have often been misunderstood by political theorists.—HWA YOL JUNG, Moravian College.

Mathematical Applications in Political Science, II. Ed. By Joseph L. Bernd. (Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1966. Pp. 208. $4.95.) This is the second volume to emerge from Southern Methodist's 1964 and 1965 summer conferences on "Mathematical Applications in Political Science." It appears to differ from the first by virtue of having been devoted to advanced topics, the first having been devoted to fundamentals.

This volume contains seven papers, the first two addressed, ostensibly, to "Solutions to Methodological Problems," the third to "Statistical Techniques," the fourth and fifth to "Applications to Practical Politics," and the last two to "Models of the Political System." I shall summarize them briefly in that order.

Hayward R. Alker, Jr. has written an instructive discussion and application of causal modeling techniques, both recursive and circular. If read carefully, one can even find occasional warnings concerning the limits of such modeling. One such obvious warning, though remaining unmentioned, concerns a direct linkage found to exist between urbanization and literacy in the recursive model which is perforce eliminated from the circular model to satisfy the conditions of identifiability in the set of equations.

The use of the term reciprocal where circular should have been used and an enigmatic discussion of free choice and causality, in which it appears that free choice must appear as random behavior in a casual model, mar an otherwise good review of causal modeling.

Richard L. Merritt's paper on cross-national content analysis gets no closer to mathematics than a mention of sampling, counting and coder reliability but it is a better than adequate review of some of the recent work in content analysis.

Carl F. Kossack's paper must rate as the most frustrating reading experience of recent history. A discussion of factor analysis, power spectrum analysis, cluster analysis, general linear hypotheses, simultaneous regression, response surface analysis and classification techniques in 25 pages must set a new record for confidence in the efficiency of language. The task was too much, however, for only those who can make the necessary leaps and generalizations can view this as, at best, a listing of some available techniques while for those others among us it becomes simply impenetrable. This is unfortunately compounded by a badly constructed type set making certain of the equations quite difficult to read and other typographical sins of both omission and commission.

Frank S. Scalora's article on stochastic models is a nice review of McPhee's 1960 Wisconsin primary study and Buzzell's research on company recruiting. Mr. Scalora is a good reviewer.

Gerald H. Kramer's article, "A Decision-Theoretic Analysis of a Problem in Political Campaigning," presents an imaginative model of the relationship between canvassing and the maximization of vote plurality where there are constraints on resources available. He develops a simple algorithm for ordering precincts in terms of their probable contribution to such maximization. Assumptions concerning the precincts and, in particular, the assumption that there is no opposition candidate substantially limit the generalizability of the model but its treatment of decision rules in campaign behavior is step No. 1 of any more general effort.

William H. Riker's article is a detached appendix to his The Theory of Political Coalitions intended to replace its Appendix I, or parts of it. He merely simplifies his proof of the size principle.

Otto O. Davis and Melvin Hinich conclude the book with a nicely developed model of "policy formation in a democratic society." Their announced intention is the determination of the relationship of voter preferences and governmental policy. Proceeding from some basic, and fairly well known, assumptions concerning decision rules and the nature and distribution of preferences they find that a "beneficent" dictator would provide the same policy outcomes as the winner of an election campaign, that minority parties can win if the parties differ in cohesion, that a party may improve its chance of winning by nominating a candidate whose position is somewhere between its internal mean preference and that of the other party, and that a candidate can maximize his chances by catering to specialized "mutually exclusive" sets of interests in the electorate.

Such then are my assessments of the contents of the book. It remains to be suggested that this is the type of book which will be purchased for only a small part of its contents. I doubt that there are many who would be able to find those contents, in their entirely, uniformly informative.—Alden E. Lind, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Theory and Methods of Social Research. By JOHAN GALTUNG. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967, Pp. 534, $10.00.)

Books, like people, are often divided into those that do, and those that reflect on doing; and if this dichotomy fits abrasively, blame the reflective people (who thought it up). Theory and Methods of Social Research by Johan Galtung is exactly what its title suggests—a book which reflects on doing. It is an excellent work.

The reflection is, however, of a particular sort. The author states on page 1 that neither philosophical foundations nor nuts-and-bolts techniques will be disucssed in depth. Instead, a middle road of analysis is chosen which ties together a variety of approaches to data collection, data processing, data analysis, and theory formation.

It is part of the book's merit that the author does not always succeed in staying on this elusive middle ground. The text runs all the way from discussions of statistical tests to the epistemological status of theories. Even Quine's views on truth and falsity are invoked. At the end of the book one is not even sure if there is a middle road.

The organization of the book is superb. Beginning with the observation that he is interested in correct methodology, or what researchers should do rather than what they actually do, Galtung moves comprehensively over almost every phase of research design. Indeed, the book itself is arranged like a gigantic research design, containing reflections on the range of moves open at each stage of the analysis.

The main divisions of the book are two: data collection and data analysis. In the first section are found discussions of the data matrix, units of analysis, variables, values, collection of data, and surveys. The second section of the book contains data processing, distributions, patterns, hypotheses, analysis of data, and theories.

The subject of a data matrix contains a series of initial distinctions which recur throughout the book: synchronic (spatial) vs. diachronic (temporal) variables; manifest vs. latent data; and the basic sequence of background—personality—behavior variables. Some confusion results from distinguishing latent and manifest data on the basis of inference (i.e., all data involve some form of inference—a philosophical point, sad to say), but this is minor.

In discussing units of analysis the author separates analytic levels, warns the researcher of the ecological fallacy (and others), and provides the reader with a good summary of the Lazarsfeld-Menzel system of separating variables. A very clear and brief point is made of the sometimes overlooked difference between substantive (sample) and generalization (sample to universe), hypotheses; and generally the discussion of sampling is quite good, especially the business of linking sampling techniques to research purposes—a nuts-and-bolts point, I believe.

Some generally good distinctions are made between levels of variables, but the reader will look in vain for values other than those which are strictly empirical. Galtung is concerned with actor evaluations, not justification beyond this. Even so, the author is clear-headed enough to separate norms and evaluations (the former as action-oriented), and generally handle the subject well. The same is true of the subjects of data collection and surveys, although applying the Parsonian phase system to questionnaires (p. 133) is a bit too much

Data processing, statistical distributions, patterns and indices are all discussed with aplomb and wit (if that is possible). There are some especially interesting discussions of the mathematical relations between Lazarsfeld's manifest and latenvariables (p. 274 ff.), but only a brief allusion is made to factor analysis. (Enough, however, is perhaps enough—no matter what the size of the book.) Hypotheses are given a different twist being defined in terms of form and not the meanings of the words contained. Hence, "God is infinitely good" is an hypothesis, and then is treated in terms of the conditions under which it is tenable (instead of the reverse). The final section or theories is especially good.

In a brief review, any thorough criticism of such a book is impossible, and in this case hardly needed. I will take up only a few brief points (it just to avoid a vacuous summary). The choice of examples does not always come off. Some used to demonstrate the ecological fallacy (p. 47) demonstrate only that they ought not to have been included. It would also be helpful to have more examples from the social sciences in the discussion of hypotheses (p. 337 ff.).

There is also some confusion over the meaning of a tautology, which (contrary to the author's belief) is not defined in terms of probability (p. 338) but rather in terms of the linguistic or quantitative terms used; hence, the question of probability is irrelevant, for a tautology is not a factual claim. Further, the sociology of knowledge is related to epistemology (p. 336), leading to a position of epistemological uncertainty. And so on.

But, as can be seen, none of these criticisms is anything to get excited about. The book is good enough to escape its minor flaws easily. It is sprinkled liberally with charts (the author obviously finds the spatial dimension a fertile area for his ideas) which clearly present the main distinctions made in the work. The book as a whole is probably too much for any but the most advanced undergraduates and graduate students, but anyone with some background in methodology will immediately appreciate the competence and élan with which Galtung has handled his much-discussed subject.—Fred M. Frohock, Syracuse University.

Divisiveness and Social Conflict. By ALAN R. Beals and Bernard J. Siegel. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1966. Pp. xi, 185. $6.00.)

At first sight, this book by two well-known anthropologists seems to have considerable promise. A new theory of conflict, based on the comparison of divisiveness and factionalism in two widely different agrarian communities (Taos pueblo in New Mexico, and a village in southern India called "Namhalli"), should be welcome and useful to political scientists. Unfortunately, the promise is deceptive; although others may disagree, I have the feeling that an interesting opportunity to contribute to an interdisciplinary theory of social and political processes has been missed.

Some of the problems may arise from the book's organization, which seems—peculiarly enough—to be backwards. Is it not confusing to read the theoretical conclusions (chapters 4, 5) before the data from which they are drawn (chapters 6, 7)? Should the reader be given a survey of the existing literature—and the only clear statement of the authors' central thesis—in the last chapter? If we are to be told, in chapter 2, that size is an important variable in determining the cohesiveness of a rural village (p. 41), should the actual populations of Taos and Namhalli only be mentioned, as if in passing, far later in the exposition (pp. 98, n. 2; 100; 138)?

The central hypothesis of Beals and Siegel is not without interest: "a stress which is low in visibility, high in randomness, high in complexity, high in selectivity, and long in duration is most likely to produce factionalist dispute" (p. 115). But the political scientist will be struck by their failure to develop clear and objective measures to test the proposition. Equally disappointing is the failure to cite relevant work in other social sciences: theories of political conflict, studies of community power in the U.S., and analyses of the impact of modernization on agrarian societies are conspicuously absent from the bibliography.

Indeed, Divisiveness and Social Conflict is, to a considerable extent, a tract directed to other anthropologists, condemning the excesses of the socalled "functionalist" interpretation of conflict. Beals and Siegel repeatedly criticize the concept that social conflict serves positive functions; asserting that functionalism necessarily treats society as a static and "closed" organization, they insist instead on a distinction between "normal conflict," which is defined as "nondisruptive" and "nonviolent," and "disruptive" or "unregulated" conflict, of which the "pervasive factionalism" in Taos and Namhalli are prime examples (chapter 1).

This perspective raises more problems than it solves. It results in the assumption that "fighting" and "warfare" apply only to situations "where opponents do each other physical injury outside of any system of rules and meanings," thereby cutting off possible comparisons between international conflicts and feud or violence in primitive stateless societies (pp. 18, 170). The distinction between an organization's internal "strains" and the environmental "stresses" to which it is subject is useful, but it is approached with an evident bias in favor of cooperative responses to problem-solving (esp. pp. 20, 166).

Conflict and violence may well be deplorable, but this perspective does not increase our understanding of the role of headhunting, feud, and group fission in many primitive systems. Nor does it illuminate the consequences of violence in the process of economic and political modernization (so brilliantly analyzed by Barrington Moore in Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy). Whether or not looting and rioting in American ghettoes may actually contribute to an improvement of the negro's status is an open question, but Beals and Siegel do not help us to pose it more clearly.

Both in its empirical analysis and its theoretical conceptualization, the book has an opaque character that will frustrate political scientists. The authors' conclusion is representative: "let there be proposed a range of theories of conflict and let there be collected much information relevant to the causes, the course, and the concluding stages of divisiveness" (p. 170). In such a quest, it is to be feared that this slim volume will contribute less than it might have.—Roger D. Masters, Dartmouth College.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Prestige and Association in an Urban Community: An Analysis of an Urban Stratification System. By Edward O. Laumann. (Indianapolis, Indiana: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, 1966. Pp. vii, 218. $2.95.)

Cities in a Race With Time: Progress and Poverty in America's Renewing Cities. By Jeanne R. Lowe. (New York: Random House, 1967. Pp. x, 601. $10.00.)

The Regional City: An Anglo-American Discussion of Metropolitan Planning. Ed. By Derek Senior. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Company, Pp. viii, 192.)

Professor Laumann in Prestige and Association in an Urban Community assesses the social stratification system in an urban area by directing his investigation at three main questions. First, do we have separate indentifiable social classes in urban areas or does a social continuum exist with no distinct boundaries between the classes? Secondly, what types of social interaction patterns exist among friends, neighbors, and relatives given the observed stratification system? Thirdly, what relationships exist between the observed social structure and certain political and economic attitudes?

Laumann used relatively sophisticated statistical techniques to analyze the occupational ranks, social interactions and attitudes of a sample of 422 white male residents in Cambridge and Belmont, Massachusetts. Occupation was the primary variable used to assess the stratification system. For each occupational category a subjective measure (preferred social-interaction) and an objective measure (observed social-interaction) was used to determine the dimensions of the stratification system.

An individual's subjective description of the social system differs from his objective social interaction patterns. The respondents describe the system as open and state social preferences for individuals with higher social status than themselves. However, their objective social interaction is confined primarily to individuals of equal occupational status. The American ideology of an open class system with a great deal of social mobility most reflects subjective descriptions of the system not actual social interaction behavior.

The research indicates that neither a status continuum nor a social class system is descriptive of the urban stratification system. Rather, a stratification system exists with both the top and bottom exhibiting crystallized boundaries and the large middle group socially undifferentiated. The middle occupational groups show considerable differentiation in subjective social preferences along prestige lines and less tendency to confine social-interaction with status equals than do the top and bottom occupational groups. This conclusion makes suspect findings of past studies that state a social continuum or identifiable social classes characterize the urban stratification system. The stratification system is mixed, combining certain features of social-class and status continuum.

Given the above description of an urban stratification system Laumann finds that social-interaction, particularly friendship, was primarily confined to individuals of similar occupational groupings. Social-interaction among relatives and neighbors was less confined to equal status individuals. The top and bottom occupational categories exhibited the greatest degree of equal status contact and the middle category the least.

Individuals with high status sensitivity, strong class identification and consciousness and desiring social interactions with status-equals exhibited more extreme economic and political beliefs of either a liberal or conservative persuasion. This finding indicates relating status characteristics to political and economic attitudes is no longer a sufficient enterprise. Greater emphasis should be placed upon intervening variables, such as, social mobility and social-interaction networks of individuals which may play an important role in the formation and support of economic and political beliefs.

It is unfortunate that Negroes were not included in the sample for they are an important segment in most of our urban areas. Occupation may not be a reliable indicator of prestige and social interaction for Negroes. It is understandable that their inclusion in the sample may have jeopardized the validity of the findings. However, valuable insights about the Negroes' position in the stratification system could have been obtained from the responses of the white respondents.

Professor Laumann makes a major contribution with his penetrating analysis describing and explaining an urban stratification system. His study will not only be of interest to persons concerned with social stratification, but it should prove useful to researcher's utilizing social class as a major variable.

Miss Lowe in Cities in a Race with Time focuses upon the development of urban renewal and public housing over the past twenty years in five major cities. (New York, Pittsburgh, Washington, Philadelphia, and New Haven). In a descriptive fashion she outlines the experiences of each of these cities by vividly portraying the individuals and groups involved in urban renewal. Miss Lowe has exhibited astute political awareness and understanding of the forces and values involved in renewal in each of the five cities.

Miss Lowe superbly describes the roles of Robert Moses and Richard Lee in their respective cities. By focusing on these two men the author illustrates the complexity of problems inherent in initiating and carrying through urban renewal in New York and New Haven. But, by concentrating on urban renewal, many related problems and priorities of the cities were overlooked. Urban renewal and public housing were not examined as part of the total political process in the cities examined. Urban renewal issues were examined as if they were top priority issues in the cities. Local political leaders may not think that urban renewal is the major problem facing their city and this affects the politics of renewal.

Cities in a Race with Time is a case study of five cities. The urban renewal experiences of the cities were not adequately compared with one another. No theoretical framework was incorporated to illustrate similarities or differences which might lead to greater understanding of the politics of urban renewal. Would Mayor Lee be as successful in New York as he was in New Haven? Would the Mellon fortune accomplish similar success in Philadelphia as it did in Pittsburgh?

Miss Lowe describes the emerging problems of cities and relates the effects of urban renewal upon them. In general, urban renewal and public housing barely scratch the surface of the social, economic and racial problems of cities. Nevertheless, the book concludes that the very process of trying to solve urban problems may constitute the good life. With urban problems so great and solutions so difficult to reach, what else can be said?

The Regional City consists of papers and discussion of American and British planners during a conference on regional planning held in England in 1964. The book represents the opinions and observations of the 32 conferees toward differences and similarities of planning in the United States and Britain. Because of the large number of participants and varying shades of differences in their points of view the book makes difficult reading.

The major difference between planning in the United States and Britain stems from the historical role of local government in both countries. In the United States great emphasis upon local determinism, Jacksonian Democracy and private economy shapes and limits what planners can accomplish. In the United States planners follow market forces closely when constructing their plans. Whereas in Britain, regional planning follows closely national priorities. Local government in Britain has never enjoyed the autonomy of local government in the United States and as a result is more receptive to regional plans.

The surprising conclusion is reached that "given the general will to use them, taken in all, American social control over land use are inherently no less powerful than those in Britain, and the compensation price to be paid need be no higher." Then why hasn't the United States used their social controls over land? Again, the conclusion is the historical role of local government. The conference also suggests that the pressure to plan is not as great in the United States because of its vast open spaces and great wealth.

Given the limitations on American Planners they appear to employ more sophisticated techniques such as urban simulation models and general systems theory which take into account the urban area as a totality. The British focus primarily upon physical planning stressing to a lesser extent social and economic factors. The planning techniques available in the United States will not be really useful until values concerning planning and governmental organization change. The book concludes that a major change in important public objectives is needed if comprehensive planning is to be effective in American urban regions.—Vincent L. Marando, University of Arizona.

Urban Research and Policy Planning. Ed. By Leo F. Schnore and Henry Fagin. (Beverly Hills, California: Sage Publications, 1967. Pp. 638. $20.00.)

Urban Research and Policy Planning is an ambitious book. As the initial volume in a planned series of annual reviews sponsored by Sage Publications, it attempts to survey major urban research and policy planning developments which have occurred in the twenty-year period since World War II. In the first half of the book, thirteen authors utilize a disciplinary format to discuss urban research developments in the fields of psychology, social welfare, economics, regional science, history, geography, political science and political sociology. In the second half of the book, eleven authors cut across disciplinary lines to analyze urban policy planning developments in terms of concepts, technology and organization. Thus, the book's organization begs the question of the potential relevance which the more academic-oriented research discussed in Part I has to the policy planning developments described in Part II.

Despite the fact that the book's title implies the existence of a meaningful interaction between academic research and policy planning, the introductory chapter by Leo Schnore and Eric Lampard tends to minimize the extent of this potential interrelationship by arguing that "serious scientific research must continue to be concerned with fundamental questions of understanding the whole urban phenomenon and not just those aspects that currently appear to be problems to the social engineers." In line with this philosophy, Part I authors such as Anselm Strauss advise that urban sociology is weak "not in how to verify theory, but in how to discover theory." As a result, Strauss suggests a series of research strategies that focus on such issues as "the unstudied" (e.g., urban icons, the symbolism of time and space) and "the unusual" (e.g., the trivial, the odd).

While the unstudied and the unusual undoubtedly represent intriguing areas of investigation, it is difficult to reconcile such Part I research "emphases" with the agonizing dilemmas which policy planners, such as Lyle Fitch, describe in the second half of the book. As Fitch warns, "social planning in the United States in the mid-1960's represents many influences, strains of thought, and conflicting sentiments. . . One may ask if social planning is in danger of overreaching itself. . . Such are the uncertainties that social planning must be in the main based on probabilities . . . rather than with neatly constructed models based on known facts."

Besides such differences in intellectual outlook between many of the book's Part I academic researchers and Part II policy planners, there are a number of disparities among the academicians, themselves. John Kain, in an extremely stimulating discussion of "Urban Transportation Behavior," emphasizes that the real problem confronting the transportation researcher is to impose some order on "the truly phenomenal outpouring of data" that has occurred in the post-war period. Conversely, Harold Mayer, in discussing problems relative to research in transportation flows in urban geography, argues that "unfortunately, much potentially useful research on flows is inhibited or prevented by lack of adequate data."

These, and the other, divergencies of viewpoint that are apparent in this book suggest that it is difficult to reconcile much of our present Urban Research and Policy Planning efforts under the covers of one neatly organized volume. Indeed, at various points in the book, hints are droppped that the quality of our present-day academic research may be unduly complicating the already complex task facing the policy planners. Norton Long, for example, questions whether some of our current research in urban politics may not fall into this category by suggesting that "an ironic effect of the 'community power structure' literature has been to teach civil rights leaders to seek a confrontation with a putative white power structure" that may well be non-existent, or at least incapable of responding effectively to the kinds of demands which are placed upon it.

Despite the book's numerous inconsistencies, the quality of many of the individual articles is certainly high enough to warrant the careful attention of serious observers of the urban scene. In addition, the book does make it obvious that, in at least one crucial respect, the modern city is very decidedly being influenced by the products of modern research. Britton Harris emphasizes this fact in his discussion of "New Technology and Urban Planning." As Harris points out, such technological breakthroughs as the development of new power resources, more sophisticated techniques of microprocessing, new innovations in communications and computational capabilities, and recent advances in the biological sciences are all having a very decided impact on the modern metropolis. Thus, while many of us in the social sciences may be fascinated with the odd and the trivial, the scientific technicians are grinding ahead relentlessly, reshaping our cities for better or for worse. Perhaps in the future the social sciences will develop a more sophisticated capability to apply their own new technology to urban planning processes in a manner which Harris discusses. Books such as Urban Research and Public Policy make it clear, however, that we still have a long road to travel before we can expect any such development to take place.-Frank Smallwood, Dartmouth College.

Metropolitan America: Fiscal Patterns and Governmental Systems. By Alan K. Campbell and Seymour Sacks. (New York: The Free Press, 1967. Pp. xvi, 239. $7.95.)

Political scientists in recent years have increasingly turned their attention to systematic (i.e., comparative and quantitative) analysis of the fiscal patterns of political systems. Perhaps this is a function of their new theoretical focus on system outputs, or, equally plausibly, it may be because state and local budgets (and national ones) provide a gold mine of quantitative data, hitherto explored only by the economists. In this book, two distinguished students of metropolitanism, a political scientist and an economist, have brought together an enormous amount of data and a sophisticated methodology to explain variations in metropolitan fiscal behavior.

There are inevitably two vexing problems which confront anyone who hopes to explain municipal spending and taxing as dependent variables. First. problems arise out of the division of governmental labor between the state and local units. In 1962. for example, cities in New York made 77.8 per cent of the total state and local expenditures in that state, while the comparable figure for Vermont was 39.4 per cent. Because of these differing functional responsibilities, one would expect a city in New York to spend more than an exactly comparable city in neighboring Vermont. Campbell and Sacks deal with this difficulty by introducing as an independent variable an expenditure (and tax) assignment variable, i.e., the amount of state and local spending made by local governments Even reckoning with the state-local question, however, will not solve a second complexity, for even within the metropolitan area the incredible mosaic of municipal corporations and special districts leads to a varying pattern of expenditures and taxation. The latter problem can be reasonably well handled, as the authors do, by aggregating expenditures into larger units, for metropolitar areas as a whole, for central cities and for outside central city areas. Unfortunately, in doing so, one must make some inevitable compromises with the empirical world, for policy decisions are not made by these analytically useful aggregates, but by decision-makers in fragmented governmental units

The independent variables used in the analysis are for the most part the traditional ones used by economists in explaining variations in state and local spending—per capita income, density, percent urban, state aid, federal aid, and the authors' tax and expenditure assignment variable. If the goal in the expanding research on policy outputs is to maximize one's multiple correlations, then Campbell and Sacks have done better than anyone else. The coefficient of multiple determination (R^2) between these six independent variables and per capita expenditures of metropolitan areas is 914. Statistically speaking, this must stand as a high-water mark in the search for the determinants of fiscal variations.

While one should hesitate to quibble with such a disarmingly high multiple R, I nonetheless detect a troubling conceptual difficulty with these independent variables, one suggested by Ellio: Morss (in "Some Thoughts on the Determinants of State and Local Spending," National Tax Journal, March, 1966). Morss suggests that three kinds of theoretical concerns might justify efforts to study the determinants of state and local spending levels: normative views about the value of spending patterns; efforts to predict outputs; or efforts to understand or explain fiscal levels. He argues, I think rightly, that variables like state and federal aid payments are handy predictor variables, but next to meaningless for purposes of explanation. Presumably, both Parkinson and the average taxpayer, sans data, might guess that the more money governments obtained, the more they spent. Campbell and Sacks' assignment variables seem more useful for prediction than for explanation. Political scientists who read Metropolitan America might wish that the authors had pushed their search for independent variables further back in the funnel of causality, to borrow a metaphor from the voting studies. The assignment variables might then have been used as control variables in partial correlation analysis.

Partly for this reason. I suspect that the book will find a wider audience among economists than among political scientists. It is clearly more in the tradition of economists like Brazer and Fabricant than in the newer political science literature stemming from the work of Dawson and Robinson and Dye, among others. It is similar to the latter research, however, in suggesting the overwhelming importance of economic (as opposed to political) variables in determining variations in municipal outputs. As the authors would readily concede, this might reflect the paucity of data on relevant political variables of cities. But what data on political variables they could utilize (e.g., measures of governmental fragmentation and of state interparty competition) were rejected in preliminary analysis as insignificant.

My conceptual quibble notwithstanding, this book reflects both excellent research and reasoned analysis-the methodological rigor one expects from an economist and the policy concerns of a political scientist. The implications for policy issues like metropolitan reorganization are spelled out in the final chapter. Interestingly, two measures of governmental fragmentation (area per government and population per government) showed no relation to fiscal variations. Income, however, emerged as second in importance only to the assignment variables in predicting spending and taxing. Since income plays such a dominant role in determining municipal spending, the immediate response might be to suggest that effective metropolitan reorganization would provide a broader resource base for the central city. Sober second thoughts, however, would note that fiscal levels are considerably lower in outside central city areas. Thus the latter areas might indeed exert a conservative drag on metropolitan spending if real metropolitan integration were to (magically) come about. A second public policy implication is no less important. Despite the concern (or rhetoric) of some, federal and state aids are clearly not substitutive of local effort; if anything, they are stimulative. Increasing roles in tackling metro-problems by higher levels might be reasonably expected to produce spillover effects in the form of greater local initiative.—ROBERT L. LINEBERRY, University of Texas.

Metropolitan America: Challenge To Federalism.
By Bernard J. Frieden. (Washington: Advisory Commission On Intergovernmental Relations,
1966. Pp. x, 176.)

This confused volume unwittingly offers a powerful insight into the character of our urban problems, for it reveals how badly understood those problems are at the highest levels of our governmental system. Based on proposals published by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations during the period 1961-65, and pulled together by Professor Bernard J. Frieden, the report argues that inadequate public services, racial and economic segregation, fiscal imbalance, and other urban problems cannot be dealt with effectively because of the fragmented structure of government in our metropolitan areas. This fragmentation is caused not only by the multitude of local governments, but also by the many special district governments, state agencies and federal agencies that are now active in each of our metropolitan

To eliminate this near-chaos the Commission proposes a series of measures: the powers of local governments should be reduced; counties, metropolitan planning commissions and state governments should become more active; and the federal government should encourage co-operation and planning, as well as discourage the further growth of special district governments. Worked out in laborious detail, these notions produce some 53 recommendations, including a series on water supply and sewage problems, and a series proposing improvements in relocation procedures.

There is no denying that government in metropolitan areas is fragmented, of course, but that such fragmentation constitutes a "problem" for anyone but the people who write these kinds of reports is less self-evident. As the Commission recognizes, few residents of metropolitan areas pay much attention to reorganization proposals and, whatever inefficiencies there may or may not be, "Local governments . . . keep the metropolis running. They operate the schools, maintain the streets, take care of police and fire protection" (pp. 7-8). What, then, is the difficulty? In truth, it is impossible to tell, for this report rarely moves beyond the level of slogans in developing the criteria by which it determines that a "problem" exists. Inadequate services, particularly in the newly-developing suburbs, is said to be a major difficulty, but in the absence of any Commission criteria of "adequacy" in service levels, the charge has little meaning. "Poor co-ordination and conflicts of interest among governments often block effective action to deal with metropolitan problems," says the Commission (pp. 10-11), but again, we are not told what "effective" action would be, for what range of problems. Special districts are said to be both confusing and expensive, but the Commission presents neither evidence of confusion nor standards of "efficiency" in expenditure.

Absence of criteria which define adequacy and efficiency of governmental performance is crucial, for it marks the failure of the Commission to enunciate a philosophy of purpose from which performance standards might be derived. This failure is partly conscious, for the Commission adopts a "realistic" stance (pp. 33, 117) which prohibits proposals for radical change. A more important source of the failure, however, is the remarkable confusion which characterizes the Commission's perception of how the present system works. On the one hand, the Commission sees no sharp separation between levels of government in the metropolitan area. Indeed, the simultaneous operation of local, county, state and federal agencies in metropolitan areas is regarded as a source of confusion and thus a target for remedial action. Alongside this view, on the other hand, the Commission presents another, which stresses the independence of each level of government. The Commission's attack on the powers of local governments is in fact rationalized as an attempt to modify the "Home Rule" principle, which the Commission seems to think is equivalent to a grant of absolute independence from external control. Local officials will surely be surprised to learn of their excessive independence, and the nation's governors and state legislators will be equally surprised to learn that the influence of local officials stops at municipal boundaries.

This uneasy juxtaposition of two contrasting views of metroplitan reality undermines the Commission's recommendations, not only because it suggests a lack of comprehension, but also because it allows the Commission to evade the problem of devising a realistic strategy of reform. Availability of two images of reality enables the Commission to use first one image, then the other, as rationalization, without regard for the frequent contradictions thus created. The powers of local government should be reduced because municipalities are too independent, but strong local government should be preserved; state agencies are a source of confusion in metropolitan areas, but states should expand their activities; the federal government should retain an essentially advisory role, but it should use its grants-in-aid to force acceptance of metropolitan planning, whether or not local governments see any point to such planning. In the midst of such a grab-bag of ideas, undisciplined by consistency of viewpoint, the Commission's repeated claim to have developed a "philosophy" of Federalism must be regarded as pompous nonsense.

A few years ago, a report proposing the sort of organizational tinkering suggested by this Commission might have been dismissed as a harmless entertainment. After Watts, Harlem, Newark and Detroit, such a judgment seems entirely too charitable. Confused in its analysis, undisciplined in its proposals for change, and pompous in presentation, this report is itself a sign of how deep are the roots of our present urban crisis.—Thomas J. Anton, University of Stockholm.

American Federalism in Perspective. Ed. By Aaron Wildaysky. (Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1967. Pp. ix, 277.)

When invited to write this review I accepted with alacrity, for a book under the above title by Aaron Wildavsky promised to be exciting. The volume in fact turned out to be in the best tradition of modern American publishing: that is, it is (1) a reader, (2) a paperback, and (3) comparatively cheap (as to the last I can only conjecture, for no price is given; but the publisher's intent to reach a wide audience seems clear). Wildavsky on American federalism as author and Wildavsky on the same subject as editor are of course two quite different things. It is the latter we have here; let us see what he has brought forth.

It is perhaps appropriate to begin with the editor's declaration of purpose, which is presented in his brief Introduction. Asserting that the literature of federalism is often polemical and the "debate" on the subject shopworn, he concludes (at p. ix): It seemed desirable, therefore, to concentrate on analysis, instructive both in its own right and as a better preparation for those interested in political dispute. Hence, the emphasis here is on conceptual clarity, empirical theory, and comparative analysis.

Presumably all readers, and especially those which are in any wise selective (as this one is), reflect the editor's point of view. It is well to have a statement of that view in the beginning.

In the pursuit of his goal Wildavsky has assembled 13 essays. They cover the period 1945 (two brief pieces) to 1966 (one), a long enough time span surely to provide at least reasonable longitudinal perspective. Seven of the essays were written in 1960 or later. One is an original contribution, the remainder are reprints. The comparative analysis sought by the editor is served by papers on aspects of federalism in Australia, Canada, Germany, and the United States, and by collateral cr incidental attention to practice around the world in other essays. Further, several of the papers whose titles promise no great breadth actually achieve an ecumenism which raises them above provincial concerns. In sweep, then, the volume is wide indeed.

In coverage otherwise the book merits high rating—as far as it goes. Every essay is a worthy piece of scholarship in its own right, a judgment certified by the fact that all save one have been published previously. The authors, too, deserve the confidence of the reader, for among them are several of the scholars most active in the field of federalism in recent years. All this is to say that the editor has chosen well both contributors and contributions. If he has selected five essays from two sources (two from Arthur Macmahon's Federalism Mature and Emergent, three from the late Morton Grodzins' federalism workshop), his choices indicate only where and by whom much of the productive work has been done.

Yet there is to one reader an inexplicable omission from this otherwise wholly worthy anthology. A perspective, I had thought, is meant to provide a comprehensive view of the scene beheld, from near foreground to distant horizon. The far sight is here, but an essential element is-or seems to me to be-missing from the front yard. I refer to what has come to be called creative federalism, or by some (with a different emphasis) intergovernmental relations. Call it what you will, it is here, and it has drastically modified the practice of American federalism. Some observers maintain that it provides linkages necessary to the operation, and even the survival, of the federal system in the onrushing world of tomorrow; other damn it as the perversion of true federalism. But few indeed command the Olympian view which permits them to ignore it altogether. The addition of a single essay, whether critical or approving does not matter, on contemporary trends would, in one man's judgment, have converted a very good collection into an outstanding one.

A word now (but not a lugubrious word) on the seamy side. Those who write or arrange books must be forever mindful of the ancient truism that typesetters are the sworn enemies of authors. The only known sure way to escape destruction at their hands is to eschew publication. An alternative is to allow approximately as much time for proofreading as was devoted to writing. This must be done by the author (or editor), he being the only one who has the slightest interest in the internals of the book in the end. Another alternative-and of course the one most often adoptedis to let proofing slide—that is, to leave it to the reader to figure out what the writer meant. Normally this is not hard, but sometimes it places the consumer in double jeopardy. In the argot of the day, the proofreading here was not that bad; but it was not that good either.—Roscoe C. Martin, Syracuse University.

Behind the Shield: The Police in Urban Society. By Arthur Niederhoffer. (New York: Doubleday & Company, 1967. Pp. vi, 242. $5.95.)

Quite simply, this book is worth reading because it offers interesting insights about a vital subject, police responses to social change. In their emphasis on education, these responses are similar to the predominant reactions of many others in a society characterized by rapid change. Because of this similarity Niederhoffer is correct in his contention that social scientists have for too long ignored the study of law enforcement. With a Ph.D. in sociology and twenty years as a New York police officer, Niederhoffer offers a unique perspective on the relationship between the police and their social milieu. In his opinion, "Police systems can be understood only as institutions in interaction with the rest of the social structure" (p. 12). Though other departments are mentioned, he focuses on the New York City department.

Using primarily the concepts of professionalism and cynicism, his analysis of this interaction is the book's most valuable contribution. Professionalism develops as a manifestation of law enforcement officials' attempts to adjust to social change. Cynicism is a characteristic almost inherent in police work. The author states that the cynicism developed in the young police officer is more permanent than the type characteristic of those trained in other professions.

The goals of professionalism include more education, greater specialization, a rigid code of ethics, and, more implicitly, a certain amount of secretiveness and cliquishness. He offers some interesting evidence to show that the achievement of some goals of professionalism may be declining. For example the number of college-graduate New York police recruits has greatly declined since 1940. Also, professionalized officers have often opposed the very changes professionalism is supposed to help them accept. In an analysis of the battle over the continuation of the New York City civilian review board, Niederhoffer demonstrates the effects of these less desirable ramifications of professionalism. Despite, and sometimes because of, the adoption of the standards of professionalism, the ethos of the police professionals is still often contrary to the goals of those advocating social change.

He defines cynicism as "diffuse feelings of hate and envy, impotent hostility, and the sour grapes pattern [which resembles Merton's concept of ressentiment] . . . in which the anomie of the police organization is reflected in the individual policeman" (pp. 93-94). Such anomie develops particularly when old values of a social system are supplanted by new ones. Consequently, professionalism may increase cynicism for at least two reasons. First, the ideals of professionalism are often preached in an organization where the criteria for "good" police work are still based on the older values. Secondly, officers who best achieve some of professionalism's goals become impatient and thus more cynical about the lack of promotional opportunities than do other officers.

The book also offers a wealth of other information, from a discussion of the plight of the Jewish policeman to a much needed new look at the question of police authoritarianism. Unfortunately the author is not clear in his discussion of the relationship between police systems and the social structure. He does consider the public's perceptions of the status of police occupations as well as police perceptions of some of their social milieu. These considerations, however, are organized in a manner making it virtually impossible to discover what effect these factors have on police activities. He never systematically considers what constraints the public places on police behavior. A concluding chapter which more specifically considered these "outside" factors and their effect on police behavior would have improved his analysis.

He fails to use adequately his experience as a participant observer in an analysis of police behavior. The bulk of his empirical evidence about cynicism comes from a questionnaire administered to 220 New York City policemen. This sample includes men at virtually all stages of the police career. They really form the core of his study, but he chooses to use these men only to test the intensity of their cynicism and to some extent to test the relationship between cynicism and professionalism. No attempt is made to analyze the actual behavior of any of these men. His discussions of police activities (as opposed to police attitudes) are based on data not directly related to observations made of this 220-man sample. With his sample data he clearly establishes that cynicism exists, that it develops rapidly and permanently only after one joins the department, and that professionalism may increase cynicism. But he never explains the effects of cynical attitudes on this sample of police. One can only try to infer these effects from his other data, much of which is not taken from the New York department. As a result, he cannot show, for example, how this increase in cynicism affects actual behavior toward minority groups. An investigation of this question, as well as other questions involving police behavior, is certainly most vital to an understanding of police-social structural interactions.-NEAL MIL-NER, Grinnell College.

Corporate Management in a World of Politics; The Public, Political and Governmental Problems of Business. By Harold Brayman. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1967. Pp. xii, 272, $7.95.) Addressing himself to the management of large corporations, the author will bore the academic reader with his shorthand rationalizations of the business position, his recitation of current business tribulations, his easy optimism that ills can be cured by sound public relations. His grammar is popularized; his analysis is often superficial special pleading: his sycophancy can try the patient reader. But his prejudices are frank; his understanding of political forces and the meaning of political debate is often shrewder than that of many businessmen.

The central theme is that public opinion has become the great new force in politics, that public opinion is made by events and by the "communicators." These include, among others, journalists, commentators, script writers and academics, a rather mixed bag. The scheme gives relatively little credit to the substance of the public affairs dialogue and much to access, which may not endear the author to political scientists. Yet precisely the latter is one of his objectives. Unlike many politicians and most businessmen, he understands the influential role of the intellectual in our present-day politics. He admonishes businessmen to give highest priority to finding ways to communicate with the academic community. He has shown skill in organizing the interchange of ideas between business and professors at du Pont. where he served for many years as director of public relations. He is quite right that a scholar. or most any "communicator," seeking an audience in a business corporation will usually be turned over to a public relations man. Often this is a youngish man, product of a major in English, cross-pressured by a fancied role as office intellectual, well dressed and well paid; often big with the unborn American novel, and clearly not on the main career line to the top. For many of these reasons, the public relations man cannot serve the corporation well except in the routine dissemination of news releases. Nor does top management itself deal easily with intellectuals. Whether management can, by an effort of will, do better is not so easily argued. The differences in mode of discourse and style of thinking are hard to bridge. Such gaps are bridged by sensible people who want to do business together. But the intellectual does not necessarily want to do business with businessmen. The intellectual, on the whole, is bent not on understanding business but on competing with it as an influential élite in the political system,

So the author is correct to sound the alarum. His prescription, energetic top management leadership of the corporation's outside relationships, sounds reasonable. He lists the current attacks on business and provides tidy policy answers. But it rather seems as though he had the argument upside down. The attack is really on the autonomy of corporate management itself, more especially on the status and power corporate management enjoys in the political system. He is correct in saving that the academic knows little at firsthand about the large corporation. Academic faith in the wickedness of business does not need the inspiration of contact with reality. So one must discount the author's prescription of intelligent and diligent communication to reach the "communicators." Perhaps business will have to borrow from the experience of politics. The emerging élite may best be dealt with by making room at the top. Politicians are learning to do this with intellectuals. But in business only a few economists have reached top management in large banks. A few students of administration have consulting relationships with large industrial corporations. Occasional physical scientists and engineers turn up running their own corporations. Lawyers easily move over to senior management. Corporations often send executives back to the campus for "liberal" orientation. But making room for academic élites in management has not been thought of by the troubled writers of the business creed. Indeed, it still sounds like a silly idea and reminds one of Roosevelt's "Brain Trust."

Short of partial incorporation of the rival élite, business must assuredly learn to listen better than does this author. He would meet the challenge of "consumerism" by taking the lead in pollution abatement, drug policing, control of egregious advertising and so forth. But city air is probably cleaner than in a 19th century coal burning factory town. Drugs are safer than the conventional medicine of the 18th century or the wonderful nostrums of the 19th. Consumerism has blossomed in American politics, after innumerable false starts, only after the consumer was lavishly and durably served. Consumerism reflects not an increase in consumer hazards, but the failure of affluence to meet the aspirations of the liberal man. Having won the struggle for enough goods, enough choices, enough diversion, enough leisure, the consumer is frustrated precisely by his passive and essentially irresponsible role as consumer. The businessman, high priest of production, is therefore confronted with a more elusive and complicated dialogue than this book prepares him for. The book serves as an admirable example of the difficulty business discourse has in dealing with ideas in the political process.—Oliver Garceau, East Boothbay, Maine.

The American Chief Executive: The Presidency and the Governorship. By Joseph E. Kallen-Bach. (New York: Harper & Row, 1966. Pp. xii, 622.)

In writing this book, Professor Kallenbach had an interesting and novel idea. He has provided a comparative treatment of the fifty-one chief executives who reign in the federal and state governments. The effort has been well worth it, since, to the full extent that his subject permits, the author has used the governorship to throw light on the presidency, and vice versa.

The net result, however, does not equate the two offices. Similar in form, they are so dissimilar in the range of their functions that the difference of degree virtually becomes a difference in kind. This can readily be seen by contrasting Parts 1 and 2 of this book with Part 3. In the two former, where the author discusses the "constitutional foundations" and then the "structure of the office," the governorships are amply analyzed and as much space appears to be devoted to them as to the presidency. But the subject-matter in places becomes tedious, as usually happens when one attempts to summarize all the systems prevailing in the various states and to detail the various exceptions to the various generalizations.

When Professor Kallenbach reaches Part 3, which is concerned with "Executive Power and Functions," he comes alive—as does his reader. At the same time, almost inevitably, the presidency takes over, and the governors for the most part receive short shrift. And, how could it be otherwise? The office which is invested with national political power, which is the object of the most intense inter-party rivalries, and which is at the same time the leader of the country—for good or ill—in its external relations, cannot fail to have deeper significance than any governorships. Only three or four of the latter truly encompass a range of problems whose depth and import admit meaningful comparison with those of the president.

In the course of this general analysis, the author offers some interesting judgments. He reminds his reader that the earliest governorships paved the way for the presidency as that office emerged in the Constitution, and that the latter has since presented a norm to which the state offices have tended more and more to approximate. Although, in theory, the states are sometimes considered as laboratories for experimentation, in practice the experimenting has been conducted within a much narrower scale than the opportunities permitted. Indeed, as Mr. Kallenbach notes, "fundamental variations in the organizational pattern and role of the chief executive were wider and more significant among the original 13 state governments than they are now..." (p. 242).

Professor Kallenbach considers the arguments which have been advanced in favor of altering the structure of the presidency and assimilating it to a cabinet-parliamentary system. He rejects this possibility, rightly and realistically, because he thinks that the American type of chief executive has become such a part of our accepted tradition, and works on the whole so effectively, that drastic change in its character is out of the question. To this office, particularly at the federal level, he pays the deserved tribute that it has provided a focus for effective national leadership in public affairs.

Leadership, however, can have its dark or dangerous side. In the closing section of the book, the author peers into the future and observes the perils which arise increasingly from the aggrandizement of the military powers of the President and from the response to conditions of international crisis. Could even a form of Caesarism result from present tendencies, if extrapolated? These are not idle questions, especially since they are raised at a time when presidential action has led the country into a full-scale war which the Congress has never been asked to declare, and by gradual escalation has contrived to make support for executive actions politically synonymous with upholding the nation's honor.

Perhaps, these contemporary facts suggest an epilogue to this study of our chief executives. It is the salutary reminder that executive power exists in authoritarian regimes as well as in democracies. The key institution of government, however, which distinguishes democracy from dictatorship is the legislature, since there, and there alone, is the public forum for the continuous confrontation of the power to govern and the power to criticize.—Leslie Lipson, University of California, Berkeley.

Reorganizing Roosevelt's Government: The Controversy Over Executive Reorganization 1936-1939. By Richard Polenberg. (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1966. Pp. viii, 275. $5.95.)

The thesis of this book is that Franklin D. Roosevelt sought to order the structure of the welfare state he had fathered when he appointed the Brownlow Committee in 1936, and that the defeat of the Executive Reorganization Bill by the House of Representatives in 1938 after months of bitter controversy and with the crucial defection of more than one hundred of the two hundred and twenty-five who were members of the President's party, was a major setback and therefore a turning point in the history of the New Deal as a reform movement. On this defeat Polenberg approvingly quotes a New York World Telegram editorial to the effect that history would probably mark it as the crisis of FDR's political career, and Frank Gannett's comment that "It may be the turning point in our history" (pp. 175-176). According to Polenberg, "it was a shattering blow to Roosevelt's prestige. The vote indicated that the President had lost control of Congress" (p. 176). Again, "Nothing better illustrates the erosion of the New Deal than the contrast between Roosevelt's bold proposals of 1937 and the bland Reorganization Bill offered in 1939" (p. 185).

The thesis is advanced with fetching style but is unconvincing. First, historians are fond of spotting "turning points" and it is not clear why this defeat should be so regarded rather than FDR's 1937 defeat on Supreme Court reorganization, or, for that matter, the 1938 defeat in his effort to purge the Democratic party. Second, there is an implication that FDR's first term, through the 1936 elections, is the norm against which the President's relations with Congress and his party should be judged. But historians as well as political scientists regard the 1933-36 period as atypical, Third, FDR's ability to get significant legislation from Congress did not end with any of these three "turning points." For example, a few weeks before the April defeat of the Executive Reorganization Bill, the same Congress had enacted the second AAA; and a few weeks afterwards in June it enacted the Fair Labor Standards Act. Finally, the "bland Reorganization Bill" that became law in 1939, while different in major respects from the measure that failed, assured the development of the "institutionalized presidency." And, while it is customary to distinguish it from New Deal measures, repeal of the Arms Embargo in late 1939 points to the dominance that marked FDR's leadership of Congress and his party throughout the years of the

There is an elaborate apparatus of historical documentation. Forty-nine pages are filled with more than eight hundred references to items in fifteen pages of bibliography covering published documents, newspapers, biographies, books, articles, and unpublished manuscript papers of Congressmen. Senators, advocates and opponents, and various Government papers. Noticeably absent, but apparently unavoidably so, are any papers of two key Democaratic opponents of the Brownlow Report-Senator Harry F. Byrd of Virginia and Representative James Buchanan of Texas. An interview with Louis Brownlow in 1962 and one with Henry A. Wallace in 1963 are referred to briefly, and there is also some indication that James A. Farley was interviewed. The book is carefully indexed.

The chapters on the sources of opposition and the legislative conflict are impressive in the detail of the findings. But Polenberg's interpretation, especially of autonomous agency-legislator-interest group subsystems that successfully opposed the president, is weak. This was heady stuff for political scientists when the first Inter-University Case Program studies began to circulate nearly twenty years ago in mimeographed form, and when they were first compiled and published, Harold Stein.

ed., Public Administration and Policy Development (1952). The relating of these kinds of data to a theory of the political process dates at least from David B. Truman, The Governmental Process (1951), and J. Leiper-Freeman, The Political Process: Executive Bureau-Legislative Committee Relations (1955). Further, Polenberg's interpretation is cut to a pattern that sees white-hat liberals and black-hat reactionaries joined in battle; this was a battle that the guys in the white-hats lost. Such an interpretation, while perhaps engaging. overrides known complexities. That there were many stakes in the various proposals and counter-proposals for reorganization was clearly expounded bv Schuvler Wallace. FederalDepartmentalization: A Critique of Theories of Organization (1941).

Polenberg's volume may be regarded as a sequel to one published in 1963 by the same university press, Executive Reorganization and Reform in the New Deal: The Genesis of Administrative Management, 1900-1939, by Barry Dean Karl. Together they document an important controversy during Franklin D. Roosevelt's second term. Karl looks at the Brownlow Committee in relation to antecedents in the administrative management movement that emerged at the beginning of the twentieth century. Polenberg looks at the defeat of the Committee's proposals in 1938 and subsequent passage of the Reorganization Act of 1939. Karl's treatment is more compatible than Polenberg's with that of Schuyler Wallace. Karl's volume is based on his 1961 doctoral dissertation in history at Harvard ("Twentieth Century Concepts in Public Administration: Merriam, Brownlow, and Gulick") and was awarded the 1963 Faculty Prize of Harvard University Press. Polenberg's is based on his 1964 doctoral dissertation in history at Columbia ("Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Reorganization Controversy: 1936-1939").-MALCOLM B. Parsons, The Florida State University.

Presidential Vetoes: 1792-1945. By Carlton Jackson. (Athens, Georgia: University of Georgia Press, 1967. Pp. x, 254. $8.00.)

During the period 1792-1945, 1,762 vetoes were handed down by twenty-five different Presidents. Of these vetoes, only fifty-eight were over-ridden by Congress. During this same period, seven Presidents, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, John Quincy Adams, Martin Van Buren, William Harrison, Zachary Taylor, and Millard Fillmore chose not to exercise their veto power.

Prior to 1870, the Presidential veto power was exercised only eighty-five times; thus Professor Jackson is able to give each of these vetoes individual attention. With few exceptions, he approaches each veto in the same way. He presents the necessary background information followed by the President's stated reasons for vetoing the measure, the Congressional reaction to the veto, and the popular reaction as recorded in major national newspapers. Finally, after indicating whether or not the veto was sustained, he compares this veto with those previously considered. One gets the distinct impression that nearly every President expanded or redefined the use of the veto power in some way. For example, Andrew Jackson was the first President to use the veto power as an instrument to mold public opinion. Use of the veto enabled Jackson to play the intermediary between the people and the Congress. In fact, Jackson's veto of the Bank Rechartering Bill of 1832 was a major factor in his re-election. On the negative side, Jackson was the only President to use the veto "as an instrument of personal malice" (p. vii); his Maysville veto of an internal improvement proposal, ostensibly based on grounds of Constitutionality and national expediency, really was motivated by bitter feelings toward Henry Clay.

After the Civil War, the great number of pensions and private relief bills which inundated Congress forced both the President and Congress to alter their procedures for handling vetoed bills. When the President could no longer give personal attention to each bill, cabinet members and other subordinates made the final decisions on whether or not bills should be vetoed. Congress, finding it could no longer take a formal vote, simply referred many vetoed bills to committees where they were permitted to die.

From 1870 on, Professor Jackson groups the Presidents in an attempt to discover major themes within their administrations. The vetoes of Grant, Hayes, and Arthur fall into four distinct groups: (1) vetoes of private bills relating to the Civil War, (2) vetoes in defense of the gold standard, (3) vetoes to protect the executive authority from Congress, and (4) vetoes to prevent strict immigration laws. The Presidents from 1885 to 1909 cast most of their important vetoes with regard to the protection of the Treasury against unwarranted intrusions and the maintenance of personal principles. Then Taft and Wilson manifested such an unyielding posture on matters of principle that their vetoes evoked bitter reactions in Congress. The vetoes of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, like those of Pierce and Buchanan, were out of touch with the times. They dealt primarily with pensions, farm relief, Government competition with private industry, general relief, and Philippine independence.

The last chapter of this book is devoted to the vetoes of Franklin Roosevelt. Roosevelt handed down a record 631 vetoes. He also began the practice of returning vetoes to Congress en masse, and on one occasion he personally delivered his veto message to a joint session of Congress. FDR was similar to Jackson in his pragmatic and occasionally inconsistent use of the veto. In addition, both Roosevelt and Jackson used the veto as an instrument to stir up popular support.

For the sake of continuity, it would have been helpful if Professor Jackson had prefaced his book with a survey of the thoughts of the men who inserted the veto provision into the Constitution. This might have demonstrated, as Edward Corwin pointed out, that the veto was seldom used as the framers had anticipated. In addition, more discussion might have been devoted to the reasons why seven Presidents chose not to use the veto, and some attention could have been given to the vetoes which were written since 1945. Finally, from the standpoint of the political scientist, it would seem that the major theme of this book would have been clarified if the book had been organized in a functional rather than chronological order. By the same token, it would have been of immense value if Professor Jackson had provided a concluding chapter uniting the minor themes. As it is, the book stops abruptly at 1945, and the reader is left to draw his own conclusions. In sum, although the major theme is almost lost in the over-abundance of minor details. Presidential Vetoes contains many interesting and informative episodes concerning Presidential vetoes.—Robert J. Kulisheck, University of Iowa.

The Truman-MacArthur Controversy and the Korean War. By John W. Spanier. (New York: W. W. Norton & Company. 1965. Pp. viii, 311. $1.85.)

This is a second edition, although not labeled as such, of the same work published under the same title by the Harvard University Press (see this Review, March 1960).

In this edition, Professor Spanier's dual objectives remain the same as in the original: first, to analyze "the basic decisions which American policy-makers had to make during the Korean War" in order to set the stage for his more fundamental and second purpose, an analysis of "the problems of civil-military relations during a limited war." Mr. Spanier identifies these decisions as follows: the initial one, "to repel the North Korean invasion by force; . . . the neutralization of Formosa; the Inchon landing; the crossing of the 38th Parallel; the 'home by Christmas' offensive; the decision not to extend the war to China after Communist China's intervention; to condemn Peking as an aggressor; and MacArthur's dismissal."

Each of these decisions is thoroughly and reasonably considered. The objectives and the objections, the frustrations and the fears, Korean strategy and global implications, international relations and domestic politics, the roles of the military field commander and his superiors at home—all is woven into a single fabric. Washington started out with the limited objective of pushing the North Koreans back across the 38th Parallel. However, after MacArthur's success at Inchon, Washington was perfectly willing to buy his views and attempt to unite Korea by military force. Then it returned to its original position after MacArthur reached the Yalu River and Communist China intervened. Vacillation with respect to basic policy hardly makes the task of the field commander easy. In spite of this, it is supposed to be a cardinal sin in the military not to follow the lawful orders of one's superiors. In instance after instance, Spanier indicates that MacArthur was either incapable of or unwilling to follow the policies of his Commander-in-Chief. In fact, he even issued public statements which contradicted Presidential policy. In this context, the question of who was right and who was wrong is irrelevant. The only question that is relevant is who was President-Truman or MacArthur. No one could possibly picture President Truman as a vassal; it is not surprising that he exercised his constitutional prerogative and relieved the General. What is surprising, and perhaps indicative of MacArthur's psyche, is that the General could have expected any other outcome.

The main issues raised by the Truman-MacArthur controversy are the recognition that "nuclear bombs have outmoded total war as suicidal and made the world safe only for limited wars," and the maintenance of civilian supremacy over the military during a limited war crisis. Although these problems are discussed throughout the book, they are central to the first and last chapters; they are the chapters that have been revised in this edition and they are also the best and most significant.

Mr. Spanier is convincing in his argument that military considerations for a total victory must not be permitted to dominate political considerations for limited victory. He observes that the enemy would not accept total defeat and thus would escalate what was originally a limited war into a total war. But he is less convincing in depicting MacArthur's dismissal as the "first real test" of the doctrine of civil supremacy over the military authority. Spanier himself notes that the State Department and the Defense Department were in agreement on the relationship between military strategy and political objectives. He also notes that President Truman relied more on Generals Bradley, Vandenberg, and Collins, and Admiral Sherman (the Joint Chiefs), rather than on Secretary of State Acheson, when presenting the Administration's case at the Senate hearings. While the State Department and the Joint Chiefs were in agreement, Spanier doesn't present evidence as to who influenced whom; it is possible, then, in this context also to conclude that the civil authority emerged as merely the arbiter between two military authorities, rather than the master of both. Would the President have been able to prevail if the Joint Chiefs and the field commander had been in agreement and both in opposition to the State Department? What may be concluded is that even a politically strong and popular field commander as MacArthur cannot withstand the combined will of a determined President supported by the Defense Establishment and the State Department. But this is not the "first real test" even in this limited view: President Lincoln had trouble with his generals, too, and dismissed a number of field commanders until he found one to his liking.—Felix Rackow, Case Western Reserve University.

Charles Evans Hughes: Politics and Reform in New York, 1905-1910. By ROBERT F. WESSER. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1967. Pp. ix, 366. $8.50.)

The name of Charles Evans Hughes is forever linked to the odious appelation of "the nine old men." This study, focusing only upon the gubernatorial years, explains clearly why this man never attained the stature of a great political figure. Hughes trained for the ministry, took up law, and then made a reluctant entry into politics. As a public investigator, in 1906, he gained widespread attention by uncovering misdeeds of insurance companies in the State of New York. Because of this prominence as a reformer, and the party's need for a new face, Hughes received the nomination as the Republican choice for governor. He was a hesitant candidate, having once declined to run for mayor of New York City: but with the able assistance of Theodore Roosevelt, Hughes defeated the Democratic "prophet of unrest," William Randolph Hearst.

During the tenure as Governor of New York, Hughes tried to implement reforms, secure regulatory legislation, and further the cause of clean government. Hughes' "independence of character" and dedication to the general welfare were noteworthy, but the Governor's lack of political acumen was a distinct liability. He failed to gain control of his party and, in fact, seemed to disdain working with key political leaders in the state legislature. Instead of using the political machinery at his disposal, Governor Hughes relied far too much upon public opinion. The results of this approach proved disappointing as far as legislative achievements were concerned. Hughes did not supplement his moral fervor with the political maneuvering needed to assure success. He failed to provide party leadership and, because of his aloofness, the Governor did not impress Theordore Roosevelt as potential material for the presidency.

Charles Evans Hughes was not temperamentally suited to the hurly-burly of politics. Despite his good intentions and stoic-like exterior, he, as the author substantiates, "never quite emerged as an assertive force." Theodore Roosevelt was distinctly disappointed in his amateurishness, calling it "mugwumpism." The President placed the mantle of succession upon William Howard Taft in 1908 instead of selecting the New York Governor. Hughes ran for a second term, winning by a plurality of 69,000, while Taft won New York's presidential electors by a margin of 203,000. Hughes seemed to have learned little from his first term. He continued to alienate party leaders, refused to use patronage to his advantage, and continued the practice of uttering moral preachments without commensurate political activity to attain legislative objectives. In 1910, Hughes admitted privately that he was "tired" of politics. He notified President Taft, "I do not dare to run the chance of breaking down mentally. I must get out." His escape from politics came that same year when a vacancy on the Supreme Court allowed Taft to nominate him for the position. With the Republican party in disarray, the stage was set for the defeat of Henry L. Stimson in 1910.

Charles Evans Hughes preferred the quiet atmosphere of the high court. He had one more political date with destiny in 1916; but after narrowly missing the presidency, Hughes served as Secretary of State and then received another appointment to the Supreme Court—this time as the Chief Justice. In that capacity he asserted his leadership only once, and that was after Franklin D. Roosevelt threatened to strip the Court of its power of judicial review.

This monograph, although narrow in scope, is an extremely valuable study. It reveals concisely why high-minded men sometimes fail in the realm of politics. By making judicious use of the papers of Hughes, and those associated with him politically, as well as utilizing the Roosevelt correspondence, the author presents a factual record of the period in question. The picture of Hughes that emerges is that of a legal-minded moralist who never completely understood the mechanics of professional politics. It was obvious from this fine work that Charles Evans Hughes was a good man who lacked the necessary requirements for statesmanship.—Frederick H. Schapsmeier, Wisconsin State University, Oshkosh.

Back to Back: The Duel between FDR and the Supreme Court. By Leonard Baker. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1967. Pp. 311. $6.95.)

This is the first book on the Roosevelt Court-packing fight since Alsop and Catledge's The 168 Days, published in 1938. Like them, the present author is also a journalist, and the book has the virtues and defects of a journalistic account. Baker has the advantage of almost thirty years of perspective and accumulated historical data, and he has utilized the papers, among others, of Borah, Hughes, Morgenthau, Norris, and of course Roosevelt. The surprising thing is how comparatively little new light has thereby been thrown on this historic controversy.

The principal new material has to do with Herbert Hoover's ill-fated effort to use the affair for refurbishing his image. According to an unnamed Republican "prominent in the Court dispute" whose papers Baker saw but whose name he agreed not to mention, Hoover was unwilling to accept the Republican strategy of allowing dissident Democrats to kill the plan. Hoover was the first front-line Republican to deliver a public speech attacking the proposal. At the same time he commissioned an agent to go to Washington and urge Brandeis to retire and then make a speech against the Court plan. If this scheme worked, Hoover proposed to take credit for masterminding it. Actually other people had already made this suggestion to Brandeis. In any case, Hoover's emissary, who did not know Brandeis personally, made the hilarious faux pas of going to see Justice McReynolds, who had not spoken civilly to Brandeis for years, and asking him to suggest to Brandeis that he resign, McReynolds sent the hapless agent on to see the Chief Justice, who declined to get involved. He then wound up his mission with Senator Borah and offered Hoover's help in lining up the country, but Borah replied that he hoped Hoover would stay out of the fight entirely. Baker concludes that Hoover was "the first political casualty of the Court fight.'

For general readers Baker has told one of America's great political stories interestingly and well. Only the captious will be bothered by reference to the income tax decision as occurring in 1885 or to Adkins v. Children's Hospital as involving a state minimum wage law.—C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, University of Chicago.

Earl Warren: A Political Biography. By Leo Katcher. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1967. Pp. 502. $8.50.)

At first I was not sure that Leo Katcher's biography of Earl Warren merited review in the A.P.S.R., but since the book has received a good deal of acclaim, much of which may not be warranted, a few comments should be raised.

Katcher has put an amazing amount of energy into researching the life of Warren and presents the reader with some good insights, especially during the earlier period of Warren's life when he manifested a strong conservative philosophy cut from the mold of Herbert Hoover. One would have hoped that the overall endeavor could have resulted in a product not unlike Alpheus Mason's books Brandeis: A Free Man's Life and Harlan Fiske Stone, Pillar of the Law. The Katcher book, however, falls far short of this mark. This is not attributable to the energy which went into the research and the writing of the book; rather, it is because of the imprecision and sloppy manner in which some of the data are handled. The book simply is filled with a number of factual mistakes and erroneous interpretations of judicial decisions. Admittedly, a reviewer can become intoxicated with "nit-picking" thereby destroying the purpose of the review, but in the case of this political biography the mistakes are of sufficient magnitude to significantly detract from the book as a whole.

What the Katcher book needed was a legal editor who could bring some precision and interpretation to those aspects of the book requiring more than a journalist's understanding of the law. Indeed the blame for this spoilization of what could have been a fine piece of work may not rest with Katcher at all. It more appropriately may be attributed to McGraw-Hill for not giving Katcher more assistance in this area. Katcher cannot, however, escape the responsibility of certain journalistic writing habits that have an annoying impact upon the reader. For instance, upon Warren's ascendency to the Supreme Court, Katcher notes that within a year "Warren was a peacock among sparrows." If a reviewer were to take the same liberties in comparing Katcher's book with that of other political biographies of Supreme Court justices. Katcher could be characterized as an Edgar Guest in a room full of Longfellows. Obviously neither of these analogies is well-founded. In sum, Earl Warren, A Political Biography makes for enjoyable reading, but it must be read with a very careful eye.—CLIFFORD M. LYTLE, University of Arizona.

The Roots of Isolationism: Congressional Voting and Presidential Leadership in Foreign Policy. By Leroy N. Rieselbach. (Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, 1966. Pp. xvi, 240, $2.95.)

This fine study is an analysis of roll-call votes, principally concerning foreign aid and foreign trade, in the House of Representatives. The data come from four Congresses, the 76th, 80th, 83rd, and 85th; a research design which yields a twenty-year time base and four different combinations of partisan control of the White House and Capitol Hill. Professor Rieselbach has organized the roll-call data into Guttman scales to determine the extent of "isolationism," "moderation," and "internationalism" in these Congresses. Social, political, and constituency characteristics are related to these three forms of roll-call behavior by means of correlation and time series analyses.

Professor Rieselbach finds that isolationism is a multidimensional phenomenon. "On the whole the data of this study show that isolationism cannot be explained in terms of any one factor, that its correlates are not fixed but rather change in response to alterations in the political and legislative situations, and that at any given time the shape of isolationism may differ with respect to different issues. There are different 'isolationisms' at different times and on different subjects." In the 76th Congress, isolationism was associated with the Republican party and internationalism with the Democratic party. Beginning with the 80th Congress for foreign aid, and with the 83rd Congress for foreign trade, there was a damping of the sharp inter-party division on foreign policy with coastal Republicans shifting toward internationalism and southern Democrats shifting toward isolationism. In a postscript, Professor Rieselbach notes a re-emergence of Republican isolationism and Democratic internationalism in the 88th Congress.

Few personal attributes were found to be consistently related to foreign policy voting behavior, but Catholicism, a business background, election from a competitive district, and service on the Foreign Affairs Committee were frequently associated with internationalism. These personal factors were better predictors if they tended in the same direction as the broad political forces operating at the time in question. Constituency characteristics, on the other hand, were consistently related to roll-call votes. After the end of the straight inter-party contests on foreign aid and foreign trade, eastern, high ethnic (over 1% born in Germany or Ireland), high education, urban, and high socio-economic districts were significantly more likely to send internationalists to the House of Representatives.

Professor Rieselbach has made a thorough canvass of the literature on isolationism and has related his own findings to it. This feature makes his book a particularly useful contribution to a cumulatively developing body of knowledge. Throughout one finds such helpful footnotes as: "This finding is in direct contrast to that of Smuckler ("The Region of Isolationism," pp. 399-400) who found a negative relationship between high education and internationalist voting. Our data tend to support the findings of much survey research that internationalism and high education are positively correlated. Again, we should note the possibility that the difference in the findings results from different procedures in measuring educational levels."

Whether one finds inconsistencies in the analysis of this complex subject matter depends on how one reads the author's many propositions. For example, Proposition 2-1 states "There exist in Congress clusters of issues, foreign and domestic, which are sufficiently distinguishable to be considered as distinct segments of congressional activity." Proposition 2-2 says "Beyond foreign aid and foreign trade, there can be no constant definition of the content of congressional isolationism." This seems illogical if foreign issues constitute a "distinct segment of congressional activity." However, the first proposition rests upon a table giving correlations between scales representing four different policy domains in four different Congresses, correlations reflecting relationships between some 47,000 individual votes. If these data are taken as evidence which simply confirms the proposition, then there is inconsistency. But if the correlations are recognized as subtle and complex statements in a probabilistic argument and the proposition is regarded as a less refined summary statement, the only inconsistency is that caused by the inability of a single sentence to capture all the rich detail of a correlation matrix.

The limitations to this study result from the use of bivariate technique to study a multivariate phenomenon. The two-by-two relationships identify the variables associated with isolationism, but the analysis does not go very far beyond that point. It is hard to understand why Professor Rieselbach did not take the natural step into multivariate analysis, especially since he presents bivariate correlations and percentage distributions (but not correlations) with one or more controls applied. If he had told us what happened to the correlations when controlled with appropriate test factors, his statements about the relative influence of independent variables ("Political variables seem to be stronger than social forces when they push in opposite directions.") could have been strengthened.

Both the weaknesses and the strengths of this study as a contribution to political science are derivative from its focus on foreign policy voting behavior. Because of the weak negative association in this policy domain between constituency attitudes and congressional voting pointed out by Miller and Stokes, and because of the well-known presidential preeminence on foreign policy, such data are not very good general evidence about congressional voting or presidential-congressional relations. However, there is also a fast-developing professional interest in the domestic sources of foreign policy. And on this, his chosen topic, Professor Rieselbach has much to say and says it very well.—John H. Kessel, Allegheny College.

Sectional Stress and Party Strength: A Study of Roll-Call Voting Patterns in the U.S. House of Representatives, 1836-1860. By Thomas B. ALEXANDER. (Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1967. Pp. xvii, 284. $10.00.) At a time when the ICPR is training historians in empirical techniques and amassing historical data for analysis, Thomas B. Alexander's book should be a welcome addition to the work done by Joel Silbey and William O. Aydelotte. Unfortunately it is not. Seemingly enchanted with the ability to analyze pre-Civil War roll call votes in the United States House on the University of Alabama's computer he neglects to tie his findings into any sort of meaningful interpretation of the politics of the period. Indeed, the bulk of the book—220 out of 280 pages—is devoted to presentation of scalograms, graphs, computer printout, and computer programs rather than text.

Alexander's primary goal is to examine sectional and party splits in Congress in the twenty-four years preceding the Civil War. To do this roll calls from only the first session or from special sessions preceding the first regular session were used as the basic data; roll calls for the second session were omitted because the sessions were "lame duck" and "since a substantial proportion of the House membership failed to return to the subsequent Congress, the element of personal attitude or even frustration might enter more freely into decision-making in the 'lame-duck' sessions" (pp. 3-4). The Representatives were divided by section-New England, Middle Atlantic, South Atlantic, South Central, Northern Northwest and Southern Northwest (composed of the southern sections of Illinois, Indiana and Ohio)—and by party. The 268,000 individual roll call votes were Guttman-scaled into scalable sets and analyzed in terms of section and party.

In examining each of the twelve sessions of Congress from 1836-60 Alexander finds that only two scalable sets of roll call votes appear with any continuity, economic considerations and slavery involvements. The extent to which the issues formed unidimensional scales purposively rather than through random chance is an issue to be raised since the economic issues facing the 24th Congress involved such unrelated topics as the location of a national military foundry. Bank of the United States, Cumberland Road construction, tariff reduction, and Michigan and Arkansas statehood. Alexander's treatment of the Cumberland Road votes is curious since they are included as economic issues in the 24th Congress, dropped in the 25th "because local interest dominated the positions more than party or sectional interest" (p. 26), and re-included in the 26th Congress.

After examining economic and slavery issues for each session Alexander concludes that prior to 1850 party was the far more salient factor in voting in the House although sectional differences were beginning to arise. After 1850, however, the Democratic party position on economic and slavery matters began to conform to southern sectional attitudes. "By the mid-1850's the consequence of this fusion of southern and Democratic position on economic matters, reinforcing a comparable blending on slavery concerns, had cost the northern Democrats so dearly in political appeal that the demise of the party in New England and its virtual elimination throughout the upper north was immediately to follow" (p. 110). While the data support this conclusion it is unfortunate that Alexander did not attempt to relate shifts in party positions with party activities outside of Congress for that same period. Or failing this, far more could have been done in analyzing the more than a quarter-million roll call votes. Alexander must have realized this; in a footnote in his concluding chapter he states:

It is not the purpose of this appraisal to pursue all relevant conclusions that might be indicated by the roll-call analyses offered. One of the reasons for making available these data and the patterns exposed by certain research designs is to furnish conveniently prepared information for use by students of the period. This appraisal seeks only to explore some of the promising avenues for question framing and further investigation (footnote 1, p. 110).

Under these circumstances Sectional Stress and Party Strength may have its greatest value as a kind of pre-Civil War version of America Votes for the House of Representatives.—James J. Best, University of Washington.

Water Research. Ed. By Allen V. Kneese and Stephen C. Smith. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1966. Pp. 508. $12.50.)

Northern California's Water Industry. By Joe S. Bain, Richard E. Caves and Julius Margolis. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1966. Pp. xvii, 729. $15.00.)

For political scientists, public investment theory focuses on a central concern of the discipline—power in the service of purpose. Normative in its basic premises, this body of theory draws attention to the need for designing decisional frameworks which optimally promote the public interest. The challenge posed by such theory to fruitful collaboration between "neutral" empiricists and normative institutionalists is a formidable one. Sadly, the tension between these, for all its potential benefits, has often yielded little in the way of viable results.

Both volumes suggest new areas in which political scientists of varying persuasions may labor with profit. The collection edited by Kneese and Smith consists of 26 papers originally presented at the seventh Western Resources Conference by scholars working in the physical and social sciences. It includes Bains' condensed summary of the larger, separately published, opus.

Attempting to cope meaningfully with issues raised by the presence of "public goods" and economic externalities (an index of current preoccupation with environmental quality), several participants call for a restructuring of traditional interest-group politics. Their essays describe a continuum of estrangement from the pluralist model. The range embraces Irving Fox's plea for a more public-oriented alignment of forces representing mixtures of centralized and decentralized perspectives to Hubert Marshall's, and Bain, Caves and Margolis' (BC&M) a-political recipe for rational resources policy. Fox endeavors to confer greater leverage on politically disadvantaged groupings by changes in organizational and intergovernmental relationships.

Infatuated by claims for disinterested professionalism, Marshall and the California study group opt out of politics and advocate a transfer of decision-making responsibility almost exclusively to impartial panels of experts. While "nonpolitical solutions" may be highly politic in some situations, the proposed schemes are neither feasible nor sufficiently sensitive responses to the complexities and subtleties (note Gilbert White's remarks) of resources problems to warrant serious consideration. Marshall's reliance on economists to rectify distorted agency benefit-cost ratios reflects a misreading of the professional pulse. Increasingly, economists are becoming critical of the undue concentration on economic efficiency as the summum bonum. Striving to incorporate more elusive psychological dimensions in their analysis, they have fashioned the concept of option demand as a substitute for demand expressed through the market-place. But this tool, admittedly vague and imprecise, has hardly won widespread acceptance. Professional debate will doubtless increase in intensity on the suitability of measures of willingness to pay (or their surrogates), and the parameters of option demand (conflicting treatments of this problem appear in papers by Knetsch and Davis, and Davidson, Adams and Seneca). Further disagreement among economists will probably emerge from a heightened awareness of the salience of "intrasystem and intersystem trade-offs" (Smith). Krutilla's piece, for example, on the Columbia River Treaty alludes to external political factors which may have influenced the negotiations, even though these elements remain outside his analytical structure.

BC&M need not have skewered themselves on the rusty "Board of Review" idea if they had studied the prospective impact of legislative reapportionment, desalination for the urban coastal region and consequent shifts in water-related values. To be sure, BC&M observe that "various fragments of evidence, not previously discussed, suggest the forthcoming possibilities of rivalry and effective alternatives. One such element is the rapid increase in the number of retailing agencies with economical access to alternative sources of water" (p. 497). Surprisingly, this insight is never really cranked into their prescriptive analysis. Inasmuch as technological advance (note impact of improvements in pumping technology on political behavior in 1890's, p. 431) may work its greatest influence on growing urban areas which traditionally have displayed most anxiety over anticipated shortages, misallocations of scarce resources may not be as troublesome a problem in the future. Under these conditions, a polycentric political system, as described earlier by Vincent Ostrom in this Review, may function quite rationally in the public interest. The authors, however, are too fixated on the idea of scarcity to allow for sufficient degrees of freedom in their theoretical formulation. Indeed, the evidence which they themselves adduce to demonstrate this overriding fear of water famine is not entirely consistent. BC&M point out that many water districts have failed aggressively to pursue new sources of supply (see especially material on Santa Clara and Sonoma counties). Several have willingly traded water for cash. Some "potential customers wishing to defer a decision" have been threatened by the State development authority. Most disappointing in this regard is the absence of discussion on patterns of conduct and performance in the amply-endowed North Coastal Region. BC&M deserve praise for eschewing the simplistic Milliman-Hirshleifer approach, recognizing the externalties problem, and for proceeding along "behavioral" lines when economic data were unavailable. But it is unfortunate that their rich lode of political observations was not sifted and ordered by a political scientist.

Normative perspectives may open new paths for empirical research. In turn, empirical analysis can test the viability of proposals drafted to realize more transcendent interests. Arthur Maass couples these differing orientations in assailing welfare economics for its almost exclusive preoccupation with the objective of economic efficiency. He insightfully suggests that the secondary benefit methodology issue may be more effectively handled by explicitly confronting the existence of multiple objectives. In a daring paper which probes the capacity of the legislative process to furnish systems analysts with a specific set of objectives against which to evaluate alternative projects, he has accumulated evidence of trade-offs among various goals in the urban renewal and interstate highway fields. Maass would be the first to acknowledge the relative crudity of his technique and the difficulty of deriving acceptable inputs from the political sector (Fox and Robert Davis are far more sceptical). Hopefully, this pioneering attempt to associate empirical analysis and normative theory will inspire still more sophisticated efforts by other scholars. Ultimately, it may prove possible to understand the nature of the rigidities in the social environment and to find the means to surmount them.—Ashley L. Schiff, State University of New York at Stony Brook.

The Politics of Federal Aid to Education in 1965: A Study in Political Innovation. By Philip Meranto. (Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1967. Pp. xiii, 144. $3.25.)

Professor Meranto's argument is that changes in several interrelated factors converged in 1965 to enable Congress to enact a general aid to education bill. He concludes that it is not possible to rank these factors "systematically in order of importance."

Passage of the 1965 Act is regarded as political innovation that was induced in part by such "environmental changes" as the rediscovery of poverty, a metropolitan trend and the civil rights movement. Such "demand articulators" as the President, political parties, organized interests and constituents underwent changes sufficient to contribute also to the momentum for the bill's success. Finally, changes within the House of Representatives, namely a larger Democratic majority on the Education and Labor Committee, Graham Barden's replacement by Adam Clayton Powell as committee chairman, and enlargement of the Rules Committee, facilitated the task of enacting aid-to-education legislation.

The strength of Professor Meranto's book lies in the clear exposition of the necessary conditions for a legislative breakthrough. There is a convincing grasp of how those non-congruent sub-issue conflicts that for years had paralyzed Congress in this policy area finally and one-by-one were surmounted. Quite importantly (and somewhat rare for a legislative case study) there is a demonstration of detailed understanding of the end product as substantive policy and of its relationship to the activity that produced it. For these virtues the book is a scholarly contribution.

Aside from a few minor embarrassments that should have been corrected in proof—incorrect references to the "House Subcommittee on Education" (p. 36) and the "House Committee on Education and Welfare" (p. 53), and repeated allusion to voting "blocks" (p. 86 et seq.)—there appear to be two weaknesses. These are a misapplication of systems analysis, and a disturbing reluctance to even try to determine the relative importance of the independent variables.

Systems analysis as I understand it enables one to abstract sets of behavior (along with their antecedents and consequences) that are interrelated and have meaning analytically, but whose boundaries as a system do not necessarily correspond to the boundaries of concrete entities, such as institutions. When the boundaries of the analytical system are simply those of an institution which is the real object of analysis, then the language of the systems approach may degenerate into blague, and otherwise lucid arguments may become unnecessarily obfuscated. Although Professor Meranto intends to employ the concept of legislative system in the manner of Wahlke and his associates, it becomes apparent early in the book that what he means by "legislative system" is simply "legislature."

Professor Meranto's reluctance to make statements regarding the relative importance of a group of presumably causal factors that are not amenable to symbolic treatment is understandable. I should have hoped, however, that his obvious mastery of the subject matter would have provided the necessary encouragement for a qualitative judgment. Surely the metropolitan trend was not of so great importance as the other "environmental changes"-the rediscovery of poverty and the civil rights movement. The impact of metropolitanization had not vet struck Congress in 1965. Between Wesberry and the November 1964 election only four states had redistricted. There is no evidence that non-metropolitan Congressmen would have been receptive to an urban oriented bill in the absence of provisions that would aid the deprived pupils wherever they lived.

I would guess, moreover, that Presidential commitment and large Democratic majorities in Congress were of greater importance than changes in either interest group positions or constituency attitudes. As the author makes clear, "The Democratic vote alone . . . was sufficient to gain passage of the bill in the House and in the Senate as well . . ." (p. 93). The book itself demonstrates that the data on constituency attitudes are inconclusive, and are of dubious comparability from one survey to the next. The ability of the National Education Association and the National Catholic Welfare Conference (now the U.S. Catholic Conference) to coalesce was a result of administration strategy and the wording of the bill.

The three internal changes mentioned by the author certainly contributed to a more favorable milieu for education legislation. It is about time, however, for political scientists to take a new look at the Education and Labor Committee. The old cliches about this committee, generated in the late fifties and repeated in part by Professor Meranto and others, still contain a germ of truth. To be sure, there is much partisan bickering. But this results from the committee's jurisdiction over high conflict issues and not over the nature of committee members. At least since 1959, the committee has included moderates from competitive districts, and on those occasions when it has confronted negotiable issues the committee has been able to achieve bipartisan consensus. The Brademas ad hoc subcommittee on higher education emerged in 1961 with a unanimous report, and the success of the college aid bill in 1963 was due in part to extensive bipartisan agreement on Edith Green's special subcommittee on education. My point here is merely that any assessment of changes in the Education and Labor Committee ought to account for these factors as well as the changed party ratio that resulted from the 1964 election. Success in the Education and Labor Committee is not always a product of raw power.

On balance, Professor Meranto's discussion of each contributing factor is knowledgeable and convincing. His reluctance to distinguish their relative importance to the passage of the bill is a type of intellectual caution that is laudable in some contexts. Perhaps a reviewer ought to respect the author's intellectual tastes in such matters and let it go at that. I feel denied something, however, and I believe that what is a good book could have been even better.—LAWRENCE K. PETTIT, The American Council on Education.

The Politics of Poverty. By John C. Donovan. (New York: Pegasus Press, 1967. Pp. 157. $5.75.)

Professor Donovan, former assistant to Willard Wirtz, has given us a sketchy, highly superficial but readable review of the formation of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 and of the political issues involved in its first two years of operation. He makes several arguments worth noting here.

- (1) The Office of Economic Opportunity had a multitude of goals and aspirations, many of which were unachievable in the short run, others of which were highly contradictory. This led to grave administrative problems within OEO, and to difficult relationships with other agencies.
- (2) Neither the authors of the EOA, the President, the Congress, Sargent Shriver, the Bureau of the Budget, the press nor the public realized the meaning or import of the Act's politically potent requirement that community action programs be "developed, conducted and administered with the maximum feasible participation of residents of the areas and members of the groups served."
- (3) Although the EOA is an almost classic example of what has been called "the professionalization of reform" and of an executive-originated proposal, the day has not yet arrived when Congress will give up to the executive ultimate control over program development and operation.
- (4) The war in Vietnam killed any possible chance for real commitment of the nation's resources to the search for solutions of the country's domestic problems.
- (5) Fundamental reform, and for that matter, abolition of poverty, were, with a few exceptions, mere flights of rhetoric rather than real objectives of the President, the Congress, and the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Professor Donovan's book is a frightening one for several reasons. First, it clearly demonstrates how irrational our decision-making system can be. Assisted by the emotional shock which followed the Kennedy assassination, and eager for success in domestic matters where he was mistrusted, President Johnson called for and claimed to establish a war on poverty which apparently neither he nor any of his advisors understood. Even Congress overlooked the fact that the legislation contained within it a mechanism which could fundamentally alter the allocation and exercise of political power-and of the rewards and benefits which the political system distributes. It is not at all disturbing that such an alteration should be made: to the contrary, it is essential that we do so. It is, however, unsettling that our political leaders often do not comprehend the implications of their words and deeds.

In the face of such circumstances, it becomes essential that we, as political scientists, recognize the role played by ignorance, chance, and lack of information. We need not and should not start with the assumption that decision-making, or for that matter, the political system is a rational process.

Second, the impact of the book is distressing because it clearly demonstrates that the administration, either wittingly or unwittingly, created hopes for winning the war on poverty without developing and supporting a program for that purpose. The Johnson administration has refused to commit to the war on poverty the necessary resources to begin to make a change in the way the poor exist. Professor Donovan at one point characterizes this as a "cruel hoax." It is more than that. If social science has produced any finding related to the war on poverty, it is that when a people's expectations far exceed achievements, unrest and revolutionary activities are to be expected.

Third, the book implies, convincingly, that Johnson failed completely in his attempt to fight the war in Vietnam and the war on poverty. After identifying the war on poverty as his personal crusade, the President virtually abandoned it. The decision to pursue the former at the expense of the latter, whether rationally decided upon or not, may have serious implications for the continued survival of the country's basic political values.

Finally, I am troubled by Professor Donovan's overly optimistic view as to how a solution of this country's racial problems can be achieved. He argues that "the Negro has real and substantial political power in his hands now," and that change can and will come through the use of this present political power. The situation is actually far more complicated and much less hopeful as is easily seen by a careful review of the literature on Negro politics. Negro political power is highly restricted by whites, largely undeveloped and greatly lacking in experience. Moreover, there remains a great deal of white political power-not just in Mississippi but in Newark and Boston and Washington—that is potentially more effective than black power. This white power is also determined not to give up either the power or the benefits which accrue therefrom. Moreover, as Professor Donovan's chronicle of the experiences with community action shows, the system can win even when it mistakenly gives to those who would bring about reform the very powerful weapons of office, money and legitimacy. The 1967 Green Amendment easily removed these legitimate political weapons from the hands of the poor. With such demonstrations that the system is closed to normal political demands, is it any wonder that it is being threatened by force?

In the December 1967 issue of this review one reviewer suggested the withholding of the publication of a book until the author could answer this question: "How can sufficient change be brought about through the political process so that the 'have-nots' will not feel compelled to resort to violence and destruction in order to gain 'equality." I advocate no such reticence (the publishing houses would have to close up!). I do suggest, however, that Professor Donovan's hope in the present political power of Negroes is naive. Militant community action, within the system as it operated those few brief days between 1964 and 1967, is more likely to be the answer than Professor Donovan's faith in Negro political power. Perhaps President Kennedy put it most succinctly: "Those who make peaceful revolutions impossible make violent revolutions inevitable."-John H. STRANGE, Duke University.

The Negro in Federal Employment. By Samuel Krislov. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1967. Pp. 157. $5.00.)

Professor Krislov's work in the field of public law and the judicial process is well known and is rightly admired. It may come as a surprise to some that his most recent book mentions not at all, the federal courts. This is altogether appropriate for one who sustains an abiding interest in the civil rights movement, for the cutting edge of that movement has shifted from legal to political and economic concerns. In considering Negro jobs, constitutional questions reflecting the aspirations of the group are not so much raised as they were when voting and educational policy set the priorities of civil rights leaders. The national debate now focuses on a new set of planning and economic priorities, and Professor Krislov's slim volume makes an outsized contribution to that debate.

The author has set himself the task of describing and evaluating the major elements of the equal employment program within the federal service. The assumption which gives broad gauge relevance to this exercise in reviewing minority group employment in the federal government is that "if elimination of prejudice cannot be achieved in the public bureaucracy, it is unlikely that it will be achieved anywhere."

The issues raised by this new quest for economic equity are described in the opening three chapters principally in an historical and administrative context. In these chapters, a certain amount of Leonard White-style historicism and Max Weber-style reification blur the statement of the issues as they are uniquely relevant to the 1960's. The balance of the book more successfully supplies an analysis and evaluation of today's problems of civil rights and civil service. The last four chapters give the book its very considerable strength, and here the discussion is shaped by contemporary behavioral and personnel theory perspectives, Professor Krislov's own analytical skills, and the results of interviews which he conducted between 1963 and 1965 in every department and agency supervised by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

Krislov elaborates a view of "representative bureaucracy" (the extent to which administrative personnel do and should reflect the class, ethnic and group bases of society). Where Negroes are concerned, their position as one-tenth of the American population suggests something of their fair share in federal employment. Taken as a rough norm, what kinds of problems does this standard raise for the merit system?

The challenge of the civil rights movement to past practice in the federal service has two facets in relation to the merit system. Insofar as it stresses elimination of artificial barriers, the movement enforces the principles of the merit system and reduces dissonance between articulated values and actual practice for the bureaucracy. . . But insofar as the movement seeks to apply new standards to alter past patterns, it arouses fears in many defenders of the merit system. When leaders of civil rights groups speak of "compensatory employment" or "benign quotas" they evoke absolute hostility.

But as things stand, the relationship between the supply of qualified Negro applicants and the demand for added federal employees yields "an uneasy, unstable equilibrium" between the urgings of civil rights leaders and the merit system advocates. It is "uneasy" because political, economic and population changes may generate more insistant demands. It is "unstable" because it is neither legitimized nor internalized in the minds of either participating group. "Both see problems that they think could easily be solved," but their solutions differ. "So far the current situation is accepted because there is pragmatic movement in the direction desired by both; only time can tell whether that fortunate conjunction of interests will perdure."

While acknowledging the catalytic influence of the Equal Opportunities Commission and the potential of the Civil Rights Commission in exercising newly acquired watchdog functions, Krislov looks chiefly to the departmental or agency level for progress. The zeal of top administrators who are in control of their agencies makes critical differences where jobs for Negroes are concerned. This is borne out by the 15 percent Negro-of-total-employees figure attributable in 1966 to the Department of Housing and Urban Development under Secretary Weaver. The comparable figure for the Justice Department was 5.9 percent in 1966 (the Department employs nearly as many attorneys as there are Negro lawyers in the whole of the United States). Krislov describes the Department of State as "the most receptive to the incorporation of Negroes into its service." At least this is so in theory because the concept of representativeness is said to underlie the requirement of geographical distribution in the Rogers Act which governs personnel selection for the Foreign

Providing for equality of opportunity, even within the ranks of federal government employees, involves complex institutional and programmatic problems which demand detailed consideration. Professor Krislov has treated these problems with the sophistication and realism which they deserve. The book should be recommended to students and required of administrators.—RICHARD CLAUDE, University of Maryland.

The Negro in Virginia Politics, 1902-1965. By An-DREW BUNI. (Charlottesville, Virginia: The University Press of Virginia, 1967. Pp. 285. $6.00.)

This book is a detailed chronological description of the role of the Negro in the politics of the Commonwealth of Virginia in the twenteith century. The author uses the first eleven chapters of the book to describe the long era of Negro noninvolvement in the State's politics. During that era, from disfranchisement in 1902 to the end of the 1950's, Virginia's Negroes were objects and subjects of politics, but, except for isolated cases and moments, seldom were they political participants. During this era, of course, the Negroes made determined efforts to involve themselves in politics. However, the poll tax, literary tests, the White Democratic primary, Republican lily-whitism, and the stultifying effects of habitual nonparticipation were difficult to overcome.

In the last three chapters—two substantive chapters and one very brief concluding chapter—Buni describes the recent era of increasingly meaningful Negro political participation in Virginia's politics. He concentrates on the attraction of the 1960 and 1964 Presidential campaigns for Negroes in Virginia. For a change, candidates of both major parties appealed for the Negro vote. This, coupled with the greatly increased tempo of the civil rights movement nationally, and the reaction of varied factions in the State to the "massive resistance" stand of the Byrd organization on school desegregation, produced a milieu in which the Negro became a meaningful political participant.

Clearly the book deals with an era of political history of real interest to historians and political scientists. Unfortunately, the author follows methodological routes which will satisfy few social scientists. The author's willingness to use one interview as an adequate sample for generalizing about the attitudes of all Negroes in Virginia during an election, his willingness to depend on the personal reminiscences of four informants for basic interpretations and generalizations, the author's willingness to depend on newspapers' analyses of electoral data for his basic interpretations, and his unwillingness to develop any tables of data indicate an approach to political analysis which few social scientists currently accept as adequate. No effort is made to document the switches in the Negro vote from period-to-period within the era covered. Raw data from secondary sources are spewed out page after page without any effort to treat the data systematically. Even such elementary techniques as percentages and percentagepoint gain and loss are ignored. Much ado is made of the rise in the number of Negro candidates for public office during the 1940's and 1950's, but no data is presented to support this. The social backgrounds of these candidates are discussed, but the author presents no data to show that he has systematically studied this phenomenon.

In short, this is a disappointing book. The greatest disappointment is that the author seems to know enough about Negro politics in Virginia to make a real contribution, but his unwillingness to present what he knows in a systematic fashion casts doubt upon his entire effort. Also, he often fails to raise or to pursue the important questions. What part did Negro leadership play in the politics of the era? What ties existed between Negro and white political leaders? What alliances were possible? What were the nature of the Negro organizational efforts over the years? Why were Negroes in various sections of the State unable to cooperate? Why were the Negro leaders in various sections of the State unable or unwilling to cooperate? How has Negro politics in Virginia compared to that of other Southern States? Even though the author has footnotes which direct the reader to the recent books and articles of Everett Ladd, James Prothro, Donald Matthews, and Ralph Eisenberg, he does not incorporate their findings about Negro political leadership and voting patterns in other Southern States-and in Virginia in the case of Eisenberg's work—into his textual treatment, except in the most superficial manner.

The author deals not at all with the key questions which the book raises: (1) Why did the Negroes' votes become so important in Virginia's politics in the 1960's? and, (2) When is it feasible for the major aggregates in a society to seek the support of the society's marginal aggregates? In other words, when can Negroes or other minority aggregates expect to be involved as participants in Virginia's politics, and when can they expect to be excluded? The author raises this question in writing the book, but he does not answer it. If he had used data at hand to speak for that question as well as he did that from the Luther Porter Jackson papers at Virginia State College to document and describe the Negroe's disfranchisement in the 1930's and 1940's, he would have made an important contribution to our understanding of the Negro in Virginia politics.—Lewis Bowman. University of Virginia.

Race and the News Media. Ed. By Paul L. Fisher and Ralph L. Lowenstein. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. x, 158. $4.95.)

Electronic Journalism. By William A. Wood. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967. Pp. xi, 175. $5.00.)

Race and the News Media is a report of the eighth annual conference held during November 1965 at the Freedom of Information Center of the University of Missouri. Conducted after the Watts riot but before Newark and Detroit, it consists of a series of brief speeches by the participants, most of whom are active in the fields of press or television. The editors contribute a short introduction. Topics canvassed during the conference include: reporting the racial crisis in the North and South; the changing content of racial news; an evaluation of broadcasting's role; and the role of the Negro press in the civil rights struggle.

Clearly the conference, in bringing together a wide assortment of individuals active in press and television to discuss the presentation of race in the news media, served a worthwhile purpose. Since oral eloquence diminishes in print, it is less certain that the proceedings deserved to be published. And cramming over twenty contributions, which range from prescient and concerned to platitudinous and preachy, in 160 pages results in skimpy treatment of significant issues.

From a political science prespective the discussions are instructive to the extent they illuminate the dilemmas of responsibility and integrity faced by workaday editors and reporters who must decide how to present news bearing on race relations. The best articles have a blunt honesty. Martin S. Hayden, editor in chief of the Detroit News explains that his paper does not publicize in advance events calculated to disturb the public order, such as planned picket lines or economic boycotts, and it ignores them after they have begun. He bemoans the lack of Negro reporters, raising the thorny question of what beats to assign them. And he admits that only during the last five years has the Detroit News covered Negro engagements and weddings in its society columns.

Hodding Carter, III, managing editor of the Greenville (Miss.) Delta Democrat-Times, provides a sensitive and extemporaneous delineation of the personal problems facing a conscientious journalist in a small southern town. As he puts it: It is one thing to live in a community and be detached from it, as in fact one can be in a metropolitan area. It is another thing to live in a town of several thousand people and have a close relationship with the news makers themselves on a day-to-day basis.

The symposium raises many questions. What is news? What is the power possessed by the media and is it exercised responsibly? Aren't the media excessively concerned with conflict and controversy to the detriment of analysis? What changes in group actions are wrought by the knowledge that, as one participant observes: "quieter tactics starve for lack of attention?" In other words, to what extent are the media participants in the activities they are attempting to report? These questions blend with complaints: the civil rights movement is not fully and fairly reported; violence and conflict are given space to the detriment of analysis and interpretation; the white press creates Negro leaders in large northern cities: and the press sides with the police in police-Negro disputes. All these issues are raised but scarcely explored.

The results of the conference are a series of recommendations by the editors. These include: assigning the best reporters to the police beat; increasing the number of Negroes in all departments of the news media; providing additional training for reporters responsible for coverage of racial news; and, in general, the admonition to emphasize analysis and interpretation. What is missing, however, is any consideration of the implementability of these proposals. For they are directly related to the way the media are organized and the temporal, financial, and community constraints under which the press and television function.

Professor Wood, in Electronic Journalism, attempts a balanced assessment of the accomplishments, problems, and prospects of television news and public affairs programs. Instead, employing a prose style riven by stock phrases, he produces a panegyric.

The difficulty in discussing the mass media, especially television and its informational role, relates to the demands or expectations one places on it. Is it sufficient, for example, for television to depict combat and thus claim to cover the war in Vietnam, or should we demand that it examine and evaluate the strategy and policy of all protagonists in depth? Certainly such an approach would be controversial, but the problem of responsibility is not resolved by eschewing controversy. For Professor Wood such a dilemma scarcely exists.

The worst lacuna in Electronic Journalism is the author's reluctance to place the programs in context. News on television is surrounded. The dramatic half hour of news expires and is followed by the imaginary drama of a western or a World War II adventure. Within the news period the program flits from death in Vietnam to French truffle tribulations. A program on the Vietcong is interrupted by commercials for Buick. Surely this jumble of reality and invention, annihilation and salesmanship has an impact on viewers that is different from other media? Moreover, television is foremost a means of selling products; yet it is difficult to recall, while reading Professor Wood's frequent ingenuous citations of television executives' rhetoric, that he is describing what the institution's former CBS news director Fred Friendly called "the profit machine."

In both books a major impact on our social and political life is claimed for television. Television. bringing the outside world to southern Negroes and whites, penetrated the closed society and accelerated the Negro revolution. Furthermore, it showed conditions in the South to the North, thus facilitating passage of civil rights legislation. Television, in its entertainment and commercials, provides an image of affluence alien to the urban black masses and, indirectly at least, is a stimulus to discontent and therefore riots. And Professor Wood, citing a Roper poll finding that "people give television the highest rating for credibility of all the mass media" proceeds to claim for it "a peculiarly personal and graphic impact on its viewers which the printed word cannot match."

In recent years the complex interrelationships between politics and the mass media of communication received insufficient attention from political scientists. The insights of, among others, Lasswell, Lerner, and Lazarsfeld, have not been developed. It is time, I would suggest, for us to return to the medium's messages.—David L. Paletz, Duke University.

A Body Incorporate: City-County Separation in Virginia. By Chester W. Bain. (Charlottesville: The University Press of Virginia, 1967. Pp. x, 142. $4.50.)

Professor Chester Bain has written a short study of local government in Virginia which deals with that state's interesting practice of city-county separation. Much of A Body Incorporate is taken up with the historical development and legal description of this practice, in which cities of ten thousand population or more may completely separate from the county and perform within its jurisdiction all the functions normally assigned to the county (cities of five to ten thousand, or "second-class" cities may also separate save for the judicial function). Not only are cities of ten thousand population or more responsible for carrying out all municipal functions, but they are also responsible for performing all functions normally required by the state of its counties when the city separates from the county. They are financially and electorally independent.

The final and longest chapter is titled, "Separation: Boon or Cross?" and takes up the important evaluation of separation. Bain lists as major reasons for desiring independence these factors: dual taxation, threat of annexation of a town by an independent city, civic prestige, property assessment, disaffection with county officials by city folks and their ensuing desire for concentration of political power, and wishes for separate (and usually more expensive) schools. Dual taxation, school standards and the annexation threat seem to be the most important issues, and all appear to stem from basic rural-urban conflicts.

Separation as practiced in Virginia has certain advantages: reduction of functional overlap, economy, no buck-passing of responsibility between city and county officials on crucial local problems, and acceptance by the Virginia public of the practice. There are problems, though, especially relative to the low population figure at which cities can separate from counties, a level which tends to encourage too-small governments with inadequate financial resources. Another hardship is the time-honored distinction between first- and second-class cities.

Finally, Bain evaluates the practice of citycounty separation as one which has served Virginia well in the past, but one which must be immediately adjusted to operate well in the future. However effective at local self-determination these independent local units may be, "local selfgovernment is a myth without the financial resources to make it operational."

Bain has traced the historical development of separation clearly and his style is quite readable. The reader does get the impression that a few examples have perhaps been leaned on too heavily and that some key sources on current issues are not as recent as would be expected. The closing chapter, however, is an excellent weighing of the pros and cons of city-county separation, and his analysis of the Virginia experience with this approach deserves careful attention.—Wendell Bedicher, Lamar State College.

Politics in New Mexico. By Jack E. Holmes. (Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1967. Pp. 335. $10.00.)

Historically students of American state politics have been frustrated by the paucity of comparable studies on political behavior and institutions of the various states. But in recent years this problem has become less acute. This volume by Jack E. Holmes can be added to a growing list of studies which should lead to a comparative analysis of state politics. Although this book is limited to a single state, its focus and approach should be of general interest. Holmes' general approach and analysis are similar to those employed by V. O. Key, Jr. in Southern Politics and American State Politics.

The prime focus of the book is on the changing nature of the party system in New Mexico as reflected in voting behavior, the legislature and the governorship. Holmes makes judicious use of election results, legislative roll calls, interviews and historical records. In addition he enriches his material with personal experiences. Holmes was a resident of New Mexico for sixteen years and during that time he taught at the University of New Mexico, was director of the Legislative Council Service and served as the state's chief tax commissioner. Because of this varied background, Holmes brings to his work the skills and perspective of a political scientist as well as the sensitivity of a political practitioner. The result of this combination of talents is a solid piece of research which should appeal to political scientists and lay readers alike.

New Mexico provides an opulent cultural setting for a political system. It is a curious blend of "old-settler" Spanish Americans who initially cultivated the fertile Rio Grande Valley, transplanted Texans who located in the state's eastern tier of counties, the native American Indians of the northern counties, cosmopolites who migrated to Albuquerque from all over the United States and a band of scientists who have migrated to the state's research installations. When one adds to this cultural and sociological potpourri the elements of rapid population growth, urbanization and industrialization, the result is an excellent social laboratory of which Holmes makes good use.

Through the use of an historical comparison of election results Holmes demonstrates the political significance of ethnic and economic groups in the state. Some of his findings are surprising. For example, one might assume that the Spanish Americans traditionally have supported the Democratic party, but Holmes shows this not to be the case. Today the Hispanic counties vote Democratic but from statehood (1912) to the middle 1930's these counties provided the basis of the Republican party. One might also assume that liberal Democratic support and a high voter turnout would characterize the scientific communities like Los Alamos, but Holmes shows that this is not always the case.

As is true in other states of rapid growth, the political complexion of New Mexico has changed considerably in the last few decades. In statewide elections the party balance in the Hispanic counties has shifted from Republican to Democratic, but the eastern counties of "Little Texas" have moved from a once extreme Democratic attachment to a two-party balance. Like other states in the South and Southwest (especially neighboring Arizona) urban growth in New Mexico is augmenting Republican strength.

In his brief discussion of the legislature Holmes uses roll call analysis to show the declining significance of the party label among the legislators. Holmes also maintains that the legislature has become increasingly independent from the governor; however, his coverage of legislative-gubernatorial relations could have been improved with an analysis of the governor's success with his legislative programs, appointments and vetoes.

In this book one can find readable prose, careful and convincing scholarship, and a fascinating account of the politics of a colorful state.—Roy D. Morey, Denison University.

A Stripe of Tammany's Tiger. By Louis Eisenstein and Elliot Rosenberg. (New York: Robert Speller & Sons, 1966. Pp. xii, 300. $5.95.)

Keynes' Law of Ideology holds that all self-professed practical men are at bottom slaves to some defunct social theory. Until the publication of Mr. Eisenstein's book I had believed Keynes' Law to be an inviolable axiom. The author-I use the singular since the entire book is written in the first person-opens his book with the claim that "This book is about politics, not political science." He then further boasts that the reader would find no generalizations, abstractions, formulas or laws. That being the case I had planned, following Keynes' Law, to review the book by picking out a long list of generalizations the author made despite himself. But much to my astonishment he accomplished his purpose. He wrote a book completely without relevance to anyone not a present or past member or enemy of the author's own extended family. And that is a pity. The situation about which he writes was ripe for a good book.

The author, one of a dying breed of lower politics who lived off politics as well as for politics, has tried to write his autobiography as a tribute and an epitaph to machine politics in New York. He is not the hero. He is the Jewish Boswell to a Lower Eastside Irish family dynasty, the Ahearns. The Ahearns can justly be said (although the author does not say it) to have epitomized everything that made machine politics succeed and ultimately fail. The Ahearns are literally the poorman's Buddenbrooks-on-the-East-River. Patriarch of the dynasty was John F., founder of the Fourth Assembly District club that bore his name from the late 1880s until the early 1950s. As A. D. Leader he successfully spanned the transformation of the Lower Eastside from an Irish to an almost totally Jewish quarter. He was dynamic and beloved, but he was also the regular's regular who accepted from Tammany Leader Murphy the treacherous task of engineering the impeachment of Governor Sulzer. John F.'s son Eddy, at the age of 30, inherited the Leadership. The author describes as a "meteoric" career the fact that the post fell into the young man's lap. Upon Eddy's death in 1934 the Leadership in this now even more concentratedly Jewish district fell to William, the younger brother. Willie was a pitiable figure who, due to a childhood head injury, was rendered virtually moronic by adulthood. Yet he held the leadership for 16 years. Toward the end real power in the District devolved upon Bert Stand, an extraordinary opportunist who during much of the same period was also behind-thescenes co-leader of Tammany Hall itself. The author was for forty years the Captain of the Banner Election District (precinct) of the Banner Democratic District of the city and state.

The situation has all the makings of a classic, but alas the author has preferred sentimentality and petty preachment. Political scientists do lack the author's extensive experience. Almost no such machine exists any more, and there are probably no districts or wards anywhere equal to the old Fourth in special, savorable political characteristics. The author was as wasteful with all this as Mayor Wagner was wasteful, in the author's judgment, with City Hall's patronage. Shed of all sentimentalities there is little history in the book worth recording. But in better hands those few items could have been made into good historyuseful even to political scientists. The author's brief account of John F.'s removal from the Presidency of the Borough of Manhattan proves that this was not a case of corruption. But his account never turns to the positive question, that of whether party professionals were uniquely incapable of operating as amateurs in the modern administrative apparatus of city government. The author also bemoans the rise of issue- and candidate-oriented politics as that which undermined good old party loyalty in the Banner District. But his blindness to what was significant in his own experience deprives us of possibly valuable insights into (1) how it came to pass in the first place that the most advanced of all immigrant groups in the past century and a half, the Jews, so peacefully accepted half a century of Irish hegemony, and (2) how an Ahearn club that could capture the primordial loyalties of Jews could not survive against the presumably more superficial identification of the new educated masses with programs or ticket leaders. His sentimental attachment to the local particularities also prevented him from reporting sufficiently upon the most fascinating account in the entire book—how Eddy Ahearn worked out the settlement whereby Mayor Walker agreed to resign his mayoralty in time to save presidential candidate Roosevelt from what could have been a tragic decision. Local parties decentralized power in the United States to an incredible degree apparently; and with the decline of machines so there might be also an increase in national centralization. But for an appreciation of the decentralization effected by local political organization one must return to the writings of political scientists like Schattschneider and Grodzins.

The author's sentimental hearkening to the political pattern of Boss Croker is equivalent in quaintness to the neanderthal Republicans' hearkening to the economic pattern of McKinley. Mr. Eisenstein would be amazed to learn how many political scientists share his appreciation of the machine's importance in American urban history. Pity he does not on the other hand share the political scientist's "framework of possibilities" within which he might have been guided to what was really significant in his experience. Since he did not his book was doomed from the start. The book was doomed because it was not the result of forty years' experience but rather the result of one year's experience lived forty times.—Theodore J. Lowi, University of Chicago.

FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS AND COMPARATIVE POLITICS

Urban Political Systems: A Functional Analysis of Metro Toronto. By HAROLD KAPLAN. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967. Pp. 320. $8.50.)

Harold Kaplan's book, the seventh in the Metropolitan Politics Series edited by Wallace S. Sayre, is an attempt to apply the theory of "structural-functionalism" to an analysis of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. Drawing primarily upon the work of Talcott Parsons, the author, in his first chapter, reviews the major concepts involved in functionalism, particularly as they relate to the study of urban political systems. The essence of Parsons' functional approach, according to Kaplan, is ". . . the attempt to define certain basic requisites for the survival and success of social systems and to see the structure of a system as a set of mechanisms that attempt to fulfill these requisites" (p. 10). The Parsonian model, particularly its focus on normative order, is held to have severe limitations when applied to the analysis of urban political systems. Metro was found to have no normative order of its own, but rather shared the normative standards of the nation; a normative order was necessary to the Metro system's functioning, but was not the responsibility of the Metro system itself. After making several modifications of the Parsonian model, Kaplan completes his functional framework by formulating an analytical construct comparing the Metro Toronto system with two other types of systems —the business elite and the broker leadership.

The remainder of the book is concerned with a functional assessment of the Metro system. After a brief discussion of the origins and initial developments of Metro Toronto, the performance of the system and its subsystems and the social context of Metro politics are analyzed. Kaplan defines success of the system as "... the ability to perform its integrative and adaptive functions to the satisfaction of relevant actors within and without the system" (p. 246). Relevant actors are those whose behavior and attitudes have direct implications for the system. A rudimentary level of non-normative or calculative integration was found to have emerged, but normative integration, central to the Parsonian model, did not develop. Performance of the adaptive function was assessed on the basis of "objective indicators" (p. 249). Metro achieved a role differentiation or an institutionalization of the problem-solving (adaptive) activity, but Kaplan's indicators show net satisfaction scores of discontent upon the part of the adaptive-oriented actors.

Although the book is focused upon the Metro Toronto system, the author repeatedly refers to other systems in a manner that encourages comparative analysis. Particularly striking are numerous observations about Metro Toronto that are in sharp contrast to those that have been made about urban systems in the United States. For example, Kaplan analyzes group involvement in fifty-five major issues that came before the Metro Council between 1953 and 1965, and found that the political parties and the Real Estate Board did not voice an opinion on any of the issues. One would be surprised if comparable groups in American urban areas remained silent for such a long period of time. A comparison is made of the administrative politics in the "executive-directed" Metro system and the "broker-leadership" system in New York City. In New York, the pattern is one of department heads becoming the spokesmen for the institutional interests of the departments and often striving to frustrate the mayor's interest in coordinating departments. In contrast, Chairman Frederick Gardiner was successful in mediating between Metro's departments. Kaplan found it paradoxical that ". . . the New York mayor, officially the head of the administration, in fact presides over a feudal system, while the Metro chairman, lacking the formal powers of a chief administrator, in fact plays a dominant role in & united cabinet" (p. 76).

Metro's first chairman pursued a "gradualist" strategy in bringing issues before the Council. Only those issues upon which there would be a high level of consensus were initiated. The effect of this policy was greater emphasis on public works projects rather than on programs in the nonconstruction field. The Chairman believed that by pursuing noncontroversial issues first, unity would eventually develop on the Council and permit the consideration of "soft" programs. According to Kaplan, ". . . Gardiner's gradualist strategy was a failure" (p. 121). As far as the application of this strategy to the United States is concerned. it is doubtful that American urban areas can afford the luxury of a "gradualist" approach. Gardiner's legislative strategy was also governed by the norm of regional parity—that each municipality receive benefits roughly in line with its tax contribution to Metro. Although this norm may contribute to integration, it would not facilitate the resolution of many urban problems in the United States that require some degree of redistribution: of resources. And, it is this type of problem that is the most critical in many urban areas.

Kaplan found the level of group influence in Metro to be very low, and he delineates ten factors that seek to explain the "low pressure environment." The author's conclusions about group influence are quite similar to V. O. Key's "opinion dikes." Group influence was found to be more the ability to help structure Council's general attitudes than the ability to affect the course of decision-making in specific instances.

The book is well-written and exceptionally well documented. The extensive footnotes provide an excellent bibliography of both functional theory and urban politics. The emphasis is theoretical exposition, and the author comments that students more interested in Metro than in theory may be disappointed. The book's orientation requires no apology. The literature on urban politics is abundant with purely descriptive studies, but few exist that soundly combine a conceptual framework with a specific research problem. Professor Kaplan's book is a valuable contribution toward achieving this combination that is so badly needed if an understanding of urban politics is to develop.—James L. Cox, University of Delaware.

Political Leadership in Industrialized Societies: Studies in Comparative Analysis. Ed. By Lewis J. Edinger. (New York: John Wiley & Sone, 1967. Pp. vii, 376.)

"Statecraft," writes Stanley Hoffmann in this group of essays, "is of the essence of all politics"; yet its study has been the "orphan of contemporary political science." That seems both curious and ironic, for the tradition of writing on political leadership includes some of the most imaginative and perceptive works of this discipline's inheritance; yet lions and foxes, philosopher-kings, heroes and leviathans have led a rather quiet existence in the deep methodological shadows of systems analysis and the behavioral persuasion. Leadership studies have continued, of course, and have recently begun to approach the level of a flood tide. This book may be viewed as an effort to channel, or perhaps only to label, the flood; to define, that is, the subject matter of "political leadership" as a subfield of modern political science. What emerges is a very broad definition, one Machiavelli would be unlikely to recognize.

The book opens with an essay by Edinger, who seeks to give some conceptual order to the variety of concerns of students of leadership, and is followed by nine separate studies, a concluding article by Harold Lasswell, and an excellent annotated bibliography prepared by Edinger and Donald Searing. It is the great disparateness—in subject-matter, method, and quality—of the nine studies that gives the book its value as a reflection of the state of the study of leadership. As individual essays, three of the nine seem to me particularly well-wrought and worthy of special comment: those by Alfred G. Meyer, Samuel H. Barnes, and Hoffmann.

Meyer puts forward a perceptive analysis of authority in Communist systems. The draconian authority style of Stalinism, he argues, is characteristic only of the period of Communist "systembuilding," a phase of transition between the initial authority crisis of the revolution and a crisis of system maturity centering in the challenge of new elites to the party bureaucracy. The West has defined Communism by the attributes of the system-building stage; the authority relationships now emerging, Meyer suggests, will not only undermine that definition, but may put an end to the very distinctivenss of Communist rule. There lurks here, then, an implicit theory of convergence, but a subtle and persuasive one which does not require that Western and Soviet systems become identical.

It might be useful to apply to this perspective Barnes' thesis that leadership systems must be congruent with the degree of participatory competence of the led, defined as political skills plus a sense of efficacy. Any increasing pluralism in Soviet decision-making would then have to be matched by enhanced mass participation in politics—a development for which there is in fact some evidence. Barnes' general hypothesis is plausible, and his discussion of the relevant literature (e.g., the Kurt Lewin experiments with groups of children) fills it out and lends it appropriate qualification. Unfortunately the empirical portion of the essay rests on too slender a reed—a single survey question asked of Italian socialists—to provide much additional confirmation.

Whatever uniformities of leadership style the Soviet bloc and the West may be developing, the French, if we are to believe Hoffmann, remain determinedly sui generis. The dominant authority style of French society (here Hoffmann leans heavily on Michel Crozier) produces an almost cyclical alternation between routine and crisis. Since the routine in the political sphere comprises a "multiplicity of brakes and the absence of a motor," crisis is necessary to bring forth the heroic leader who, operating under a partial suspension of the rules of the road, is permitted to save the nation so that it may once again wallow gratefully in the routine. Hoffmann's argument, which examines the cases of De Gaulle, Pétain, and Mendès-France, is brilliantly put; yet one wonders examples whether non-French (Roosevelt? Churchill? Hitler?) might not reveal similarities as great as those between his diverse Frenchmen.

Additionally, there are psychoanalytic studies by Alexander Mitscherlich and Victor Wolfenstein; useful comparisons between the political cultural "resources" available to leaders in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain, by Erwin Hargrove, and between supreme court justices in four countries, by Glendon Schubert; and studies of recruitment and career patterns in relation to party structure by Joseph Schlesinger and Lester Seligman, the second somewhat less ambitious and considerably more successful than the first.

It will be noticed that there is no study here dealing primarily with Hoffmann's "statecraft"—i.e., the techniques of leading, "leadership" in its most narrow and traditional sense. Political culture, leadership styles, and the problems of congruence between them are the recurrent themes. With their importance to the understanding of statecraft there can be no quarrel. I wonder, however, whether there is not a useful distinction to be made between the study of leadership per se and that of elites and political recruitment. The Schlesinger and Seligman essays, which belong to the latter category, do not really seem at home with the other studies of this volume.—Thomas A. Baylis, Duke University.

The Communist Movement in Iran. By Sepretre Zabih. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966. Pp. xiii, 277. $6.00.)

Planning and Development in Iran. By George B. Baldwin. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. xv, 212. $6.95.)

Politics in Iran continue to confound the initiated and novitiate alike. These two works dealing with central problems of Iranian politics are no exception. Both raise fundamental issues which remain unsolved and perhaps, by the nature of the subject matter itself, insoluble. Both treat notable failures: in the former case, the failure of the Iranian Communist Party or Tudeh to seize power and in the latter, the failure of a planning effort to take hold in an essentially hostile political culture. But both conclude with an unmistakable sense of success-success for which the record of unmitigated failure have ill-prepared the reader. In the former work, the ability of Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi to defeat his internal opponents and develop rewardingly close ties to the present Soviet leadership are as unexpected as are. in the latter work, a burgeoning Iranian economy and entrepreneurial elite which befuddle economic planners.

Zabih's work is a painstakingly researched examination of materials in Persian, Russian, and Western languages whose bibliographical discoveries and thorough treatment will serve as a guide and reference source for future investigators. Woven throughout his presentation, and often unstated, are strands which highlight several central facets of Iranian politics. Of major importance is the issue of continuity: continuity in Iran's relations with the U.S.S.R., in her political leaders, and in the dilemmas of her political opposition.

Zabih illustrates the startling consistency of the Soviet Union in its willingness to sacrifice indigenous communist movements on behalf of Soviet relations with Iran and the West. The abrupt withdrawal of Soviet support for Kuchek Khan and the Gilan separatists in 1919-20; the pull-back of Soviet troops from Northern Iran and the signing of a draft agreement with Prime Minister Ghavam in 1946; the conclusion of technical, economic, and even military-arms agreements in the 1960's highlight Soviet pragmatism, flexibility, and caution—all, of course, at the expense of Iranian communists.

The author understates the present disarray of the Tudeh as a result of these developments. He mentions, but fails to attribute sufficient importance, to the little-noted event in 1964 where the U.S.S.R. returned to the Iranian Government one of its subjects. This hapless pawn of international politics had been a prison guard responsible for perpetrating a jailbreak in the 1950's whereby a significant portion of the Tudeh leadership was able to escape confinement and flee to the Soviet Union. His subsequent execution at the hands of the Iranian Government and the nearly simultaneous conclusion of the steel mill agreement between Iran and the U.S.S.R. had an impact on the Tudeh similar to that of the 1939 Soviet-Nazi pact on European and American communists and fellow travelers. Of perhaps even greater importance was the impact of these events on the noncommunist opposition. The Shah, whom they considered their domestic enemy, had apparently "won over" the Soviet Union, whom they had viewed as their only foreign friend.

A second major strand in Zabih's work is the continuity of Iranian élites—among both the opposition and the shahparastis. Individuals playing a central role in early political events persistently reappear, a decade, two, or even five decades later. Mohammed Saed, for example, was the Iranian Consul General at Baku who fled from the attack on his consulate by the precursor of the Persian Communist Party, the Adalat (Justice) group in 1918. Saed went on to serve several terms as Prime Minister and in 1968 remains active as a member of the Iranian Senate.

But if the rolls of the supporters of the regime contain persons of extraordinary political longevity, how much more replete with such political veterans are the ranks of the Communist Party. Zabih's discussions of the various Communist central committees both within Iran and in exile reveal an amazing continuity in leadership. The inability or unwillingness of the Iranian Communists to include new blood at high levels is another indication of their political failures.

A final central and dominant issue which Zabih poses as continually confronting the Tudeh is one which also unceasingly challenges all Iranian opposition groups. The issue is a policy one—the extent to which it is legitimate to cooperate with a sympathetic government or one which agrees to effect at least sections of an opposition group's political platform. When the policies of the regime coincide with those of the opposition, a commonfront policy of cooperation has frequently resulted in the subversion and cooptation of the opposition. A failure to support such policies, however, puts the opposition in the stance of opposing not only the regime but policies which they, the opposition, had so loudly urged for so long. This dilemma has perpetually plagued the Tudeh, the National Front, and, indeed, all groups who consider themselves in opposition to the regime.

Unfortunately, two substantial flaws mar this otherwise excellent work. Professor Zabih appears on unsteady footing when he ventures into the quagmire represented by the application of social science techniques to historical investigation. A perfunctory and abbreviated analysis of the "social characteristics" of Tudeh leaders; the attribution of support for the Tudeh to "alienation" where the term remains indistinct and poorly linked to particular social or economic groups over time; and a cursory examination of the "backgrounds" of the members of Dr. Erani's Marxist circle of the 1930's all indicate the author's difficulties.

Finally, the study is short on analysis, especially in key areas which beg for analysis. Why did the Communist movement fail in Iran when it seemed on so many occasions to be on the verge of seizing power? What is the significance of this failure for Iranian politics, for the Soviet Union, for the West? These and similar issues must await future treatment, hopefully from this same author who has established here such a sound foundation.

George Baldwin brings impressive credentials to his task. Author of previous works on the British coal industry and economic development in South India, he served as a member of the Harvard Advisory Group to Iran's Plan Organization from 1958-61. Immersed in the minutiae of planning for Iranian development he has nonetheless retained a capacity for achieving perspective.

Baldwin's basic argument is that given the subordination of planning to politics in Iran and the fundamentally inhospitable political climate, planning may very well not be of direct value. Rather, he proposes that the Government undertake large, economically unprofitable projects, if it must, while fostering the development of the private sector.

In a detailed analysis of Iran's impressive economic development in the late 1950's, he demonstrates that basically this pattern of events occurred. The author attributes that development to government generated demand and the availability of government credit for industrial investment. To the astonishment of the planning groups, the private sector responded vigorously, providing the dynamism behind Iran's growth.

At the root of this expansion lay oil and the massive revenues which annually accrued to the Government. Baldwin astutely notes the substitutability of oil for human resources, especially for the administrative skills which the author found so sadly absent.

It may well be that these human skills are in short supply because of the primacy of politics already noted. The author has culled numerous examples of political considerations overriding planning interests (and also we might add, the canons of proper administration) from his personal experience. The Shiraz fertilizer plant, Iran's three mammoth dams, and the land reform (which had not even been included in the Third Plan) are but three of the more blatant examples.

In addition to a wealth of little known details of Iran's politics and economy, the author provides some general considerations of planning for development which will be of relevance to those with no interest in Iran.

While invigorated by personal experience, the work suffers from an absence of more general research and documentation. Numerous errors of fact and typography impair the work. But perhaps more disappointing is the author's failure to match his planning projections, made in 1962, with data on Iranian economic performance available for 1965 or 1966. The reader might then have had a better sense for at least the theoretical value of the planning effort in Iran and the developing world in general.—Marvin Zonis, University of Chicago.

Modern Yemen, 1918-1966. By Manfred W. Wenner. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. 257. $6.95.)

After an introductory section on the land and its people, Professor Wenner has written a judicious and objective account of the government of Yemen-religiously divided between the highland and northern Zavdis and the lowland and southern Shāficīs-by the Zaydī Imams Yahya and Ahmad. The withdrawal of Ottoman authority in November 1918 was "as far as Yahya was concerned . . . merely the first step in making Yemen a nationstate" (pp. 47-48, 50); but what in this socioreligious setting was a nation-state? The two Imams successively strove to recover a historic Yemen extending eastward more than 600 miles along the southern coasts of Arabia, despite the fact that the tribes and minor rulers of these regions were not Zaydīs and had secured their independence of the Zaydī Imams as long ago as 1728.

It is in discussing the ensuing conflict between the two Imams and the British, who had established a coaling-station at Aden in 1839 and during the following century had gingerly extended a protectorate over the disorderly tribes of their hinterland, that the author's objectivity flags. Following closely, though without acknowledgment, Harold Ingrams's demonstration that the British were slow to realize the verbal ambiguities in the valid Arabic text of the Anglo-Yemeni treaty of 1934 (pp. 158-60; cf. Ingrams: The Yemen [1963], pp. 68-70), he concedes that Imam Yahya was ready to accept a temporary status quo with them only because his territorial aggression to the north was about to involve him in war with Saudi Arabia. Yet while characterizing subsequent British arguments as "quite specious," he refers without qualification to the Imam's "legitimate rights" and relegates to a footnote the admission that there was "some question" about their legality (pp. 164, 167 n. 53). The fact was that both Imam Yahya and the British were imposing their respective authority and public security on many reluctant and unruly tribes; but what for Professor Wenner was laudable in the Imam was apparently reprehensible in the British (contrast pp. 71-81 with 161-4).

The Imams' insistence on reasserting their sovereignty over non-Zaydī tribes that had rejected their predecessors' control two centuries earlier was for them as unproductive as it would be for Mexico to demand the retrocession of Texas from President Lyndon Johnson. Professor Wenner shows that Imam Ahmad's "monomania" on this theme (p. 159), neglecting the growing educated opposition to his despotic rule, opened the way for that systematic Egyptian radio incitement that led to the military coup d'etat of 1962. In this respect the title of the final section, "The Civil War," is something of a misnomer, since Egyptian paratroopers and war material began to arrive in Yemen within a week of the coup and a "Republic of the Arabian Peninsula" was proclaimed as the ultimate goal of the revolutionaries.

The author's narrative closes in mid-1966 on a note of military stalemate and "the unwillingness of the extremists on both sides . . . to come to any rational compromise" (p. 228). Since then, both the Egyptian and the British socialists have yielded to financial necessity and withdrawn their respective armed forces, leaving in Sancā and Aden two exhausted army-dominated "republics" looking for support to the Soviet Union, while the Imamate still has the support of the Zaydī tribes and a base in Saudi Arabia.

There are frequent discrepancies between the transliteration of place-names in the text and that used on the map (p. 22): thus Bayḥān, Beihan; Bayḍā', Al Beidha; al-Huḍayda, Hodeida. The port of Ghulayfiqa, of tactical significance (p. 75), is not shown on the map, which has no scale of miles and does not illustrate the Yemeni territorial claims as well as the two-page map in the preface to Ingrams: The Yemen.—George Kirk, University of Massachusetts.

Public Opinion and Constitution Making in Pakistan, 1958-1962. By Edgar A. and Kathryn R. Schuler. (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1967. Pp. 286. $6.00.)

It takes a certain spirit of adventure to write a book about public opinion in a country which had experienced a military coup, a suppression of existing political figures, the destruction of parliamentary institutions, and the imposition of martial law restraints on freedom of the press as a prelude to the process of constitution building. One is tempted to ask, what public opinion? The authors believe that Pakistan public opinion played a significant role in the political process during the four years which the book covers: the period of "constitution making." To what sources do the author's turn for support of this thesis?

The Schulers, while they were in Pakistan during much of the martial law period, were not in a position to undertake personal interviews or other forms of data collection. Their study draws largely on an exhaustive reading of three English language newspapers in the Indian subcontinent.

The Pakistan Observer, published in Dacca, East Pakistan, is used for the East Pakistan viewpoint: Dawn, a Karachi paper, provides a source for West Pakistan opinion, and the Calcutta Statesman is used for the third source because of its fairly heavy news coverage of Pakistan affairs, and because it was sometimes an avenue of expressions of opinion which could not be aired in the more restrained Pakistan press. The authors' basic approach to their information is not encumbered with any systematic data collection technique, such as content analysis. More typically they are satisfied to take a certain action or public statement by the government, i.e., Kyub Khan or one of his ministers, and record the public reactions of various groups and public figures in Pakistan society as reported in the English press. As a result of both the complexity of many of the issues, and the narrow strata of the "relevant" body of opinion on political issues, which might be reported in the press, the opinions most often reported are those of the articulate, educated elite. Students and Bengali intellectuals, Karachi lawyers, the Ulema or religious leaders in Islamic society, and the journalists and editorial writers are the sources of public opinion which form the bases for this book. Occasionally a disenfranchised politician would voice his dissent with the government, a practice which sometimes resulted in the arrest of the politician, as in the case of H. S. Suhrawardy, a leading East Pakistani politician and a former prime minister. Much of the book is organized in terms of an "action-reaction" dialogue between government and public opinion. This approach and the sources used may ignore significant but less "public" bodies of opinion in Pakistan which for a variety of reasons largely supported the government's efforts at establishing a controlled democracy. There is little discussion, for example, of business and industrial leadership opinion, or of the opinion of newly created Basic Democrats. Nor does one find recorded the attitudes of the large landholders who appear to be of some importance in district politics in parts of West Pakistan.

The authors agree with many observers of the Ayub Khan regime that it has been the mildest of dictatorships, and that it has taken positive steps to encourage at least the appearance of public debate, especially during the period of constitution making. Ayub Khan has shown a remarkable concern for the legitimacy of his governmental experiment, hoping, like Charles De Gaulle in France, that the strong presidential system which he has introduced will survive his own demise. As part of this search for legitimacy, Ayub created a Constitution Commission, to recommend the guidelines for the new constitutional order. This Commission undertook a rather novel approach to developing public opinion. It sent out a questionnaire containing forty questions to twenty-eight thousand persons. About one-third of the questionnaires were in English. To this survey there were over nine thousand replies. Given the complexity of the questions asked, one wonders about the information developed by this approach. For example, question seven reads. "If you prefer the federal form of government (a) what should be the federating units: (b) what form of government would you suggest for each of the units; (c) how would you distribute legislative power between the centre and the units: and (d) what provisions do you suggest for the administration of the federal capital?" One suspects that even in the most sophisticated circles of the oldest Western democracies, such questions could be answered adequately only by constitutional lawyers and political scientists.

The basic format of the book is a chronological development beginning with the military coup through the announcement of the final constitution. The chapters are organized by months in terms of the events or issues which dominate each time period. These chapters are quite short. Chapter IV on the Constitution Commission is six pages and Chapter V on the attitudes of the legal profession seven pages. Two somewhat more analytical chapters conclude the book, one dealing with the various provisions in the constitution and the other discussing briefly who "gained" and who "lost" in the new constitution. As to the impact of public opinion, the authors conclude that except for the establishment of provincial governments as a result of strong East Pakistani opposition to a unitary state, on all other issues, strong central government, indirect elections, and a unicameral legislature, Ayub Khan's wishes prevailed. One can only wonder if there was ever any real contest.-RICHARD N. BLUE, University of Minnesota.

The Origins of Malay Nationalism. By WILLIAM R. Roff. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968. Pp. xx, 297. $8.50.)

Here is a gracefully written, careful and insightful historical study that carries considerable import for the political science of Southeast Asia and of the post-colonial world at large. The author's intention was to, "trace the slow growth of communal, ethnic, and national feeling among the peninsular Malays in the first four decades of this century, and the expression of this feeling in voluntary associations of a predominantly modern and potentially political-nationalistic kind." In doing this he identifies three distinct social movements and their component organizations, and elaborates their interactions with British colonial policy and the relatively stable structure of Malay peasant society. One was a religious reform movement which found its ideological origins outside of the Malaysian area and its base of operations largely in the Straits Settlements of Singapore and Penang. It met violent opposition in the traditional Malay establishment, which British policy had developed and supported. Although the movement developed a form of pre-nationalism, "it never succeeded in elaborating, either organizationally or programmatically, a political nationalism capable of attracting mass support." A movement with a more obvious impact on the course of national events developed out of the indigenous administrative elite fostered by British policy. Its motivations were quite conservative: to preserve Malay privileges against the demands of non-Malays which resulted from the rapid social and economic changes taking place in the non-Malay sector of society. The third and most radical movement drew upon the locally-based intelligentsia turned out by the vernacular education system. Although it revived indigenous literature and provided personnel for later leftwing movements, its political impact was small.

This book meets well the general tests of scholarship. Since the topic deals primarily with ideas and organizations the author appropriately draws much of his evidence from Malay newspapers, magazines, and novels and from the official records of the associations studied. Interviews are extensively and appropriately used and judicious inferences about what was going on are made where no direct evidence is available. The social movement and their attendant organizations are not presented naked but couched in appropriate descriptions of the political, economic, and anthropological background. Dr. Roff is an objective historian, but not one who extinguishes his sense of values. It is obvious that he is unhappy about various British policies, especially the vocational and vernacular education policy promoted by Winstedt. Roff's joy at the irony that this regressive policy should have provided the base for the radical intelligentsia does not push him to overstate the significance of that movement. It would be interesting to speculate, as the author does not, whether the intelligentsia might have been more radical and their movement more widespread had not the British tried so successfully to keep the Malays down on the farm.

Any speculation of this sort would be out of tune with the temper of the work, and that is a cause for sadness. The Origins of Malay Nationalism deals with materials central to the concerns of political science but it is not a work of political science. It would have been too much to expect an explicit analytical framework, or a grounding in theory, new or used. However, one might have expected a more comparative form of analysis in which Malaysian developments are related to coordinate events in Indonesia, Burma, Ceylon, or, failing all else, India. This the author did not do, beyond making a few references to Indonesian experience and indicating Indonesian origins or influences on Malaysian events.

Despite Dr. Roff's disinclination to compare or speculate, his firm and fulsome job of historiography helps make the Malayan case a fertile field for analysis of the twin processes of nationalism and decolonization. Any true understanding of Britain's relatively successful application of a "go slow" colonial policy will gain much by building upon Roff's careful tracing of the not so radical roots of Malay nationalism.—James F. Guyor, University of California, Los Angeles.

The Emergence of Pakistan. By Chaudhri Mu-Hammad All. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967. Pp. ix, 418. $11.00.)

One of the lacunae in research materials during the last two decades since the partition of the subcontinent into India and Pakistan has been in the genre of memoirs and accounts by those who helped establish these two new nations. In the case of Pakistan, the need was particularly acute for nothing comparable to the autobiography of Rajendra Prasad, India's first president, or the two volumes, The Integration of the Indian States and Transfer of Power in India, by V. P. Menon, had appeared.

This condition has been partially remedied in the short span of a few months in 1966 and 1967 by publication of books by three architects of Pakistan. The first to appear was From Memory, by Firoz Khan Noon, the last prime minister before the declaration of martial law in 1958. Published in Lahore by Ferozsons, it has had limited circulation in Pakistan and is virtually unknown elsewhere. In contrast, a second work, Friends Not Masters: A Political Autobiography, by President Mohammad Ayub Khan, published by Oxford University Press, was widely distributed in Pakistan and is relatively well known in other countries as well.

The third volume, presently under review, is a thoughtful, temperate account of Pakistan's establishment by one of that nation's most distinguished civil servants. A professional administrator, Chaudhri Muhammad Ali played a key role in organizing the government of Pakistan as its first and only secretary-general. Later he became finance minister and prime minister and in 1965 was one of the leading figures in the Combined Opposition Party (COP) which contested for the presidency against President Ayub.

A little less than half the book is devoted to problems after the establishment of Pakistan. The first half deals with the familiar prelude to partition: the Lahore Resolution, cabinet mission plan, partition itself, and integration of the states. The analysis is remarkably lucid and judicious, excelling that found in V. P. Menon's two volumes alluded to earlier. A full chapter is devoted to the Radcliffe Award which determined the boundaries between India and Pakistan in Bengal and the Punjab. The aspect of the Radcliffe boundary settlement of the Punjab which continues to rankle Pakistanis is the division of Gurdaspur tehsil in a manner giving India its only means of land access to Kashmir. Chaudhri Muhammad Ali sheds some new light on this controversy. If what he reports is correct, there is now some reason to believe that the division of Gurdaspur was not the sole responsibility of Cyril Radcliffe, the commission's chairman, but rather was made with knowledge of and prior consultation with Lord Ismay, the vicerov's military advisor, and perhaps even with the vicercy, Lord Mountbatten, himself. The heart of the evidence is found on pages 218-219 of the book. The author visited Lord Ismay in Delhi to convey the Quaid-i-Azam's fears concerning Gurdaspur. Being told that Ismay was closeted with Radcliffe, he waited to see him. Ismay professed ignorance of the Gurdaspur boundary issue, but when the author went to a wall map and pointed out a pencilled boundary line drawn across the Punjab, "Ismay turned pale and asked in confusion who had been fooling with his map" (p. 219). This, of course, is circumstantial evidence to which we cannot assign final historical credibility. But it is a personal account which may help to illuminate further this important decision.

The principal disappointment in this well written and otherwise well conceived book is the fact that only thirty-one of its 387 pages are devoted to the activities in which the author played a paramount creative role, namely, in constructing the administrative system of the new government of Pakistan. This reviewer had long awaited this book hoping that it would deal extensively and authoritatively with this aspect of Pakistan's development. Since the death of the Quaid-i-Azam. his successor, Liaqat Ali Kahn, such administrative figures as S. Ikramullah and virtually all the key politicians of the 1947-50 period, Muhammad Ali is clearly the only Pakistani in a position to have dealt with those problems. Our disappointment is mitigated somewhat by the deft and excellent manner with which Muhammad Ali treats the few problems he has selected in these thirtyone pages. We learn, for example, that the appointment of the controversial first pay commission in 1947 headed by Justice Muhammad Munir "was a mistake" (p. 361). There is a strong suggestion that the origin of the commission's statement that the "correct place for our men of genius is in private enterprise and not in the humdrum career of public service" can be traced to Ghulam Mohammad, the finance minister rather than to Munir.

The book ends with promulgation of the first constitution in 1956. We can hope for a second volume by Muhammad Ali covering the forty-four months of martial law and the period of the second constitution (1960 to the present) during which the administrator became a politician opposing the government in power. Whether or not this hope for a second volume will be fulfilled, we can say of the book now under review that it is a forthright, balanced, moderate account, reflecting the constructive disposition of its author. It ranks clearly with the best of the books on India and Pakistan by those who helped create those states.—Ralph Braibanti, Duke University.

Minority Politics in the Punjab. By Baldev Raj Nayar. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966. Pp. ix, 360. $9.00.)

"Minority" in this study is interpreted by the author to include only the Sikh Akali Dal and its campaign to obtain Punjabi Suba, that is, partition of the Indian province of the Punjab into Punjabi-speaking and Hindi-speaking sections. Although Nayar had the misfortune to publish his dissertation just before the Sikh party's aim was unexpectedly achieved in the wake of the Indo-Pakistan War, his failure to predict the outcome does not detract materially from his excellent work.

The overall organization of the book is behavioral. The author arranges his data into: the social context of the demand for Punjabi Suba, the motivations behind it, the recruitment patterns of the opposing party elites, the resources at their disposal, and their conflicting strategies. However, this framework tends to get lost in the detailed historical exposition within each chapter. Only in the Summary do the more general propositions emerge upon which comparison with other provinces and other minorities in India and elsewhere in the developing world might be based. As it is, these relate more to the general problem of "system maintenance" in a situation of linguistic and religious diversity than to the problems of minorities as such.

Nayar's first finding is that the demand for a separate Punjabi linguistic province has really been a camouflage for creating a Sikh theocratic state. The latter goal he attributes to the fears of orthodox Sikhs that modernization will lead their people to be re-absorbed into Hinduism unless the machinery of the state can be controlled in order to enforce conformity to the external symbols of Sikhism. In other words, it is an example of "boundary maintenance" between two socially close and philosophically similar faiths. Nayar dismisses the Akali Dal's charges of Hindu discrimination against the minority. On the contrary, so successful have Sikh politicians been in prying concessions out of the Congress government, that it is more likely the majority community which has suffered disadvantages.

The generalizations most susceptible to formulation into comparative propositions are those about leadership recruitment and strategies. Regarding the former, the author discovers a striking similarity in social background and education of Akali and Congress Sikh legislators. From this, he is driven to the conclusion that "the commonplace assumption is not valid that those who make 'parochial,' 'primordial,' or 'particularistic' appeals are in any way less advanced than those who make 'secular,' 'rational' and 'nationalistic' appeals." Part of the explanation lies in infiltration of the ruling party, one of the three Akali strategies he explicates. (The others are constitutional and agitational.) Navar observed a high turnover rate in all but the top leadership of the Akali Dal, Periodically a merger would be negotiated with the Congress and a layer of ambitious young Akalis would be absorbed into its ranks, there to form a cell for promoting Sikh interests from within. The Congress on its side felt obliged to raise ex-Akali Sikhs like the late Chief Minister, Partap Singh Kairon, to power in order to combat its opponent's charges of discrimination. One wonders why this bargaining technique hasn't worked as well for other Indian minorities like the Muslims. The combination of legal and illegal tactics is reminiscent of the Communist Party, and indeed Nayar makes a qualified comparison explicit.

How then was the Akali Dal unable for so long to achieve its major goal? In his analysis of the Sikh community, Nayar demonstrates that despite its emphasis on equality, fissures between Harijan and non-Harijan, Jat and non-Jat persist and vitiate communal political solidarity. Because caste cuts across religious, linguistic and cultural lines, he concludes that it functions to fragment separatism and promote national unity. The Akali Dal, he demonstrates, never enjoyed majority support even among Sikhs. Thus, contrary to the assumption that all social cleavages are inherently detrimental to national integration, Nayar urges the acceptance by Indian national leaders of the inevitability and potential utility of group conflict.

The author's further extrapolation that "given a democratic framework, only a political party or coalition which is secular and broad-based can remain in power in the government of the state" has been belied by the post-election events of 1967. His own secularism and political preference ("continued control of the government by the Congress party is of crucial importance to the maintenance of the political system") apparently blinded him to a fourth Alkali strategy: coalition with its antithesis, the Jan Sangh.

Lastly, although the level of theoretical abstraction obtainable from this kind of configurative study-in-depth is not very high, it seems preferable that comparative theory should be built up from the solid empirical base of "area" knowledge it offers than down from the premature category-mongering recently fashionable.

As a postscript, it is regrettable that Nayar mars his otherwise admirable objectivity by characterizing the Sikh grievances as "alleged" and the Punjabi-speaking area as "so-called."—Theodore P. Wright, Jr., State University of New York at Albany.

Panditji: A Portrait of Jawaharlal Nehru. By MARIE SETON. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Company, 1967. Pp. 515. $13.95.)

The author of this highly personal biography of Jawaharlal Nehru is a British journalist who visited India in 1955, and who being introduced to Nehru, became a frequent house guest in the following years. As would be expected, the author is adulatory in her praise of Nehru and his distinguished daughter. The contribution of the book consists principally in the insights which its rambling chapters give of Nehru's great urbanity, gentleness, humanism, his catholic interests, and his desire to promote all sorts of good works. His interest in the poor is indicated by his practice of setting aside a half hour every morning to see all persons, however lowly, who came to see him, listening patiently and kindly to their stories, and rendering whatever aid he could. No appointment was required, and no screening was conducted of those who called to see him. It is little short of astonishing that the head of a great and populous state today could follow this practice.

The last two thirds of the book, by far the most important part, consists largely of an account of the author's visits and conversations with the Nehru's and other important Indian personalities, written usually in the first person. No household item is too small to be related. In this fashion the author describes the major public events and crises which Nehru and the country faced during the ten years after she became a guest of the Nehru household. Interspersed are frequent accounts of the author's other activities, including trips abroad, quite unrelated to the subject of the book. Facts, opinions, hearsay, and sometimes gossip are woven together to throw sidelights on major problems and issues and to portray the attitudes and concerns of Nehru.

The first five chapters, which review the life of Nehru prior to 1955, are drawn largely from his own writing and are sketchy. They do not reveal the forces, personalities, ideas and ideals, struggles, and disappointments which greatly influenced his character and ability to win the devotion of the masses of Indian population, second only to Mahatma Gandhi, whose heir he became. The book largely fails to explain the basis of Nehru's greatness as a leader, his philosophy, ideals and values. One cannot understand Nehru as a person and as the leader of his country without an awareness of the great influence exerted over his character and career by his distinguished father, Molital Nehru, and Gandhi. Equally important are the factors and events which brought Nehru into the leadership of the fight for independence. The nine prison terms which he served from 1922 to 1945 had a profound effect upon him and his future leadership of the movement for independence. Son of an aristocratic Brahmin of great wealth and distinction, his first contacts with the poor in the large cities and the rural peasants occurred after his return from England where he received his education at Harrow and Cambridge. A student of Fabian Socialism, the dire poverty of the Indian masses led him to become an advocate of government enterprise as a means of elevating the standard of the poor at a time when the leadership of the Congress Party was largely conservative.

One would look in vain in this book for a discussion and assessment of Nehru's leadership of his party and his country, for the basic tenets which guided his life, including his belief in democracy, parliamentarism and free elections; his devotion to Indian nationalism; his support of secularism instead of religion as the basis of the state; and his egalitarianism, indicated by his opposition to the caste system. The book adds to the growing number of biographies of this great statesman, but little to the understanding of his leadership.—Joseph P. Harris, University of California, Berkeley.

The Political Economy of South Africa. BY RALPH HORWITZ. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 427. $10.00.)

This is a valuable scholarly contribution to our knowledge of South African economic and political history. Mr. Horwitz has written a thorough, indeed, exhaustive volume detailing South Africa's economic development and to a lesser degree its political evolution. And to the extent that anyone can write interestingly and factually about such essentially undramatic topics as "Economic Geography and Uneconomic Transportation," and "The Political Economy of Food," Horwitz has succeeded. The book reads well and the substantial amount of factual detail he incorporates into his study is accomplished with professional competence. He has combined an obvious scholarly competence with his extended involvement in the South African academic and economic environment. This involvement included an appointment as Senior Lecturer in Economics and Business Administration at the University of Capetown and a fifteen-year tenure as general manager and editor of groups of business periodicals in the country.

Despite its very real descriptive value the book is marred to a degree by an inadequate interpretative framework. Horwitz accepts implicitly two assumptions which cause him some problems. The first is a causal relationship, the second in the nature of a value commitment. Although it is presented somewhat amorphously Horwitz holds that in the relationship between the political system and the economic, the political is the causal agent. Aside from this point to which we shall return Horwitz values the free market as opposed to the managed market as the political-economic strategy guaranteeing maximum levels of economic development, and he scores apartheid repeatedly for its meddling with the economic lesson making environment.

Simply put it is suggested that South Africa's economic development has been managed and managed negatively by a political leadership committed to controlling economic development in order to render that development functional to the maintenance of a society ordered according to the dictates of apartheid. The concomitant economic growth in industrialization, urbanization, technological advance and secularism was seen by the Afrikaner leaders as being inimical to the preservation of their way of life. Thus, these byproducts had to be controlled so as not to destroy the fabric of the social life desired by the Afrikaner. We do not quarrel with his commitment to free enterprise nor his opposition to a bureaucratically directed and controlled development process. Nor can we seriously question his statement that, "the determination of wages, working conditions, range of jobs and field of employment by custom rather than by competition became from early on the characteristic feature of the labour market." But when this "custom" (read apartheid) filtered through the political structure is hypothesized as bringing about a reduction in the country's level of economic development a demurrer has to be entered. There just doesn't seem to be adequate empirical evidence available in the development literature to support this kind of interpretive model. That is to say that in assessing the relationship between the political system and the economic we are as yet not able to justify utilization of the political as independent and the economic as dependent and his decision to portray the political system as independent in this case would appear to be arbitrary.

This, of course, renders a commitment to free enterprise as the optimal development strategy somewhat academic until the precise relationship between the economy and the political system is empirically defined. That is, the related argument as to which kind of relationship is most conducive to rapid economic growth is quite a sterile one. Competition uncontrolled by government may indeed be most advantageous for economic growth. or it may not be. At present, however, this must be considered an empirical question. To believe in the efficacy of an unmanaged economy as opposed to a managed economy is to believe in the supported proposition that levels of economic development are dependently related to the political system. Such a belief would appear to be unwarranted at this time.

In summary the real and overriding contribution of the book is its well-documented description and it stands on that and should be welcomed by concerned scholars. The theoretical approach is not, however, without some problems and deserves question.—David Gugin, University of Georgia.

Tanzania: Party Transformation and Economic Development. By Henry Bienen. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. 446. $11.50.)

Those of us who deal with African affairs know that it is extremely difficult to arrive at an accurate assessment of how African political systems function. It is even more difficult to correlate this data for meaningful comparative analysis. In recent years, analysts have devised numerous metempirical typologies in an effort to organize information about African politics and make it relevant to the comparative study of developing areas. However, the utility of these typologies has not been tested because of the scarcity of empirical data on "entire" African political systems.

Bienen's empirical case study indicates that the models constructed for the study of African politics by Coleman, Rosberg, Tucker, Apter and other analysts are inadequate to explain the political process in Tanzania. These models are based on the study of formal roles and statuses which provide only a superficial understanding of the élites' normative expectations of the system. The models do not specify (1) the ways in which the central institutional processes function, (2) the nature of relationships within the party, or (3) how the party relates to society as a whole.

The focus of the model builders has been on political structures, and especially on political parties. Kilson, Carter, Hodgkins, and Schachter have all asserted the primacy of the party in the allocations of values within the society of underdeveloped countries. Bienen's data provides little evidence to support these views. In fact, his data indicates that the structures of both the party and the state are not even operative everywhere in Tanzanian society. Local communities exist in which there is no effective party presence. Authoritative values are allocated without regard for the dictates of either the party or the state. While this does not completely negate the value of the various models, it certainly creates serious doubts as to their general utility.

A major concern in the comparative study of underdeveloped areas is the relationship between economic and political development. The two have been tied together in various formulas proposed by Pye. Buchanan and Ellis have established that performance in the political sphere is a precondition for economic development. Coleman has outlined this relationship so that correlations between political types and economic indices appear.

Bienen studies this relationship in Tanzania by focusing on the interaction between economic factors and the TANU's operations. He determines (1) what the party is doing to change the economy of Tanzania, and (2) what changes are taking place within the party as it organizes to achieve economic development. In so doing, he seriously questions the validity of the many formulas previously devised in an effort to explain the relationship between economic and political devlopment.

Bienen concludes that the TANU does not provide an institution which can transform the economy and make itself more effective in the process. The party is too weak, too loosely organized, and has too few human and material resources to solve developmental problems. Thus, it is questionable whether countries similar to Tanzania can have highly organized monolithic single-party systems capable of transforming the economy.

Another major area of concern in the comparative study of developing areas is the question of national integration. Most analysts (Almond, Coleman, Lipset, Organski, Deutsch, Pye) assume a linkage between political-economic development and national integration. National integration is considered as a positive corollary to political-economic development.

Bienen approaches this question in Tanzania through an analysis of intra-party relationships: recruitment to party posts; vertical-horizontal communications among the party hierarchies; and the dissemination of ideology as legitimizing doctrines and guides to action. This framework enables him to translate the problems of national integration into questions about the political functioning of élites. (This study, however, is not a systematic study of élites.)

The author concludes that the party itself suffers from integrative problems. The party is without a powerful center. It is essentially decentralized and fragmented. Thus, the instrument designed to bring about national integration and economic development reflects the very same lack of integration found throughout society.

The conditions needed to centralize the TANU and enable it to control from the center do not exist in Tanzania. The lack of economic development has prevented the formation of economic interest groups potentially hostile to the regime. There have been no urban or demographic changes which have altered existing social patterns and increased social cleavage. Thus, conditions of Tanzania do not facilitate the building of a centralized, desciplined party, they have impeded the formation of social classes or emergent political élites who might threaten the present regime.

This case study presents an ideal opportunity for testing the typologies and models currently being used to study African political systems. While it creates doubts about their utility, it provides additional data that may be useful in modifying them. Towards this end, the author has provided an analytical framework which focuses on the political party and its interaction with the economy. The analysis of the evolution of specific political structures as this evolution relates to economic change is a unique and significant contribution towards the comparative study of the problems of developing areas.—Paul Saenz, University of Arizona.

Planning Without Facts: Lessons in Resource Allocation from Nigeria's Development. By Wolfgang F. Stolper. (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1966. Pp. 348. $7.95.)

Stolper draws on his experience in Nigeria—he was an architect of that country's 1962-68 development plan—for an analysis of the problem of resource allocation in developing nations. He observes a hiatus between development theory and practice: the practitioner, often lacking basic economic data, tends to be skeptical of the theorist's assumptions that starting points can be fixed and the future known. Planning Without Facts attempts to bridge the gap. Stolper's prescriptions are summarized below:

- 1. Given the paucity of data, development must be a process of "optimizing as one goes along" (p. 4); i.e., the long-run is conceived as a series of short-runs involving decisions based only on what is reasonably known of the future. Decentralized decision-making—control responsibility for planning and coordination, decentralized responsibility for execution—will facilitate continuous examination of planning decisions.
- 2. Aggregative and disaggregated data must be joined for purposes of development planning.

Models based on aggregative data will provide checks on the consistency of planning decisions.

- 3. An investment (or commitment of resources) is profitable when it yields an increase in available resources and in the productive capacity of the economy. According to Stolper, "the only valid investment criterion is economic profitability.... Other investment criteria are either invalid, non-operational, or implicit in economic profitability" (p. 5).
- 4. Development planning must not impose a high degree of austerity. In order to avoid demoralization, distortions in the allocative process, and political instability, it is necessary to have a rise in the standard of living, albeit at a rate slower than that anticipated for economic growth.

I shall direct my comments to the third prescription for the following reasons: (a) The economic profitability criterion is central to the analysis in Planning Without Facts; (b) That criterion is controversial, as we shall see, even among students of economic development; (c) The argument for the elevation of that criterion to a preeminent position exposes the "underdeveloped" character of our own discipline; and (d) Stolper overlooks important implications for the Nigerian political system of resource commitment based solely on considerations of economic profitability.

Some economists challenge the notion that development planners ought to rely solely on economic criteria. Ralph Turvey, for example, argues "that where [decisions to commit resources yield side effects on the environment, reliance on economic considerations] alone may not produce the best allocation of resources" (in Henry Jarrett ed., Environmental Quality in a Growing Economy: Essays from the Sixth Resources for the Future Forum, 1966, p. 49). In such cases, "who should do what how much is often a question which cannot be decided on a purely technical basis by an economic calculation. Political considerations—judgments of what is equitable—are also required" (p. 52). This group views the economic calculation as a necessary but often not a sufficient condition for decision-making.

While he recognizes that equity considerations will affect decision-making, Stolper comes down hard on the side of profitability when economics and equity are in conflict: "first things first; redistribution requires something to be redistributed. Equity considerations become self-defeating if they prevent growth altogether" (p. 164). He also observes that it is "by no means self-evident that economic profitability is inconsistent with . . . other social and political considerations when the facts of the case are considered" (p. 165).

I shall not dwell on the matter of equity in development planning; it is sufficient to note that there are those in the developing nations who would regard the subordination of equity to economic growth with trepidation. Instead I shall turn to the question of the relationship, generally and in the case of Nigeria specifically, between economic profitability and other social and political considerations.

Stolper's observation that economic, social, and political considerations need not be inconsistent eventually leads him to conclude as follows: "Bad economics create unnecessary political difficulties, and good, or at least better, economics can substantially help in the process of nation building and political development. . . . Good economic policy and careful planning are essential to political stability . . ." (pp. 316, 320). This is a rather curious conclusion, given Stolper's predilection for development planning based on operational criteria. It is an embarrassing fact that political scientists have not operationalized such concepts as political development and political stability. They have not met a necessary condition for testing the hypotheses implicit in Stolper's conclusion: the specification of operational definitions in terms of concrete and explicit procedures. Until those definitions are stipulated, it will not be possible to establish the precise relationship between economic policy-defined in terms of profitability or any other criterion-and political development and stability. For the moment, then, Stolper's conclusion appears to have passed but one "test," that of plausibility. Or has it?

Regrettably, Stolper's discussion of the two most important sociopolitical factors in Nigeria—regionalism and tribalism—is cursory. Chapter II surveys the socioeconomic character of the four Regions, their constitutional link with the central government in Lagos, and the Federation's planning framework. The question of the relationship between regionalism/tribalism and economic profitability is considered only briefly: "Geographic dispersal of new investments so as to benefit different parts of the country is a worthy aim" (pp. 164-165) insofar as it does not conflict with profitability.

That prescription hardly seems appropriate for the fragile political arrangement that is (was?) Nigeria. Could one reasonably expect that country, with its kaleidoscopic array of politically contentious peoples and Regions, to commit resources solely on the basis of the profitability criterion? Might the strict application of that criterion have favored—or be perceived as having favored—one Region or tribal grouping? If so, would it then be implausible to conclude that good economic policy—defined in terms of profitability—might contribute to the disintegration of Nigeria as a political entity? I think not.

In conclusion, this very stimulating, problematic book directs attention to the complex ramifications of the total development process. In doing this, it reveals the need for various disciplines to comprehend and participate in the management of that process.—ALVIN MAGID, State University of New York at Albany.

Planning and the Market in the USS.R.: the 1960's. By ALEXANDER BALINSKY, ABRAM BERGSON, JOHN N. HAZARD, AND PETER WILES. (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1967. Pp. vi, 132. $4.00.)

On balance, this book attains its goal of illuminating for a "wider audience than . . . the Soviet specialist or professional economist" the complexities of the reforms of Soviet industrial management currently underway. The goal is reached, however, with no help and much hindrance from the theme of the original symposium: "Is the Soviet Economy Moving toward Capitalism?" Most of the clichés associated with that theme-for example, whether we should be "optimistic" about the market content of the reforms-are found in an overlong, confusing and not entirely relevant introduction by the symposium moderator, Alexander Balinsky. That this theme was chosen for a symposium in 1966 is a sobering reminder of how far Soviet studies are from being true social science rather than an arm of American Cold War propaganda.

Fortunately, Abram Bergson (who has done more than anyone else to make social science of the study of the Soviet economy) and John Hazard respectively contribute good papers on the economic and political aspects of the reforms. The third symposiast, Peter Wiles, enlivens the book generally and contributes a specific point here and there, even though saddled with the shopworn topic of the "convergence" hypothesis.

Professor Bergson's paper has three parts: the management reforms themselves, their origins, and their likely implications. He shrewdly avoids "profits," that reddest of herrings on this topic, stressing instead the greater enterprise initiative, the emphasis on sales rather than the mere volume of output, and the attendant financial and pricing arrangements. His conclusion is worth quoting (pp. 50-51):

In sum, the Soviet government is scarcely dismantling wholesale its system of centralized industrial planning, as sometimes has been suggested in the West, but it is adapting this system measurably in the direction of decentralization and increased use of market-type controls.

Further than this, Bergson is appropriately noncommittal, leaving us with a question answerable only with time: To what extent will planning and market elements mix? More precisely, what proportion of each will prove viable under contemporary Soviet conditions, non-economic as well as economic?

Professor Hazard addresses himself to the noneconomic conditions. Wisely spurning the tempting but treacherous subject of the role of "personal ambition," he examines instead three areas of key importance to the success of the reforms: Party-State relations: Union Republic-central government relations; and the emergence of enterprise directors as a potentially influential interest group. He finds the reforms at least in part a response to Brezhnev's desire to "re-Leninize" the Party into an elite, inspirational organ of leadership instead of the broad-based administrative organ shaped by Khrushchev. He also detects 1 new emphasis on Union Republics, rather than the All-Union government, in the ministerial structure which has replaced Khrushchev's territorial system of 1957-65; but he attributes the shift of emphasis more to economic logic than to any renascent nationalism among non-Russian mincrities. Brezhnev and Kosvgin are reversing vet a third Khrushchevian trend, Hazard believes, in enhancing the political power of enterprise directors, by reducing direct Party interference ("petty tutelage") in industry and increasing the directors' laitude in decision-making. But this political power should not be exaggerated, he cautions, for the drectors will still be unorganized, and the trade unions are likely to assume more power in maragement decisions.

Professor Wiles makes the best of a bad job in assessing the possibilities of convergence. His most salient point concerns the erosion by social science of ideology, in which convergence is occurring, he thinks, if only slowly. Good Marxist that he is, Wiles sees the dialectical process in the midst of which Soviet leaders presently find themselves: forced to resort to modern social science for aid in governing Soviet society, yet impelled to recast the Party in a Leninist mold which provides its own all-embracing social science and tolerates ro alternative sources of truth. (Wiles would very likely disagree with Hazard over the probable symthesis, if any, that will emerge from this dialectic.) One wonders if the closest Soviet-American coavergence at the moment is not a common, or at least a similar, set of dialectical contradictions facing their top leaders.—ARTHUR W. WRIGHT, Yale University and Oberlin College.

Planning Reforms in the Soviet Union, 1962-1963. By Eugene Zaleski. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1967. Pp. viii, 2C3. $6.00.)

Professor Zaleski's book is a patient and perspicacious description of Soviet efforts in recent years to develop a more effective form of economic organization. The explanations offered for the problems and motives of economic reform are more or less standard, but it is extremely useful to have available this comprehensive and coherent survey. Because of its extensive documentation, the book is very useful as a reference work to which one can turn for the details of institutional changes, the chronology of controversies, and the positions of protagonists of different points of view. The various experiments and the changes in legislation area analyzed concretely; and unlike some other treatments, this one covers the less well-known experiments in construction, lumbering, mining, trade, etc., as well as the more famous experiment with the Bol'shevichka and Maiak apparel factories. Zaleski's discussion of the various controversies is especially helpful for its careful analysis of the positions taken by various people and of the arguments for and against a given pro-

A few elements in Zaleski's treatment seem distinctive and it is interesting to look for the special viewpoint which a man with his uniquely extensive knowledge of the whole history of Soviet organizational evolution brings to consideration of the problem of organization and administration in the Soviet economy. One such element is his patient consideration of the details of official explanations and rationalizations for any administrative change. It is easy to feel cynical about the official line, but Zaleski's treatment shows how useful this tedious work is. A second distinctive feature of the book is a detailed exploration of the roles of the republican Councils of Ministers and the republican Gosplans. We tend to think about planning in terms of the central planning apparatus only, but this book shows the important role of the lower level planning organs in the process. Third, Zaleski devotes much attention to the idea of continuous planning as one of the widely discussed reforms, though this emphasis is less easy to agree with. Since the Russians have not in fact done serious long-range planning, there seems little point in taking very seriously all the arguments about whether long-range planning should be done continuously or intermittently. Finally, Zaleski always considers the question of the rank of an official heading an agency-say, whether certain officials within Gosplan are given the assimilated rank of minister. This is one example of his general sensitivity to political issues in economic reorganization which is one of the strong features of the book.

One consequence of Zaleski's emphasis on political, institutional and pragmatic considerations is that there is some neglect of the theoretical-analytical revolution which has been taking place concurrently with the evolution of institutions. There is very little discussion in the book of the theory of optimal planning and its implications for such practical matters of economic reform as pricing. In the end this revolution in theory is bound to play an important role in economic reform even though its influence so far has not been great. For example, it is only on this theoretical-analytical level that the most momentous issue of all—the rate of investment—is being discussed. Although, as Zaleski notes, this issue has not yet been raised at the policy level, the theoreticians are discussing it under the Aesopean title of "the criterion of optimality in dynamic planning."

Overall, Professor Zaleski interprets the reform as a kind of stalling effort to postpone radical change in the institutions of Soviet-style planning. Certainly, as he shows, the leaders have been cautious in moving toward reform; but there is always some foot-dragging on social change and this may be a good thing. The Soviet leaders and even the proponents of reform do not know for sure where they are going. None of the various strands of reform thought which Zaleski describes has a coherent theory of how everything will hang together when reform is finished. This is even true of the optimal planners, the group which comes closest to such a vision. But I believe it is wrong to interpret this caution as a maneuver from which the leadership can retreat if they wish to. They have gone far enough already that retreat is no longer a feasible option.—ROBERT CAMPBELL, Indiana University.

Soviet Institutions, The Individual and Society. By Karel Hulicka and Irene M. Hulicka. (Boston: Christopher Publishing House, 1967. Pp. xviii, 680. $12.00.)

This lengthy and detailed book claims to be "an all-encompassing text and reference book" on all aspects of the Soviet political system. It claims also the benefit of an "interdisciplinary analysis" and the uniqueness of heavy, indeed preponderant, reliance on official Soviet sources. These claims are severely undermined by a fourfold failure: the book fails to provide functional equivalents for Soviet terminology and doctrine; it fails to account for political change; it fails to identify "the political" in any arena other than that which is explicitly political by Western standards; and it fails to avoid misleading oversimplification.

Each of the twelve chapters examines a familiar sector of the Soviet system (Communist Party, Youth Organization, Federalism, Agriculture, Economy, etc.), and in each the reader finds a lengthy presentation of the official Soviet position followed by the authors' analysis. In neither part have the authors succeeded in translating Soviet terminology into Western functional terms or sometimes, into adequate English. Thus, we find such literal Sovietese as: "brain worker and manual worker," "objective and ideological measures," "progressive advance," "highly divorced from reality," and "progress toward materialization of . . .

tenets." These are only a few examples of a practice so pervasive in the book, that the student of Soviet politics, the non-expert to whom this book is addressed, would be baffled by the incomprehensible language and prevented from applying to the study of Soviet politics any of the multiform techniques of comparative politics. In fact, the authors stress the uniqueness of the Soviet political system, and processes which are found in most political systems are often characterized by them as uniquely Soviet: for example, we learn that the position of the First Secretary of the CPSU is attained "on the basis of a naked struggle for power," and that "lower level party officials are used as convenient scapegoats to account for failures which would, without scapegoats, be embarrassing for the infallible leaders." Such observations tend to raise needless barriers between the study of Soviet politics and an understanding of comparative political systems.

A much more damaging defect stems from the inability of the authors to account for change. With their highly oversimplified notion of a static, perhaps monolithic, unity, they seem to regard change as aberrant. In their chapter on the CPSU, the authors state: "The CPSU is a rigidly hierarchical organization, in which all subordinates are unconditionally obligated to carry out the policy directives and decisions which are the exclusive prerogative of the central command," and that the Communist Party "has preempted all power for itself.... The authority of the party over the lives of all Soviet citizens is virtually complete." Most of the recent studies in Soviet politics have attempted precisely to shatter this unreal image of the monolith party set off against society. The party itself is an ever-changing body, with aging leaders ensconced at the top and about three million people, or one-fourth of the entire membership with only three or fewer years' standing in the party. A generational problem of unknown magnitude obviously faces the party leaders; how to socialize new life into the old structure remains a thorny question. Further, there are social and economic differences within the party, and these present the possibility of division and dissatisfaction. According to the Hulickas, the rank-and-file carry out party directives. But as of October 1967, about half of the membership had not finished high school. How can the rank-and-file understand and articulate the complexities of national and international policies in a world of advanced technology? More importantly, how can they possibly identify themselves with this highly specialized future of economic development? The existence of a broad and highly differentiated network of party schools underlines the seriousness with which the central leadership regards the issue of party cohesion. As a Soviet official remarked, the party schools, with their emphasis on participation, tend to eliminate the "wild ideas" of party members.

The authors similarly fail to provide a framework of analysis for the major changes that have occurred at the top levels of the party. About the profoundly important origins and effects of de-Stalinization, the authors write: "although there has been some speculation that Khrushchev consciously decided to use the de-Stalinization issue as a convenient weapon through which he could divide and weaken opposition to his bid for supreme leadership of the party, it is more likely that he merely made after-the-fact use of a situation which had developed on a somewhat unplanned basis" (italics mine). In another use of the passive voice to avoid analysis, the authors write about Khrushchev's fall: "On October 13, Khrushchev, as the supreme leader of the CPSU and virtual dictator of the Soviet Union, probably wielded more personal power than any other individual being during the current era. By October 15, Khrushchev was stripped of his power, retired, cast aside, denied the role of the respected elder statesman . . ." Failure to investigate the processes of change leads surely to misunderstanding of the current reality.

One of the most potent sources of change in the Soviet Union, as in most states, is modernization, and the linking of modernization with Sovietization has been a major strength of the Soviet political doctrine, both internally and externally. The Hulickas seriously underestimate the political effects of modernization as dogma, and they virtually ignore the crucial debate currently claiming the attention of the top decision-makers in the Soviet Union: how to shake the economy out of the doldrums and carry out the thoroughgoing structural reforms that are so urgently needed. while maintaining political power. In fact, the very commitment to high growth rates is itself a political decision. Similarly, in the armed forces, the course of modernization has created a technocracy, for whom the party control and the political education systems are increasingly irrelevant. Many of the national minorities of the USSR represent a case of forced and rapid industrialization. The Hulickas assert that these minorities "attribute to socialism their improved economic and social status. . . ." They do not discuss in this context the obverse problem of the social cost of modernization, the disruptive effects: the breakdown of the family, the creation of urban poor, the destruction of traditional societal patterns.

This anachronistic volume appears at a time when many of its premises and certainly its methodology have been discarded. It does present an unusually large collection of official Soviet statements and directives, but in comparison with the many excellent works currently available, it cannot stand as an adequate analytic study of the Soviet political system.—ELLEN MICKIEWICZ, Michigan State University.

Juggernaut: The Russian Forces, 1918-1966. By MALCOLM MACKINTOSH. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1967. Pp. 320. $6.95.)

Western students of Communist societies frequently resort to monistic and deductive propositions when seeking to define the role of the military in these societies. The military is frequently characterized as the blind instrument of the political elite in the Party; or, the Marshals and Generals are described as the behind-the-scenes manipulators of public political leaders. This either/or approach to the "experts in violence," faceless soldateska or praetorian guard, has obscured the mounting evidence of the military's basic role and place in the Soviet Union, namely that of an institution whose spokesmen clearly embrace the broad political and policy objectives of the Party leaders, but who also retain a strong loyalty to and sense of identification with the military com-

This ambiguity in Western writings on the Soviet military was in part supported by a perceived vagueness in Communist statements on the role of their military. In charting the revolution of the proletariat, the Communist Party's assumption of power, and the creation of a Communist society, neither Marx nor Lenin came to grips with the problem of what would be the nature and the role of the military forces in such a society. Marx and Engels originally saw the successful revolution in Utopian terms of a massive uprising of the lower classes, led by a Communist vanguard. After the fiasco of the Paris Commune, they began to appreciate the need for a well-organized, well-armed, and well-directed military organization, but they never abandoned the view that standing professional armies were alien to a Communist state. Lenin, who so abundantly described most other aspects of the Communist society to be, remained vague on the role of the military in it. And even Trotsky, the creator of the Red Army, who consciously ignored the Communist tenets about the dangers of militarism, subordinating ideology to expediency, reverted to impractical Utopian views once the danger of further anti-Soviet military campaigns had passed. It was Stalin, the mediocre ideologue and ruthless pragmatist, who finally addressed this central problem of the rulers of any Communist society: what should be the role and place of the military in the one-party totalitarian state. He defined the military's role, its organization, its relations with the Party, and its social and political functions. The Red Army emerged from this process as an adjunct of the ruling Party elite; its officers were denied the full authority necessary to the practice of the military profession; they were kept in a perennial state of uncertainty about their careers; and the military community, which tends toward exclusiveness, was forcibly kept open through an elaborate system of control and indoctrination.

Ţ.

Malcolm Mackintosh, whose previous works on Soviet affairs are well known and widely respected, has chosen to describe the role and place of the Soviet military by means of a "traditional" historical rendition of the origins and developmental stages of the Red Army. Using both Soviet and Western sources, he skillfully describes the vital role played by emergent amalgam of revolutionary forces in cementing the Bolshevik's hold over Russia and in warding off counter-revolutionary thrusts from within and outside the collapsing Russian empire. Mackintosh proceeds to examine the early stages in the evolution of the Red Army from a quasi-revolutionary force, "a vast straggling, loosely-organized force with few common factors binding it together," which eventually became transformed into a "juggernaut." He describes this evolution as having been shaped and strongly influenced by a variety of factors: (a) Stalin's mounting concerns with potential threats to Soviet security, and his massive program for modernizing and "professionalizing" of the Red Army, (b) the devastating effects on the morale and effectiveness of the military caused by the purges, (c) "the lessons of Finland" which firmly reversed Stalin's distrustful policies vis-á-vis his military, (d) the Soviet-German war, which on the one hand, dramatically illuminated the Party's overwhelming dependence on the military establishment for its survival, and on the other, persuaded Stalin of the need to clearly assert the Party's supremacy over the military, once the major threat of German aggression was over, and finally (e) the profound changes brought about in the military's role in society and in its relations with the Party, both caused by the nuclear technology and the superpower role of the Soviet Union emerging from World War II.

Mr. Mackintosh is an authoritative writer who marshals his materials in a readable and informative manner. The Juggernaut provides an excellent introduction to the complex relations of the military and political elites and to the evolution of their respective roles in the Soviet Union. Two remarks, however, are in order, referring to the author's omission and commission: One would have liked to see a somewhat better balance in the treatment of the several historical periods. It is rather disappointing to see the whole post-war period treated in two slim chapters. Secondly, the author's generous use of rather obscure personalities and events may possibly tax the general reader's interest and attention. These, however, are minor points. Although he does not depart from traditional interpretations of historical facts, Mackintosh performed an extremely valuable service to the expert and the layman.—ROMAN KOLKOWICZ, Institute for Defense Analyses & The University of Virginia.

The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Centre. (New York: Howard Fertig, 1967. Pp. 180. $6.50.)

The Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre. (New York: Howard Fertig, 1967. Pp. 580. $11.00.)

In one sense, the three Moscow purge trials of 1936, 1937, and 1938 were only a tiny but visible part of a great terror which claimed perhaps nine million victims between 1934 and 1940. The dramatic questions they provoked at the time-were the defendants, many of them founding fathers of the Soviet Republic, actually guilty of terrorism, treason, and sabotage; and if not, why did they confess?-have been definitively answered. Western scholars and post-Stalin Soviet spokesmen agree that the defendants were innocent. They were forced to confess. It is therefore reasonable to ask whether the transcripts of these discredited "frame-ups" the first two of which are reprinted here, are of any enduring interest or value. The answer is yes, in at least three general ways.

First, they contribute to establishing the "why" of the terror itself. A number of explanations-for example, that terror was a constituent dynamic of the "totalitarian" system, or that it played an episodically functional role in the party's modernizing effort-no longer seem to serve. Mass terror died with Stalin; the Soviet system continues. Further, the collectivization-industrialization "great leap" was over by 1933, well before the real terror began. Indeed, some members of the Politburo (not including Stalin) were strongly urging a course of "normalization." Today few students would disagree that the purges were dysfunctional and that they negated important economic and military gains of the 1928-33 period. A satisfactory explanation must instead begin with Stalin. His responsibility for the preparation and general conduct of the purges is beyond question. His motives are less clear. Here the transcripts, like several other "official" documents not bearing his name, are revealing. For Stalin's voice is present in the transcripts, particularly in the summations of the prosecutor Vyshinsky. The summations essentially tell of a world of masked conspirators, whose criminal machinations and hatred are directed "primarily towards Stalin." And it is partly for this quasi-autobiographical depiction of Stalin's imagined enemies as enemies of the state that the transcripts are important.

Second, the transcripts can throw light on the still unclear political history of the thirties. One example must suffice. The 1936 Zinoviev-Kamenev trial differed from the later two in that it was relatively free of judicial pretense; nor did the published record claim to be a verbatim report, only a summary of the proceedings. Its message seems to have been aimed less at the public than at a group within Stalin's own leadership, who since 1932 had contested his claim that former Bolshevik oppositionists were engaged in a terroristic conspiracy and who had resisted his attempts to execute the alleged criminals. The 1936 indictment was designed to demonstrate that such a conspiracy had existed since the early thirties, as "Comrade Stalin warned us." Vyshinsky concluded in his summation: "This trial has fully and distinctly proved the great wisdom of this forecast" (p. 119). The resisters, most of them Stalin's oldest supporters, remained unconvinced by the trial and themselves perished in its aftermath. As our knowledge of the secret struggles within the preterror leadership grows, the transcripts will provide further insights into the history of Stalin's rise to autocratic power.

Finally, the trials are central to one of the large unstudied questions of the October revolution: the transformation of old Bolshevism into Stalinism. Together the trials constituted a public spectacle celebrating the demise of the former and the coronation of the latter. The process which had begun in the late twenties with the distortion of Bolshevism's original programs, and ideals, and the political ouster of its greatest figures, now culminated in the physical destruction of those figures. Many passages in the transcripts speak literally or symbolically of this transformation, particularly in the 1938 trial in the dialogue between the main defendant Bukharin and Vyshinsky. But read as though through a distorted mirror, even the false charges reveal important truths. The final contention that an anti-Soviet, anti-Stalin "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" existed, for example, was not true; but it bizarrely reflected the fact that for all their profound disagreements, old Bolsheviks of the Left and the Right collectively had represented something quite different from that which succeeded them.—STEPHEN F. COHEN, Columbia University.

Soviet and Russian Newspapers at the Hoover Institution: A Catalog. Compiled By Karol Maichel. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, Hoover Institution Publications, 1966. Pp. x, 235. $6.50.)

German Periodical Publications. PREPARED BY GABOR ERDELYI IN COLLABORATION WITH AGNES F. PETERSON. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, Hoover Institution Publications, 1967. Pp. viii, 175. $5.00.) Two new publications in the Hoover Institution Bibliographical Series will enhance the reputation of its library as one of the richest depositories of material for Russian and German regional studies in this country and simultaneously as a library diligently and unflinchingly doing a great public service by giving detailed information to the scholarly community about its holdings of original papers and those on microfilm.

I. The annotated checklist on Russian language newspapers—imperial Russian, Soviet and émigré—prepared by the Curator of the East European Collection, goes beyond the confines of the Hoover Library by including additional references to the holdings of the Columbia University Library and of the Library of Congress. This leaves the New York Public Library and Harvard University Library holdings of Russian newspapers as the principal untapped sources for Russian research based on newspaper holdings in American libraries.

Mr. Maichel points out that the present catalog contains only about 85 per cent of the Hoover Institution's holdings of Russian newspapers; among them seem to be a fair number of titles which started as newspapers and later became journals. Their titles will be found in a forthcoming catalog of Russian language journals which is as eagerly awaited as a promised list of Polish periodicals and journals.

The listings are of immaculate completeness; for one issue (of December 6, 1917) of Nabat revoliutsii 14 lines are needed; a certain lack of homogeneity in the entries has been pointed out in College and Research Libraries Vol. 28, No. 4, July 1967, p. 292. The bulk of the papers have been published after the turn of the century. Twenty-five titles in the list cover materials of the 1890's and only four titles are listed for the 1870's and 1880's. The enormous problem of preserving old newspapers is brought to the attention of potential users by the fact that in the rather strong collection of papers from the period of the First Russian Revolution (1905-1907) thirty-two titles are on microfilm.

The overwhelming impression in going over the list is, how extremely fragmentary the majority of the newspaper holdings are; indeed, of about 1,110 titles more than a fifth (263) are single issues, in other words, specimen copies. In addition 19 titles are rare items as "one day's newspapers" issued for special occasions; there are also (at least) three annuals listed which usually are not classed as newspapers. Only relatively few long runs of newspapers are listed.

There are several aspects which should be taken into consideration in preparing future similar listings. Unfortunately the items listed are not numbered which makes short hints to true gems among the "fugitive" materials well-nigh impossible, for instance to call attention to certain World War I items—papers published by the Russians during the short occupation of Galicia in 1915 (p. 81) or by the Germans in the Ukraine in 1918 (p. 103) or papers for Russian prisoners of war in Germany (p. 159) and Austria (p. 102).

Instead of lumping together all the titles of papers published in pre-revolutionary Russia, of those published after the revolutions of 1917 and by the Russian emigration, correspondingly the materials should have been divided in three large blocks. Between 191 titles from Tsarist times and 297 émigré newspapers, Russia since 1917 would comprise the largest group with outstanding materials for the early years of Bolshevism.

Indices should be provided for the convenience of users. Since the papers are alphabetically arranged, an alphabetical list of the countries and of places of publication would allow users to find out immediately which papers of particular regions of interest to them are represented in the list. A historian who wants to work about the Russian emigration in any particular country has now no choice but to comb through 235 pages to bring together, for instance, 47 titles of papers published in the United States, 57 for France, 23 for Germany, 14 for Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia each, 16 for Bulgaria, 11 for Poland, 34 for Manchuria, 27 for China, four for Mongolia, ten for Latin America, etc.

A topical index should be provided indicating party affiliations, issuing bodies (for instance, government agencies, trade unions or provincial and district branches of the Communist Party); also hints should be given as to which papers are primarily literary, religious, economic, military in content, etc. Wherever the entries give editors or main contributors, their names should also be indexed especially for the benefit of historians of journalism. Associations mentioned are, for instance, those of A. F. Kerenskii with Dni, Petr Struve with Rossiia i Slavianstvo, P. N. Miliukov with Zveno and Posledniia Novosti, V. V. Shul'gin with Velikaia Rossiia, and many others.

Such small improvements as indicated would greatly add to the serviceability of this type of catalog.

II. The checklist of German language serials and monographic series currently received in 30 Stanford University libraries is principally a tool to be used locally. It includes mainly German language continuations in all subjects published all over the world and gives an impressive picture of Stanford's range of collecting German materials with the Main Library and the Hoover Institution Library in forefront. Although it is not intended as a reference work for general purposes, a subject index greatly enhances the usefulness and usability of the volume outside Stanford.—FRITZ T. Er-STEIN, Indiana University Library.

Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism. By Olaf Caroe. 2d ed. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1967. Pp. xxxv, 308. $7.00.)

When Sir Olaf Caroe's work on Soviet Central Asia first appeared in 1953, it filled a void. We had lacked a comprehensive guide in English to this little-understood area of the USSR-the Kazak, Uzbek, Turkmen, Kirghiz, and Tadzhik republics. The main contemporary sources were in Russian and Turkish (particularly the writings of Zeki Velidi Togan, an exiled Central Asian leader). Caroe drew heavily but selectively on these sources. He wanted to set the record straight about Tsarist and Soviet rule of Central Asia, to cut through the jargon used by communists and anticommunists, and also to give the "Russians" just due for the economic and social progress they had brought to Central Asia. On the other hand, Sir Olaf left no doubt then or now where he stands. A distinguished member of the former Indian Civil Service, he obviously is sensitive to Soviet charges about Western imperialism. In the new edition he sees "no grounds for reviewing the conclusion (of the first edition) that the Russian presence in Central Asia remains today, more than ever, the primary example of imperial colonialism of an Asian or African territory by a European power."

The only changes for the second edition, reviewed here, are the addition of an "Introduction to the Second Edition" and a brief bibliography of significant works published from 1960-1965 (where is the period from 1953-1959?). Therefore, I will deal first with the main body of the book.

The main purpose of the book, Sir Olaf wrote in 1953, is "to weigh old influences with new, and estimate the part which these peoples (the Soviet Central Asians) are destined to play in the struggle between the communist world and the West." He begins with an excellent geographical survey of the area, which varies from the lush irrigated oases of the Vale of Farghana to the great deserts of Karakum and Kizilkum and the half-desert steppe called "The Plain of Misfortune." (The last three were very real barriers to invading Tsarist armies.) Next there are several chapters summarizing the history of Central Asia from 700 A.D. to the 1917 revolution. These constitute a necessary "essay," Caroe indicates, because a "popular and comprehensible analysis of the story of these lands in English does not exist." Because of the complexity of the forces at play, in what was for centuries a focal point of Asian history, these brief chapters are somewhat rough going.

Caroe next devotes two chapters to the 1917 revolutions and their complex and confusing repercussions in Central Asia, particularly the Basmachi rebellion and Enver Pasha's futile yet heroic attempt to do what the local revolutionaries at Bukhara could not do-unite the disparate anti-Soviet elements and set up an independent state in Central Asia. This part of the book is particularly valuable because it still is the first adequate account in English of the true nature of the Basmachi movement, which was much more than the simple banditry claimed by the Soviets. There also are some fascinating tidbits of conversations between Togan, then the nationalist leader of the short-lived Bashkurd government, and the Soviet leaders. (In May 1920, Stalin told Togan that Trotsky "cared nothing for nationalists." Stalin avowed he understood the "Eastern Turks" because he himself was the son of a Georgian nationalist. The future dictator nevertheless cautioned Togan to do his duty "in the spirit of Great Russia and not worry so much about governing a small tribe.")

The last half of the book describes developments in the five "republics" under Soviet rule, treating collectivization, industrialization, public works (contrasting the ambitious irrigation projects with actual accomplishments), and Soviet efforts to "Russify" and indoctrinate the indigenous population. The treatment up to 1953 of each of these themes is very well done and serves to remind us of significant points in the Soviet record. Using bare Soviet population statistics, Caroe indicates that one out of three Kazaks perished during the collectivization from hunger and terrorism. He calls this genocide. There also is an interesting chapter on the 180,000 Central Asians who fought for Germany during World War II. The tragedy is that these men fought valiantly for a lost cause: they wanted independence for their peoples; the Germans wanted them only to fight "communism."

These later chapters are the most disappointing section of the book because they were not revised for the new edition. Although the original emphasis was on the "Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism," the work would be a much more valuable guide to the contemporary situation if the story had been brought up to the present. Caroe attempts to update the material in his lengthy introduction to the second edition, and revises his population statistics, noting the salient fact that "European" Russians now outnumber Kazaks in Kazakistan and that "Europeans" may now constitute 40 per cent of the total population of the five republics. But a more thorough analysis of the period since 1953 seems in order. Caroe also touches only briefly on what he terms the two major developments in Asia since 1953 and their significance for Central Asia: the withdrawal of British power from the area and the resurgence of China under a "new dynasty."

Caroe's final judgment on perhaps the crucial issue-the impact on the indigenous peoples of Soviet rule-at one point is properly cautious. The "assimilative forces" of the Soviet system, says Sir Olaf, are "so overpowering that it remains an open question how far the older tradition can hope to survive as anything more than a nostalgic memory destined to fade sorrowfully into history." At the same time, Caroe calls the predominantly Muslim Central Asians "the least assimilable of all elements in the (Soviet) Union," and asserts that the Soviets would have to "torture and oppress these millions for centuries" to bring about their complete assimilation. "Never has anyone been able to force a religion or course of action." he states. "on the Turks." In 1966, Caroe predicts: "However strong the Russian nerve, the Russians will tire of ruling over others who see freedom all around them and will not willingly remain in thrall." Perhaps, but one could argue as did Geoffrey Wheeler (Problems of Communism, Vol XVI, No. 5) that a more likely outcome will be pressure of Muslim Central Asians for greater political, cultural and economic autonomy within the U.S.S.R.-RICHARD F. ROSSER, United States Air Force Academy, Colorado.

The Unfinished Revolution: Russia 1917-1967. By ISSAC DEUTSCHER. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. 115. $3.75.)

A series of lectures, even so distinguished a series as Cambridge University's Trevelyan Lectures, is at best a questionable vehicle for the systematic analysis of any reasonably complex subject. Perhaps most lectures should never be published in anything resembling the form in which they were given. There is frequently no opportunity for deep analysis. It is impossible fully to support generalizations. Normally the focus is on a big question. In short, the lecture medium is suited to the initial airing of stimulating ideas, not to their careful and rounded presentation. These are the eternal and unavoidable limitations of the medium, no matter how distinguished the lecturer.

On this basis, then, one might simply dismiss this book by saying that it is a 115-page volume of lectures about fifty years of Soviet power and that in it the late Issac Deutscher has not and could not pull off the impossible. This will not be one of the books on which Deutscher's reputation will be based; it just does not compare favorably with any of his most important previous works, such as the controversial biography of Stalin and the three-volume analysis of Trotsky.

Still, the fact that it was written by the distinguished journalist and historian and that it was the last book published during his lifetime alone make such cavalier dismissal impossible. And, in all fairness, it must be said that Deutscher did as much as possible to overcome the limitations of the lecture format, and the result is a book that is both coherent and readable, if not highly stimulating.

Stalin's innate cautiousness, according to Deutscher, developed a tendency toward isolationism rather than internationalism—to the detriment of Soviet aims. This thesis stands out most clearly in his chapter on the Soviet Union and the Chinese revolution. By caution with regard to developments in China in 1927 and, particularly, in 1948, Stalin sowed the seeds of the Sino-Soviet conflict. The successors of Stalin, all products of a Stalinist Russia, were unable to abandon "their old search for security within the international status quo." Thus, Deutscher concludes, the "Khrushchevite revisionism" which Maoists denounce "is Stalinist in origin."

Deutscher's final chapter, "Conclusions and Prospects," lacks a close relationship to the rest of the book. The one possible connecting link-if one chooses to view it as such, is Stalin, still the villain of the piece, ruling the Soviet Union from the grave. While acknowledging the significance of developments since Stalin, he characterizes the present situation as a "half-freedom" which can be "even more excruciating than a complete and hermetic tyranny." At the heart of the malaise, he concludes, is the failure of de-Stalinization. The achievement of political maturity for the post-Stalin leadership during "decades of Stalinist falsification" made this task "uncongenial to them" and "went against the grain of their mental habits and interests." So only the limbo of partial de-Stalinization was achieved. Whether Duetscher believes the next generation of Soviet leaders capable of going further is not clear.

Two of Deutscher's basic motifs demand extended comment: his determinism and his conception of the consequences of the Stalinist idea of socialism in one country. In Deutscher's opinion the Bolshevik Revolution has been unique in history in maintaining a kind of continuity throughout the fifty years of the Soviet regime. And, as the title of the volume indicates, it remains unfinished, both in the sense that it "has by no means come to a close" and in that those who subsequently came to power turned their backs on the original revolutionary ideals. These straightforward and sketchily-supported assertions indicate to the reader that he is dealing with an author who takes a long and sweeping view of the historical process.

Even more characteristic of Deutscher is his emphasis on the inevitability of the revolution: social conditions dictated that it could not have been otherwise. Indeed, its direction was set over a period of "many decades, indeed of several epochs." Surely this is true, but it is also one of those deterministic statements that says everything and means nothing; it is a truism that purports to be an explanation.

More important for the interpretation of recent and current Soviet actions is Deutscher's second point. Much more than most other historians, he ascribes great significance to the shift from world revolution to socialism in one country. With the advent of the latter came the industrialization and the forced collectivization that exacted the human costs which still mark the Soviet social structure. Unquestionably, this "revolution from above" changed the face of the Soviet Union. That it had and, more important, still has as great an impact on Soviet relations with other countries has been less emphasized by other historians.—Donald D. Barry, Lehigh University.

The Politics of the European Communist States. By Ghita Ionescu. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. viii, 303. $6.75.)

Ionescu's theme is that dissent exists; it tends to coalesce and aggregate into "opposition" and seek an outlet for expression. The Communist system permits no opposition political party, and expression of dissent and opposition within the ruling Communist Party quickly reaches the limits imposed by Party necessity for unanimity and disciplined consensus. Therefore, the coalescing opposition seeks an institution outside the Party. "Parliament," by whatever name it may be called, provides the logical forum. But such a parliament in countries ruled by Communist Parties must be "inferior" in that it cannot hope to be based on a multi-Party system, free elections, and provider of executive power; it cannot hope to dissolve the government and supply a new one. But it can function as a debating society, and express dissenting and minority views. Even without such a parliament, however, dissent finds expression, and will continue to do so unless the ruling Party employs coercion. But coercion leads to "social and economic inertia," alienation, and also favors the development of a rival, political police, apparat, which might itself become a threat to Party hegemony. If force and the police are not used the expression of dissent is inevitable. And heterogeneous and scattered dissent tends just as inevitably to coalesce and aggregate into an opposition. If such opposition is coopted into the Party, factions result, also threatening the Party. Therefore, from the Party's own standpoint, and in its own interest, a forum for expression of dissent outside the Party is perhaps necessary. In the absence of coercive force, somehow in some way dissent will unite into opposition, and will find expression outside the Party if not inside it, and in non-parliamentary institutions if not parliamentary ones. Absence of parliament, and Party resistance to factionalism within the Party, mean only that dissent and ultimately opposition will coalesce around something else: the Church in Poland, for example; or in the universities; or through intellectual groups and publications; or around some personality, like Djilas in Yugoslavia; or even through the army.

All this appears as much applicable to the USSR as to Eastern Europe, and indeed Ionescu does not hesitate to apply it to the Soviet Union. But thereby he weakens his other major argument, that Eastern Europe is very different from the USSR, that the Soviet model is inapplicable to Eastern Europe, that the USSR cannot be analyzed in the same framework as Eastern Europe. He argues that Eastern Europe legitimately can be, and should be, analyzed en bloc, but not with the USSR. Most of Ionescu's points concerning differences between the USSR and Eastern Europe are certainly valid, but most of them are irrelevant or only marginally relevant to the political analysis he undertakes. Most disturbing is his assignment of Russia to a category of "Eurasian," "East-oriented," as opposed to an Eastern Europe which is "European" and "West-oriented": "These states (of Eastern Europe) belong geographically to the continent of Europe and have the deepest cultural links with the Western part of it . . ." My own judgment is closer to that of Ilya Ehrenburg: "To speak of western European culture as separate from the Russian, or of Russian culture as separate from the western European is, to put it plainly, a sign of ignorance." This Ionescu approach to Russia, combined with the great emphasis on parliament, gives the book an old-fashioned quality, in striking contrast to the modernity and sophistication of the general political analysis.

At any rate, a major intention of Ionescu is to rescue Eastern Europe from the USSR, and reintegrate it with Western Europe, to construct a new (or rather, reconstruct an old) pan-Europe without Russia and without the United States; he wants to get the superpowers out of Europe, although he clearly recognizes that simple simultaneous withdrawal of the USSR and the U.S. would be unlikely to bring about the democratic pan-Europe he ardently desires.

The recent removal of Novotny as First Secretary of the Czechoslovakian Communist Party in January 1968 illustrates the usefulness of Ionescu's approach. Here the particular aggregator of dissent was the Slovak Party organization, behind which Czech dissident elements rallied to form a coalition sufficiently powerful to change the top leader. Economic reformers, students and writers, opponents of anti-Semitism and neo-Stalinism, added their separate interests to Slovak dissatisfaction to gain a significant political result. This shows the way in which varying dissident groups come to unite in a coalition, within a Communist system. But it hardly illustrates any significance of parliament for expressing opposition.

Perhaps Ionescu underestimates the degree to which effective dissent can be expressed within the ruling Party apparatus, and overestimates the possibilities for non-Party political influence. But his warning that intra-Party opposition faces serious limitations is well-taken. Those who want to change the present system in Communist countries face a serious dilemma in deciding where to concentrate their offensive. As Ionescu indicates, the decisions will vary in each separate case, depending on where the strongest and best-placed opposition already functions. Other smaller and weaker opponents of the regime will gradually coalesce around that strongest group, hoping ultimately to constitute a coalition powerful enough for political effectiveness. The ruling group will attempt to frustrate such a coalition of dissent, but to do so effectively requires compromise and subtlety. Tough crackdown will only quicken the pace of unifying the various opposition groups, as Novotny apparently did when he arrested writers and undercut economic reform, as well as supporting the Arabs against Israel and refusing to recognize West Germany. He might well have survived the results of any one or some of these actions, but not all of them at practically the same time.

In a number of places, Ionescu over-rates the workers' alleged desire "to assume the responsibility and direction of the management of industry and the economy." Yugoslavia's experience with workers' councils suggests that workers are actually far more concerned with obtaining higher wages than with running factories. But opinions will differ on many of the specific points: the overall theme of dissent-aggregation should prove provocative and useful to all.—ROBERT A. RUPEN, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

The Federation of German Industry in Politics. By Gerard Braunthal. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1965. Pp. xx, 389. $7.50.)

Unlike many books about the Bonn Republic and the condition of the West German political psyche, Professor Braunthal's study is devoted to a precise investigation of one facet of contemporary West German politics. Its limitations of scope are conducive to the presentation of solid and detailed information on the structure and political activity of an important West German interest group.

The Bundesverband der Deutschen Industrie is composed of federally structured associations of the various branches of industry, and through this arrangement is said to represent 98 percent of all West German industrialists. It does not enroll individual concerns as members, but Braunthal shows the heavy influence of the spokesmen of the large basic industries—coal, steel, chemicals, machinery, metalworking, and electrical construction—in its policies. Moreover since individual firms are represented only indirectly through their associations, oligarchical and centralist patterns are much in evidence in the BDI.

In the central portion of his work, Braunthal examines the "tactics and targets" of the BDI in the political arena. There are no startling revelations in this account of activities in the areas of public opinion, parties, and the federal legislative and executive structures. Braunthal concludes with the observation that "the executive is clearly the primary target of the BDI." The primary usefulness of the presentation lies in the wealth of detail arising from the author's access to internal BDI memoranda and minutes and from evaluation of interview materials.

Braunthal's major attempt to relate the activities of the BDI to general questions of the West German polity concerns the subject of the political power of the BDI in postwar Germany. He contrasts "neo-Marxist" and "pluralist" views, and rejects the former as an adequate frame of reference for an accurate understanding of the role of German industry in politics. He concludes, rather, that "there are countervailing powers in a pluralistic industrial order," and that "a multiple elite governs the nation." Chapters on the economic and foreign policies advocated by the BDI suggest that there is neither overwhelming consistency in the policy aims of the interest group nor unbroken success in influencing governmental decisions.

The reviewer confesses some dissatisfaction with these conclusions, not because of rejection of the impressive material which the author has compiled, but because of doubts about the meaningfulness of the chosen confrontation of "neo-Marxist" and "pluralist" viewpoints. Braunthal alludes briefly to the narrow base of elite recruitment in West Germany, but does not pursue this theme. He refers in the Preface to the pattern of bureaucratization of West German political life, and citizen indifference to political affairs, but he does not systematically discuss the impact of these phenomena on the pluralist thesis. One may realize, however, that such topics were not within the framework of the book. Indeed, one of the implicit conclusions of Bruanthal's work is that one must look at West German political life in additional ways beyond the frame of reference of interest group analysis to discover both its modus operandi and its dilemmas.

Braunthal's book was published before the formation of the "Grand Coalition," and before the open emergence of the "new Right" and the "new Left" in West German politics. The first event seemed to formalize the pattern of bureaucratic decision-making, while the second showed evidences of alienation in the public, based on the suspicion that the decisions being made were irrelevant to important issues. These events promise to reveal much about the character of West German political structures and political life. It is to be hoped that knowledgeable and careful observers such as Braunthal will make additional contributions to our understanding by examining in detail the significance of these events for the mode and substance of political decision-making in West Germany.—George K. Romoser, University of New Hampshire.

Staat, Wirtschaft und Politik in der Weimarer Republik, Festschrift für Heinrich Brüning. Ed. By Ferdinand A. Hermens and Theodor Schleder. (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1967. Pp. vii, 507.)

This Festschrift honoring German ex-Chancellor Heinrich Brüning on his eightieth anniversary consists of some fifteen papers written by historians and political scientists and three memoirs contributed by former colleagues and personal friends.

Of the personal reminiscences, the essay by George N. Shuster on "Dr. Brüning's Sojourn in the United States (1935-1945)"—the one contribution written in English—is of special interest since it deals with a phase of Brüning's life and activities of which on the whole very little is known. Moreover, departing from the generally accepted impression, Shuster shows the ex-Chancellor as being less austere and withdrawn than he is usually pictured.

Among the important scholarly contributions, Ferdinand A. Hermens shows in a paper on "The Brüning Government and the Depression" that Brüning did not pursue a purposely deflationist policy during his chancellorship. The decline of prices during those years, as Hermens shows, was always greater than that of wages. If the contrary impression prevailed, this was due largely to the failure of the government to explain its policies properly to the country. Moreover, because of Germany's commitments under the Young Plan Brüning was unable to reinforce the effect of the price decline by a devaluation of the currency. Once the reparations burden had been eliminated, however, the Chancellor was prepared to initiate some pump-priming for which the plans were drawn up shortly before his dismissal.

Arnold Brecht presents some "Reflections on the Responsibility for Hitler's Appointment as Chancellor." Whatever the responsibilities of Hindenburg, Papen, Schleicher, and other individuals for that appointment, Brecht points out, it must be shared by the millions of Germans who voted for the Nazis and Communists in the Reichstag elections of 1932 and thus made impossible the formation of a constitutional parliamentary government.

Carl Joachim Friedrich contributes some "Thoughts on the Problem of Pathology in Politics." Since physical organisms produce poisons such as bile which in moderate amounts keep the body functioning, Friedrich wonders whether political organisms are not similarly dependent on such "poisons" for their proper functioning. He examines three such phenomena of political pathology-corruption, treason, and secretiveness. Under certain circumstances and within definite limits, he concludes, these practices may have a positive function and help the politician to loosen up structural rigidities in public life. Friedrich warns, however, that just as only a healthy body can absorb its self-generated poisons, only a political leader of strong character can safely cope with the dangers facing him in the swampland of political pathology.

Several convenient surveys of issues related to the Brüning era also deserve to be mentioned. Werner Conze provides a succinct summary of Brüning's chancellorship and points out the lack of choices the Chancellor had because of Hindenburg's unwillingness to work with the Social Democrats. Ulrich Scheuner traces the varied history of the application of Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution, and Gerhard Schulz surveys the evolution of Germany's agricultural aid programs during the 1920's and early 1930's.

Finally, mention must be made of a collection of contemporary documents assembled by Rudolf Morsey, "New Sources on the Background of Brüning's Chancellorship," which clear Brüning of any complicity in the fall of his predecessor, Chancellor Hermann Müller-Franken. In attesting once again Brüning's loyalty and integrity, the documents underscore the tragic fate of this honorable and sincere patriot who was not permitted to save his country from its impending downfall.

—Andreas Dorpalen, Ohio State University.

Annuaire Suisse de Science Politique—Schweizerisches Jahrbuch für Politische Wissenschaft. (Lausanne: Association suisse de science politique, 1967. Volume VII. Pp. 151. $4.14.)

This seventh yearbook of the Swiss Political Science Association is devoted to the study of the Federal Council, the seven-man collegial body which serves as the national executive in Switzerland. The six articles devoted to this theme are written in the context of growing criticisms and demands for reform of this body, and are perhaps best viewed in this context, because with one important exception they are only remotely empirical

For example, "De quelques problèmes concernant le Conseil fédéral," by former Federal Councillor Max Petitpierre, rejects suggestions that the Federal Council be elected directly by the people rather than by the legislature, raises questions about the wisdom of increasing the number of its members, and defends its "all major party" composition. The absence of opposition is not so unfortunate because of the existence of referenda and because of the mutual independence of legislators and parties on the one hand and Federal Councillors on the other. One suggestion for change is that a "question hour" procedure be established whereby the Council would respond to queries from the two legislative chambers.

"Le système gouvernemental suisse comparé à d'autres types de gouvernements," by Christian Dominicé, is not as explicitly and thoroughly comparative as one might hope, and is perhaps more of a defense of the Swiss system (for Switzerland) than anything else. Some of the comparisons are as follows. The selection of a Federal Councillor is not influenced so much by his capabilities for a particular function as in other countries. The number of top political posts is more fixed than elsewhere. The sources of recruitment are more restricted than elsewhere.

Kurt Eichenburger discusses "Organisatorische Probleme des Kollegiatsystemes." The collegial system is contrasted with the departmental and directorial systems. Difficulties in coming to a decision, time demands, coordination problems and the dependence on governmental departments are discussed, and the author concludes that the Swiss collegial system has really become a mixture of "collegial," "directorial" and departmental systems.

Somewhat more useful for comparative purposes is Leo Schürmann's "Probleme der Allparteienregierung." This article contends that the existence of direct democracy in Switzerland puts the problem of opposition in a different light than elsewhere. The process of presentation and discussion of alternatives takes place more between government and social groups than between government and parliament. Still more of such quasi-functional analysis of opposition in the context of different institutions would be useful.

The topic of "Le rapport des forces entre l'Assemblée fédérale et le Conseil fédéral de 1848 à nos jours," is taken up by Jean Francois Aubert. This article is more empirical than most of the studies in that it includes occasional hints about how empirical data would be relevant.

The one article that is directly relevant to political science as it is written and reported in this Review is Erich Gruner's "Freiheit und Bindung in den Bundesratswahlen." This thorough, quantitative discussion treats the process of recruitment to the Federal Council from 1848 to 1966. It discusses patterns of representation of cantons, languages, regions and parties; competition for election; and the source of candidacies and conflict in the recruitment process. While no explicit hypotheses are tested and the comparisons are almost all on a time dimension, this article can stand as one of the more thorough and useful treatments of executive recruitment available.

It is mainly this last article which makes the volume of interest to those who are not especially concerned with current reform issues in Switzerland. The book does contain a report on political science in Switzerland, a report of the activities of the Swiss Political Science Association for 1966 and a bibliography of Swiss political science for 1965, all by Roland Ruggieux. Also of interest is the previous volume which is a comprehensive summary of Swiss political issues and events in the preceding year.—WILLIAM R. KEECH, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

The Politics of Futility: The General Jewish Workers Bund of Poland, 1917-1943. By Ber-NARD K. JOHNPOLL. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1967. Pp. xix, 298. $8.75.)

This is the first scholarly study of that steadfast group whose members never ceased to dream the impossible dream of creating on Polish soil a socialist order in which the Jews were to enjoy complete cultural autonomy and in which Yiddish—that curious polyglot tongue, German in sound, structure and origin but written in Hebrew characters—was to be an official and legal language.

The General Jewish Workers Bund of Poland, commonly called the Bund, like its forerunner in the Czarist empire, was, as its name indicates, a party that could not possibly aspire to governmental power, at least not by itself. The three and a half million Jews who lived in Poland prior to its partition by Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, not quite ten percent of the general population, formed an obviously limited constituency. Even within that ethnically and religiously restricted electorate, the Bund was competing with other parties, the Poalei Zion (Workers of Zion), a forerunner of Israel's Mapai and Mapam, the non-socialist Jewish National Bloc and also the Polish Socialist Party (Polska Partja Socialistyczna (PPS), the only major Polish party which did not hesitate to nominate Jewish candidate dates for political office but was reluctant to grant-the Jews national autonomy. The Bund was even prevented from forming an effective pressure group able to influence the policies of other major parties. For in a country in which long before the ascendancy of Hitlerism large segments of the population considered the Jews outsiders, in which the government's proposed solution for the "Jewish problem" was the organization of large-scale emigration, the Bund's official support of a position might easily have had the reverse effect and precluded its consideration.

Professor Johnpoll, who speaks of the Bund as an ecclesia militanta, observes that one result of the isolation of the Bund from the mainstream of Polish life was its devotion to abstract ideology. No question raised more debate within the membership of the Bund than the issue of its international affiliation. While even its right-wingers rejected Eduard Bernstein's revision of Marxism and, pointing to the examples of Italy and Hungary after the First World War, criticized the German Social Democrats and the PPS for their faith in democratic elections, the Bund never became a member of the Communist International. Already at the famous 1903 Congress of the Russian Social Democratic Party in Brussels and London, the five delegates of the then General Jewish Workers Bund of Poland and Russia asked that their party be regarded as the sole representative of the Jewish proletariat in all parts of Russia and withdrew from the Congress when both Mensheviks and Bolsheviks defeated the Bund's proposal. (Incidentally, it was the withdrawal of these five Bundists which allowed Lenin to gain control of the majority of the delegates.) The Twenty-one Points which the Comintern demanded as the price for affiliation were unacceptable to the Bund, not because they stressed relentless class struggle (which the Bund supported) but because of the Bund's belief in the need for an independent political existence for Jewish socialists in Eastern Europe and its lack of confidence in the genuineness of the socialist convictions of the non-Jewish workers. Moreover, but a few years after Lenin's coup in Russia, the Bund felt compelled to accuse the Communists of having turned working class rule into a dictatorship of the Central Committee of the Party over the proletariat and of having embraced Bakuninism rather than Marxism. The Moscow Trials in the mid-thirties ended whatever sympathy the Bund may have ever had with the Soviet system. With the words that Stalin's brand of Communism was but a return "to the unlimited power of the individual who stands above human and divine law, to the tradition of the Mongol Khan, Ivan the Terrible. and Peter the Great," Victor Alter and Henryk Ehrlich, the two best-known leaders of the Bund in the years from 1917-41, bid farewell to the former revolutionary position of the Bund. While in 1921, in opposition to both the Second (socialist) and Third Internationals, the Bund had joined the International Working Union of Socialist Parties (called the Two-and-a-Half International) which included the Austrian and Swiss socialists, the British Independent Labour Party and the Russian Mensheviks, and while in 1930 it had only reluctantly returned to the Second International and continued to attack its social reformism, it now considered itself a spokesman for social democracy and was willing to make common cause with the PPS. Like the PPS, it supported a genuinely independent Poland. Together with the PPS it had supported Pilsudski because of his old record as a socialist and only left him when he turned to authoritarian policies. But at the same time the Bund rejected the assimilation of the Jews into the Polish society as Poles of a Mosaic faith. Having no interest in the religious tradition of the Jews, it wanted the Jews to be recognized as one of the nationalities within Poland, with specific rights to cultural autonomy. Jews had lived in Poland since the end of the fourteenth century, and the Bund insisted that they were Europeans and not Middle Easterners, that their ties were with the countries in which they lived and not with a land where some of their ancestors had once lived. Zionism to the Bund was sheer escapism, and when the Arabs attacked the Jewish settlers in Palestine, the Bundists placed the blame on the Zionists who, they claimed, had intruded upon a foreign land and population. While the membership of the Bund probably never exceeded the eight thousand figure, in the elections to the Sejm (Parliament) of 1928 the Bund received about one hundred thousand votes, an indication of considerable strength if one compares this number with the total vote of little more than five hundred thousand for the candidates of all other Jewish parties.

In May 1933 the Bund warned the Polish government that Hitler's victory in Germany posed an immediate threat to Poland-but preached to deaf ears. When, following the Non-Aggression Pact between Hitler and Stalin, the German army invaded Poland, the Bund, together with the PPS, organized Warsaw's resistance. After the fall of Warsaw, when the Jews were forced into the ghetto and a high brick wall separated them from the non-Jewish community, the Bund, having gone underground in all of Poland, issued its proclamation for "A Free, Independent, Socialist Poland in a Voluntary Federation of Socialist Republics in Europe," rejected all talk of emigration, and, finally, when it became clear that the Warsaw ghetto was to be a death-trap for its four hundred thousand Jews, the Bund, with two Zionist youth groups, formed a Jewish army which fought against the Nazis for several weeks until the fires set to the ghetto ended all resistance. Despite the protests of William Green, then President of the AF of L; David Dubinsky, President of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union and a one-time Bundist; as well as labor leaders throughout the Western world, Alter and Ehrlich were accused by the Soviets of "active subversive work against the Soviet Union" and executed. Shmuel Zygelboym, who represented the Bund in the Polish government-in-exile in London, upon receiving the news of the fall of the Warsaw ghetto, committed suicide. Since the Jewish constituency in Poland had died out, the Bund's mission had ended.

Professor Johnpoll's book is packed with a wealth of information, well written and well documented. Its breadth of intellect and its historically grounded understanding of the forces which shaped Jewish life in Poland between the First and Second World Wars is a most welcome addition to the literature on political parties and the range of choices in their decision-making functions. The title of the book, The Politics of Futility, expresses, no doubt, the final verdict of the author's analysis of the Bund's career, This reviewer is inclined to accept Johnpoll's verdict provided it is confined to the specific historic situation of Polish Jewry in the interbellum period. But this reviewer remains mindful of the fact that just in these days, confronted with the Maoist challenge, the Soviet Communists and their friends abroad seem to be forced to revive the very political philosophy which formed the arsenal of the Bund in its opposition to the Stalinist regime.—Joseph Dunner, Yeshiva University.

A Liberal State At War: English Politics and Economics During the Crimean War. By OLIVE ANDERSON. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1967. Pp. xi, 306. $8.50.)

As the subtitle of this book indicates, the author set out to investigate the non-military aspects of the Crimean War. British domestic problems, political as well as economic, are discussed at length, while references to other European states are made only to clarify certain governmental actions of the 1850's. Negotiations with minor allies receive relatively more attention than do the other major belligerents, France and Russia. What is especially lacking is a systematic treatment of the French policies which shaped the course of the war and led to its abrupt conclusion in 1856.

British policies were dictated by the exigencies of the military situation. The lack of suitable recruits at home encouraged a search for foreign mercenaries. "Emigration and high wages had from the beginning seriously reduced the pool of human scum which the British Army was accustomed to rely upon" (p. 219). It was no longer possible to pay the smaller German states for corps of mercenaries, as the development of international law would have made this appear a breach of neutrality. Unofficial recruiting abroad for a foreign legion was slow, and harmful to British prestige. Finally, in 1855, important financial measures were negotiated with Sardinia and Turkey. The British would have preferred a subsidy, but the Sardinians insisted on a loan in return for 15,000 men, so as to be regarded as "des alliés et non des serviteurs" (p. 220). Gladstone's suggestion of an outright gift to Turkey because of doubt about the soundness of her credit did not materialize, and under public pressure Turkey was able to raise a large loan guaranteed by the British government.

Governmental economic policies showed evasive and inconsistent patterns of action, with results often contrary to original suggestions. Gladstone proposed meeting the expenses of the war entirely by taxation, as a salutary and moral check which "it has pleased the Almighty to impose upon the ambition and lust of conquest" (p. 195). Only six weeks later the Treasury raised funds by the sale of Exchequer Bonds. Governmental borrowing, resulting in higher prices, was defended by some as a way to make the poor pay their share of war expenditures. Although the Bonds were to constitute not a loan but a provision for the temporary raising of money to be repaid from the proceeds of taxation, they became part of the permanent floating debt in the following year.

The Crimean War created the modern war photographer and special correspondent at the front. It became the subject of unprecedented publicity and discussion, in which The Times commanded phenomenal attention, with a circulation ten times larger than that of any of its competitors. Press censorship was unknown, and letters from troops and sightseers to the front were extensively quoted and often printed in full.

In the outburst of patriotic excitement, traditional aristocratic virtues were acclaimed as necessary to carry the nation to victory. But the conduct of the war and military setbacks convinced the public that personal heroism and leadership were no substitute for practical experience, organization, and supply of material resources—typical achievements of the business world. The successful completion of the first military railway at Balaklava furnished tangible proof for the claim that the nation should rely on private commercial experience. The Administrative Reform Association advocated the reorganization of the Civil Service in the image of private enterprise, the use of civilian contractors, and the substitution of business experience for the academic preparation it considered irrelevant. The Association did not escape the criticism of John Stuart Mill, who suggested that "any public matter whatever, under the management of the middle class, would be as grossly, if not more grossly, mismanaged than public affairs are now" (p. 122). His suspicion was soon to be confirmed by a crop of war contractors' scandals, discoveries of patched mortars, defective boots, and profiteering in war material destined for the enemy. The export of saltpeter, an essential war chemical, increased so alarmingly by October 1855 that it was obvious that indirect British trade with Russia must have been quite extensive and that governmental export controls were ineffective.

The Crimean War lowered British prestige abroad, and at the same time discredited the ideas of constitutional liberalism and laissez-faire economic policy. Bitterness between the middle classes and the aristocracy was freely expressed. A new, petty bourgeois, pseudo-antiquarian and xenophobic radicalism emerged in Urquhart's National Movement, which preached that progress can be achieved only by going backwards. But the war also increased middle class self-confidence, and laid the groundwork for the cooperation between the middle class and working class political movements which characterized the post-Crimean generation.—Charles Mark, Adelphi University.

Mao Tse-tung in Opposition 1927-1935. By John E. Rue. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, Hoover Institution Publications, 1966.
 Pp. viii, 387. $10.00.)

This is an exceedingly important book about the early history of Chinese Communism. Although much that the author says already has been related in other works on this subject, his is the most lucid and comprehensive study that yet has appeared. Besides making exhaustive use of virtually every English-language work touching on Chinese Communism before 1936, the author also has consulted numerous Chinese language materials, as well as a number of works written in Japanese. The result is a book well suited for use as a text for a large part of a course on the history of Chinese Communism.

Although the author examines almost every significant aspect of Chinese Communist history during the period under consideration, he focuses his attention chiefly on the role played by Mao Tsetung. There emerges an unusually clear image of not only Mao but likewise early Maoism, which, in Professor Rue's words, revolved about the thesis "that the Chinese Communist Party's most potent weapon in the coming revolution would be the Red Army, recruited from the peasantry whose allegiance had been secured in the course of a genuine land revolution" (p. 205). Inevitably, this conviction brought Mao into conflict with Stalin and his Chinese proteges, who wanted to carry out in China a chiefly urban insurrection modelled after the Bolshevik revolution in Russia, Relying on his impressive knowledge of Soviet history, as well as the history of the Communist International, Professor Rue describes with remarkable clarity how developments in the U.S.S.R. having no intrinsic relevance with respect to China, nevertheless, determined the policies which Stalin tried to force on the Chinese Communists. Mao's consistent and tenacious resistance to these policies and his ultimate triumph over Stalin and his Chinese followers is the principal theme of Professor Rue's book. "Mao, I believe," writes Professor Rue, "would like to be recognized as the man who has moved Communism away from its European proletarian origins, applied the essential elements of Marxism to the mastery of another historical epoch, and restated its fundamentals in universal categories that can be applied in the analysis of any stage of human history and used to incite or inspire revolutionary change in any human society" (p. 291).

Yet, although he adhered stubbornly to his belief in the necessity of mobilizing the peasants through land reform so as to create an effective army, Mao otherwise was pragmatic and almost opportunistic. Examples of his flexibility are his lenient policy with regard to middle and even many rich peasants and his willingness to join forces with liberal minded non-Communist opponents of Chiang Kai-shek, such as the so-called "Third Party" and the Fukien rebels of 1933. Professor Rue portrays Mao as a moderate, who disliked violence within the Party and championed democratic dissent against both left and rightwing dogmatists. His description of Mao's struggle with the Stalinist-minded group known as "The Twenty-Eight Bolsheviks," which dominated the Party apparatus until 1935, and the impact of this conflict on Communist efforts to defeat Chiang Kai-shek's fifth so-called "extermination campaign" in South China is unusually informed and a major contribution to our understanding of Chinese Communist history. I suspect that Professor Rue has written what may become a classic work on the history of the Chinese Communist Party.—Donald G. Gillin, Duke University.

The Fall of Sukarno. By Tarzie Vittachi. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 192. $4.95.)

Indonesia. By Bruce Grant. (Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1967. Pp. xi, 247. $1.65.)

During most of the decade prior to the cataclysmic events of late 1965 and 1966 national Indonesian (that is, Djakarta elite) politics was an extremely complex, highly personalized, and to a considerable extent unstructured affair. The basic conformation of the Guided Democracy power structure is well known: it consisted of the Army, which possessed a near monopoly over the instruments of physical coercion; the Communist Party, which possessed the largest, best disciplined, most effectively led political organization in the country: and President Sukarno, who used and was used by but neither controlled nor was controlled by the other major elements in the system. Within and among these and other structures there developed labyrinthine and ever shifting patterns of clique and factional alliance and maneuver designed to maximize short- and long-run power positions.

The point of the foregoing is to suggest that the exploration of certain kinds of questions in Indonesian politics—in particular the nature of intra-elite relationships—requires an expertise and sophistication which few possess. It is unfortunate, then, that the American public's interest in Indonesia since late 1965 has been centered largely on the "whodunit" question, precisely the kind of question most difficult to answer satisfactorily. This emphasis is doubly unfortunate because the whodunit question is, by itself, not very interesting from the perspective of social science, that is, it can provide few payoffs for a deeper understanding of the dynamics of Indonesian social and political life.

Where scholars fear (or do not desire) to tread. journalists sometimes rush in, due in part, no doubt, to the nature of their craft. In the case of Ceylon-born journalist Tarzie Vittachi's The Fall of Sukarno, the result is a superficial account, full of the most elementary sorts of errors and profoundly misleading in its implications. For example: Prior to 1965, Indonesia was governed by "a monolithic structure of power, built through twenty years of whimsical dictatorship" (p. 7) (the structure of power was anything but monolithic and Sukarno did not even approach quasidictator status until the late 1950's); "The Indonesian Armed Forces . . . was the only truly disciplined organization in the country . . ." (p. 15) (this should produce a wry smile from Generals Suharto and Nasution, and is refuted by Vittachi's own arguments); "the mahaenist [sic] population of the villages was . . . the strongest repository of religious or spiritual faith. The mahaenists are the santris, the believers" (p. 53) (the term Marhaen, coined by Sukarno and used primarily by the Nationalist Party, refers to an idealized Indonesian common man and not to the devout Moslems); ASU is identified as the student organization of the Indonesian Nationalist Party, where in fact the initials stand for a faction within the party itself (p. 161).

Vittachi's reconstruction of the coup is neither particularly original nor wholly implausible. He argues that the major actors all had contingency plans prepared with regard to various possible scenarios. When, on the night of September 30, Sukarno fell ill during a speech, Lt. Col. Untung and the Presidential Palace Guard, abetted by Communist Party and Air Force elements, moved to immobilize the Army by destroying its top leadership, thus paving the way for a new government in which Communist influence would be increased.

There are many problems with this analysis, including the enigmatic role of Sukarno himself, the view of some writers that the President did not in fact become ill during his speech, the apparent unreadiness of PKI to defend itself against a countercoup, and so on. My purpose here, however, is not to find fault with Vittachi's account of the coup-one can punch holes in all of the present versions-but rather with his underlying assessment of the nature of the Indonesian political system and its relation to the society. For Vittachi, Sukarno was, at least in recent years, a charlatan leading Indonesia to hell in a handbasket, the Communists were evil schemers, and the "truly disciplined" Army, with the support and prodding of the students and the "people" or the "masses" (who, it is alleged, have always looked to the Army for protection) was the savior of the Republic, restoring Indonesia to the rule of law under the Constitution of 1945. This sounds very much like official propaganda, and neglects such important problems as the very real support which Sukarno enjoyed from a considerable segment of the population, the fact that PKI did, after all, have millions of members and supporters of its own, the not unblemished record of the Army as a partner in Sukarno's Guided Democracy, the meaninglessness of statements about the "masses" (who are divided along several dimensions into groups with differing points of view about political matters), the fact that the massacre of the Communists reflected a deeply rooted religion-based cleavage in Indonesian (particularly Javanese) society, and the fact that the Constitution of 1945 was reinstituted initially not in accord with accepted legal procedure but by (Sukarno's) Presidential fiat in 1959. In short Vittachi simply lacks the necessary qualifications to analyze either the coup itself or, what is much more important, the political and social system within which the coup occurred and upon which its consequences have been and will continue to be profound.

Bruce Grant (an Australian journalist) has produced a very different, and much better, book designed as a general introduction to Indonesian politics and society. Widely read, he combines some of the fruits of recent scholarly analysis with the freshness of personal experience and an observant eye for the nuances of Indonesian political behavior. Although the book inevitably contains errors of fact (mostly of minor significance) the accounts of the Colonial period, nationalism, the roles of Sukarno, the Communists, and the military, the problems of the economy and of Indonesia's foreign relations are generally accurate and cogently presented. The usefulness of the journalistic approach is demonstrated in the chapter entitled "The People," a more or less verbatim presentation of interviews with individuals of a variety of political persuasions.

For the general reader the principal fault of the book is that it is an apparently rather hastily revised version of the author's earlier Indonesia (Melbourne University Press, 1964). While several chapters contain new material, the basic format (and much of the original material) is unchanged. The result is a sense that one is reading two books at once, one describing the pre-coup and the other the post-coup situation. Hasty revision has also led to some curious imbalances, e.g., General Nasution gets several pages, General Suharto only brief mention. Despite these reservations, it remains true that the book is one of the better introductory efforts and the only one so far to incorporate recent events. From the perspective of the political scientist as teacher, however, it is not a very useful work, both because of the broad range of the discussion and because of the lack of any attempt to place the argument within the framework of development theory or, more broadly, systematic political analysis. This evaluation is not, of course, intended as a criticism of Grant, for his purpose was simply to provide a reasonably well-informed introduction to Indonesian political and social life. This he has done.—R. WILLIAM LIDDLE, Ohio State University.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW, AND ORGANIZATION

The Islamic Law of Nations. By Shaybani Siyar.

Translated, with an introduction, notes, and appendices by Majid Kadduri. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1966. Pp. xviii, 311. $8.00.)

Mr. Khadduri forges here another link in his chain of studies of Islamic law and its capital texts. The volume under review is essentially a translation from Arabic (pp. 75-292) with a detailed introductory study (pp. 1-74). In a Foreword, Philip C. Jessup (International Court of Justice) welcomes "the opportunity for many of us to become acquainted" with a great Islamic jurist.

The author of the translated text, Shaybani

(750-804), was a disciple of Abu Hanifa (d. 768) and his lieutenant Abu Yusuf (d. 799), under Harun al-Rashid, Born in Iraq of probably non-Arabian stock, he spent most of his life in Kufa but visited the Hijaz and Syria. He was mostly a teacher but served as judge for several years, initially perhaps reluctantly. He wrote extensively but to date his writings are partially lost, partially unpublished. More than other jurists in Islam he paid attention to problems that might be classified as pertaining to international law, i.e., relations between the (then monolithic) Islamic polity and the infidel polities, or between the Islamic polity and its non-Muslim subjects. This became a section of Islamic jurisprudence and was known as sivar. The translation was made from manuscripts. the earliest of them of the 13th century. For the interpretation the translator could draw on an XI century very detailed commentary on a kindred work by the author, but he was careful to distinguish between the XI century concepts of the commentator and the original ones of the VIII century author.

The book opens with a chapter filled with reports (stories, hadith) about how the Prophet and his Companions dealt in precedent cases of raids, war, division of spoils. Prefacing a discussion on a subject with such pious examples (not yet fully canonized at the time) was just getting into vogue, and Shaybani followed therein the prevailing trend. But the following section of the book, the most substantial, is construed as a dialogue between the master (actually the school of) Abu Hanifa, and the inquisitive disciple. 'He' and 'I' trade remarks (hardly any is more than half a page long) about cases, "spcific situations, highly speculative and scholastic in nature, and bearing on every conceivable question that may have arisen, or was believed likely to arise, in the relationships between Islam and other nations" (p. 51). General principles are rarely formulated though they are clearly discernible.

The final section deals with taxation and status of the non-Muslims in the caliphate.

Islamic law is personal, but the school of Abu Hanifa perceived the territorial element, as well as the element of reciprocity (in granting special status to embassies, in the mutual exemption of traders from taxation). But the other schools of Islamic law did not follow Abu Hanifa in this area. Essentially the prevailing view was that there was a division into a pax islamica domain and a non-islamic domain, and the twain were never to meet but in perpetual fighting, for the glory of and till the victory for the true faith. Truce for ten years at most was the most peaceful prospect. And in a way such lucubrations reflected actual conditions, at least along the borders. It took centuries before coexistence was tacitly accepted. Realities and reversals were bound to force some change. The iconoclast Eobn Taymiya (d. 1327) is refreshing (p. 59). Writing at a time of the (by that time Islamized) Tartars' devastating invasions, he remarked that perpetual holy war contradicts the Koran with the latter's opposition to compulsion in religion (Koran II 257). However, whatever real conditions obtained, the schoolmasters continued to spin and weave their inherited theories based on the Islam-Non-Islam confrontation. Only in the XVI century did Ottoman contacts with Western powers begin to move into a different groove-of reciprocity and mutual interest, and since then Western concepts have increasingly influenced the thinking of Muslims. There were efforts to retain something of Islamic legal thinking or its religious and moral foundations for inter-Muslim relations, with questionable results (cf. pp. 67-70).

A century and a half ago it was suggested that Shaybani was the Hugo Grotius of Islamic law—in his attention to, interest in, writing on relations between the Muslim State and non-Muslims, both under conditions of war and peace. The analogy may be weak, but Shaybani is a jurist in his own right, and fully deserves the attention of the historian of legal tenets, and in particular in tracing the age-long struggle for the emergence of notions of co-existence of men and politics towards and in peace.

The school jurists' discussions, however, should be separated from the actual course of affairs. In the latter, Islam knew not only victories even in its first century, and had to make deals with the Byzantines. The first Umayyad "found it expedient to purchase (658 or 659) a truce from the Emperor . . . at the price of a yearly tribute" (Hitti, History of the Arabs, 5 ed., p. 199, p. 205). Later, embassies and treaties, even about tribute from the Byzantines (cf. ibid p. 204, year 782), exchange of prisoners, securing a Constantinople compound for Muslims (ibid),—all were realities to which the learned faqihs proved not responsive. This, of course, is of a piece with the largely academic character of Islamic jurisprudence.

Mr. Khadduri mentions that while religious doctrine may have been responsible for constant conflict in foreign affairs, "religion as a sanction for moral principles prompted Muslims to adopt a tolerant attitude toward non-Muslims and to observe humane principles" (p. 69). But the phenomenon of toleration (none of the monotheistic faiths developed much tolerance) is to be explained historically: the conquerors were few amidst conquered masses, were busy with taxation, wealth, etc., cared far less about religious matters, were unable to take over the administration of the huge territories the Blitz put under their control. Hence the reference to the favorable Koran passages concerning poll-tax and humiliation. The Prophet's own policy in Arabia has to be seen against the background of initial weakness coupled with his reverence for the scriptures, etc. This would be a somewhat more sombre but clearer interpretation of the fundamentals of the non-Muslims' status in Islamic society. (Cf. Cahen in the new ed. of the Encyclopedia of Islam, s.v. Dhimma).—Moshe Perlmann, University of California, Los Angeles.

Formosa, China, and the United Nations—Formosa in the World Community. By Lung-Chu Chen and Harold Lasswell. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1967. Pp. xi, 428. $8.95.)

The future status of Formosa is a critical problem for the United States as well as the United Nations because it is the heart of the entire China problem. This book by an expatriate Formosan scholar and his Yale mentor, Harold Lasswell, is explosively controversial because it espouses an independent Formosa ruled by the island's 13 million inhabitants. Peking and Taipei denounce any such scheme as totally unacceptable to them, and their friends in the UN have blocked any "One China, One Formosa" proposal to break the perennial deadlock on Chinese representation. The logical argumentation of the book is most persuasive, although its organization and supporting evidence leave much to be desired.

Chen, the principal author, is a 33-year-old honor graduate of National Taiwan University who came to this country in 1960 to receive law degrees at Northwestern and Yale. It is unfortunate that his book does not contain more solid, factual data on postwar Formosa and the attitudes of his fellow-natives, instead of stressing theory throughout the work. Professor Lasswell, who once taught in Peking, is one of our most eminent political scholars whose breadth of expertise lends credibility to many statements in the book, but the reader is left in doubt concerning the extent of his contribution to the actual writing.

The book is divided into three major parts: the first dealing with "One China, One Formosa" as a viable alternative; the second, only one chapter, on the "Transition to Independence," and the final section of four chapters on "Independence and After." The UN is treated in depth only in the first chapter, and plays a relatively minor role in the remaining discussion. The authors claim that a UN decision to seat Communist China as the only China, with a native-ruled Republic of Formosa eligible for a separate membership, would either force the Nationalists to hand over power to the Formosans peacefully or inspire a revolt by natives and dissident mainlanders on the island. This involves two dubious assumptions, not adequately defended in the book, concerning the ease of obtaining a favorable UN decision and securing the cooperation of the 2 million gaishojin (mainlanders in Taiwan). The authors may have been aware of Urban Whitaker's study of UN delegations' attitudes toward their "One China; one Formosa" solution in the early 1960's, but did not cite it or other convincing evidence.

The rest of the book touches upon many topics, usually in a disorganized style only vaguely related to the chapter titles. The past history of Formosa before the Nationalists received the island, courtesy of the American defeat of Japan, followed by Nationalist misrule and suppression of the native majority's political freedom, can be found in several sections of the book. The reviewer concurs in all substantive statements made on these topics, but wishes they had been treated in a more organized and original fashion. The desire of the Formosan majority for an independent future separate from either present Chinese regime is asserted with some evidence, but this also requires far more treatment than the book provides.

What is the potential for revolt inside Formosa? The authors point to the 1947 rebellion, so brutally suppressed by Chinese troops, and the subsequent efforts of the Chiang regime to minimize unrest by economic carrots, police-state arrests, and extremely effective divide-and-rule tactics to separate dissident mainlanders from Formosans and various types of Formosans from each other. Chen acknowledges the wisdom shown by the Nationalists in permitting intellectuals to study abroad, thus ridding the island of many potential rebels (only about 5 per cent of the thousands of college graduates abroad ever return to Formosa). Chen equivocates, however, on the question of Formosan determination to suffer personal sacrifices in the "self-help" effort he considers so important. Based on seven years' study of this question in Formosa and among overseas refugees, the reviewer cannot be so sanguine. Formosans do constitute over 80 per cent of the Nationalist enlisted military forces; their elders are well-educated and anti-Nationalist; and many within the mainlander minority are bitterly dissatisfied, but few experts would predict either a militant uprising or an early evolution toward native rule. The authors, at various places in the book, recognize most of the deterrents to Formosan nationalism but they allow their commendable devotion to the ideal of self-determination to dim their view of the hard realities obstructing its fulfillment.

Perhaps the most original and valuable portion of the book deals with the authors' blueprint for a Formosan national polity after independence. Despite the air of unreality pervading these sections, the concrete suggestions for nation-building are fascinating to any student of developing nations.

One strong point, reiterated throughout the work, is the necessity for the Formosans to cooperate with the bulk of the mainlander minority to avoid a Cypriot-type continuing dissension. They urge, for example, that Mandarin Chinese be accepted as the national language rather than the less-developed Formosan dialect, and suggest legal ways to reassure the mainlanders of their welcome in a Formosan polity. The authors also propose continuation of a defensive alliance with the United States until mainland China, which they assume will remain under Communist rule, accepts the fact of a separate Formosa, Naturally, Quemoy and Matsu would be evacuated and all claims to "reconquer" the mainland renounced by the new regime on Formosa. Civil rights, especially the right to political dissent, would be guaranteed. Political prisons, where thousands of natives now languish, would be abolished, but no Communist party would be tolerated. The authors pledge more complete attention to the rational economic development of the island, after surplus military costs have been eliminated, and a greater emphasis on technical education and population control.

This reviewer cannot quarrel with the basic theme of the book that an independent Formosa is a viable alternative domestically and internationally to the present situation in which Formosans are pawns in the Chinese civil war. Moreover, this book is an excellent rebuttal to the pro-Nationalist work by Frank Morello, The International Legal Status of Formosa (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1966). Its appendix, with the UN voting record on Chinese representation, and the bibliography of most English-language sources are helpful to the general reader.

Precisely because this reviewer agrees with the major theisis of the book, he finds it a painful duty to note its stylistic defects. The general reader will find it both informative and stimulating, but those familiar with the Formosan problem may wish for a tighter, less repetitive, and more original presentation of the authors' case.—Douglas Mendel, Jr., University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

The Quest for a United Germany. By Ferenc A. Váll. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. xii, 318. $8.50.)

A broad scope and careful research combine to make Ferenc A. Váli's study one of the most significant on the German question. The author, a professor of Government at the University of Massachusetts, has avoided polemics and produced a balanced, well documented analysis of one of the most intractable problems of world politics. In the philosophical tradition of Johann Gottfried von Herder that the only natural state is the nation-state, Professor Váli repeatedly assures his readers of the "natural desire" of the East Germans to achieve a political union with their kinsmen in the Federal Republic. The author attributes to the members of a nation a collective personality which causes them to draw together into a state. Accordingly, he regards national character as an "important determinant of state action" and writes of a "German psyche" which has demonstrated its ability to assume the historical responsibility for a state. Similarly, the policy of the Soviet Union emerges as a complex interplay between the "national temperament" of the Russian people and the tenets of Marxism-Leninism. The discussion of German sentiment directed toward a national revival is not presented in exclusively organic terms, for a chapter is devoted to analyzing West German opinion on the reunification issue. In this section the author's own extensive interviewing usefully supplements his utilization of reports from German public opinion research institutes. Such data serve to establish the depth of popular feeling for reunification, regardless of whether or not one accepts the interpretation that the division of Germany is "unnatural."

Unfortunately, certain of Professor Váli's generalizations are open to such serious questions that they weaken the impact of an otherwise strong work. Among these is the assertion that a majority of the postwar West German elite favored the founding of the Federal Republic as a step toward the goal of reunification. On the contrary, during the summer of 1948, General Lucius D. Clay had to overcome a pronounced lack of enthusiasm for the new state among German politicans by making it abundantly clear that their reluctance to act would occasion an early cessation of Marshall Plan aid and, above all, a reappraisal by the United States of its commitment in Berlin, Ernst Reuter, the Social Democratic leader in Berlin, responded to the hint that his city might be lost to the West with a plea for the restoration of German sovereignty outside of the Soviet Zone. A German initiative, he argued, would serve to overcome the lack of resoluteness characteristic of Washington's policy in Central Europe. With reference to this turning point in German-American relations, the author might profitably have examined Vom Reich zur Bundesrepublik (1966) by the University of Hamburg political scientist Hans-Peter Schwarz. We must also urge caution toward the statement: "Any communication between the United States and the Soviet Union is examined in Bonn from the point of view of its effect on reunification" (p. 248). Were this so, it would indeed be remarkable. Moreover, error exists in representing the policy of the Sudeten German Association whose former Speaker, Federal minister Hans-Christoph Seebohm, constantly reiterated the demand of his followers for a return to their Bohemian and Moravian homeland and who (apparently unknown to the author) ruled out the necessity of changing frontiers to effect this return. Finally, the acceptance in the foreign ministries of the Warsaw Pact states of the stipulation that West Berlin be included in the area encompassed by trade agreements with the Federal Republic is not as uniform as the text would have one believe.

Professor Váli concludes that a relaxation of tension in Europe through a solution to the German question is now primarily dependent upon the willingness of Soviet policy-makers to support the German nation's right of self-determination. He warns that impatience over the continued existence of the Berlin Wall can lead to unrealistic proposals for direct negotiations between Bonn and Moscow in the hope that extensive German concessions will induce a conciliatory Soviet attitude. While far removed from a new Rapallo, the foreign policy of the Grand Coalition stresses unilateral German diplomatic overtures in Eastern Europe rather than a reliance upon American policy to alter the status quo. The call for an active German Eastern policy issued by Hans Kroll, one-time ambassador of Bonn in Moscow, and Rainer Barzel, chairman of the Christian Democratic parliamentary party, is worthy of more than the casual treatment given it in the book. In 1965, the Social Democratic member of parliament Wenzel Jaksch proposed that his government sponsor a "Marshall Plan" for Eastern Europe. It is well that the "Jaksch Plan" received, at least, bibliographical notice; for Jaksch, unlike Professor Váli, emphasized the need to improve relations among the states of Europe as a prelude to overcoming the division of Germany.-JAMES H. Wolfe, University of Maryland.

Deutschlands Beziehungen zu Frankreich, Grossbritannien, Belgien sowie deutsche Entwaffung, Reparationen, Völkerbund und internationale Abrüstung, Dezember 1925 bis Juli 1926, Akten zur deutschen auswartigen Politik, 1918-1945, Serie B: 1925-1933, Band I, 1. Ed. by Hans Rothfels et al. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966. Pp. lxix, 799.)

This volume inaugurates a new series of dccuments on German foreign policy. It contains over 300 items under the headings Disarmament Belgian/Eupen-Malmedy, International Steel Cartel, Reparations, the Saar, Troop Reductions and the Evacuation of the Occupied Territories of Germany, the League, and more general questions pertaining to Germany's relations with England and France. It admirably fills the longest gap in the published record of German foreign policy. The publication of Foreign Office material began with Die Grosse Politik in the 1920's which is still the most important record of pre-1914 diplomacy. After World War II the United States and Great Britain commenced the printing of selected diplomatic records. At first the Anglo-American commission was committed to the publication of the sources from 1918 to 1945. But, because of the enormous problems involved in any such undertaking, the commission decided in 1954 to limit its scope to the Hitler period. By this time groups under the auspices of the American Historical Association and Saint Anthony's College, Oxford were microfilming large blocks of captured Foreign Office papers for all periods. These microfilms and the original papers, since returned to Bonn, have formed the basis for a thriving scholarship on Weimar foreign policy.

However officials and scholars of the Federal Republic still believed in the necessity of establishing the printed record; they initiated an agreement in 1960 with the American, French, and British governments to institute an international board for the sole purpose of editing and publishing the archival material from 1918 to 1933. Each volume is to be prepared by a team comprising one German and one non-German member under the supervision of the general editors—Hans Rothfels (Germany), Hajo Holborn (United States), Maurice Baumont (France) and Ronald Wheatley (United Kingdom).

Such a distinguished board would appear to guarantee a well-edited series, and the publication of this, the first volume, has done nothing to lower the expectation. The selection process has been careful and thorough; the editors have included more classes of documentation below the permanent secretary's files which are not customarily used in such publications. There are good explanatory notes and cross-indexing not only to published documents but also the unpublished microfilmed papers. While the documents themselves are ordered chronologically, a long subject index calenders the substance of each item. This chronological arrangement may sometimes cause erroneous impressions since the papers are drawn from many files and present an artificial order that was never seen by any decision-maker. However any alternate ordering would be just as flawed.

This leads to the question: why publish the documents in the first place? Unlike the papers of the Hitler era, these published Weimar Foreign Office documents contain few surprises. The microfilmed Stresemann Nachlass has been so well mined that the outlines of Weimar policy have been clear for a number of years. In addition, numerous monographs have used the far larger store of microfilmed Foreign Office files, and a great many more are in various stages of preparation. Russian and Polish relations have been especially well covered, but Western-oriented studies are gaining increasing attention. Even in this relatively overlooked field, these documents do not add any striking new evidence about the most important single event within their scope. Using the Stresemann Nachlass, Erich Eyck and Ludwig Zimmermann have already constructed perfectly satisfactory accounts of the struggle over Germany's entrance into the League.

Yet, despite such superfluity, this collection will become a valuable scholarly aid. Modern research in diplomatic history is the victim of the typewriter and carbon paper. There are simply too many documents in any modern archive for any single researcher to peruse, even with a lifetime at his disposal. If the history of Weimar foreign policy is to be written, much of the work will have to be based upon specialized monographs and published sources. Furthermore the publication of these documents allows the scholar to deal with relatively minor questions which shed light on the whole nature of the diplomatic process. For example, the relationship of German civilian aviation to the disarmament question is only tangentially relevant to any major study. Yet, perhaps more than any other set, the documents published on this issue illustrate the limits of Weimar policy as well as the tenacity with which both Briand and Stresemann pursued their goals.

Also the major issues of the 1920's often require research into the policy of more than one nation. With the Public Record Office now open for this period, with Austrian and Italian documents available for much of the 1920's, multi-archival research has now become possible. However even the most indefatigable scholar cannot visit all the archives. He must rely on published sources. Thus the publication of the German documents presents a welcome addition to this task of publishing, one already undertaken by the American, English and Italian governments.—Stanley Suval, North Carolina State University.

Germany and the Atlantic Alliance: The Integration of Strategy and Politics. By James L. Richardson. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1966. Pp. vii, 403, $8.95.)

Noting that while "military strategy is an integral part of foreign policy . . . most strategists and politicians inhabit different worlds," James L. Richardson, at present a member of the Arms Control and Disarmament Research Unit of the British Foreign Office, examines the consequences of such a polarization of expertise in this study of the tension between the prevailing doctrines of NATO strategy and the realities of politics in Germany. His plan of presentation can be understood only in terms of his attempt to bring together two disparate universes of discourse. Part I surveys West German foreign policy from 1949 through 1963. Analyses of the Soviet challenge to the West and of Soviet strategic doctrines follow (Part II) and then a more ramified and factual consideration of NATO strategy (Part III). Thereupon the author reverts to a chronological account, this time of "The Berlin Crisis" as intensified in 1958-60 and continued in 1961-62, albeit in a drastically altered nuclear power context (Part IV). It is thus that the stage is set for a concluding appraisal of West Germany's relations with its Western allies and policy suggestions designed to allay the tension between the abiding concern of the Germans with reunification and the Anglo-American desire for détente.

Here the argument can be summarized only sketchily. Adenauer's foreign policy was consistently determined by security considerations due to the exposed position and war-weariness of the German people. Reunification, always secondary to avoidance of war and paradoxically ill-defined in the popular mind in regard to the land east of the Oder-Neisse line, became in the fifties and will remain a politically irrelinquishable goal for the Federal Republic. While variations in intensity have occurred, the ideological commitments and political objectives of the USSR and the USA remain unchanged. The fundamental changes have taken place in the nature and relative scope of the striking power of these two super-powers. Whereas in the first post-war decade the Soviet Union was in a position to over-run Western Europe with conventional forces and the Americans depended for response on a monopoly and then a preponderance of nuclear weapons, the ensuing years found the USSR able to threaten Europe with nuclear destruction and even to bring the USA within the range of its nuclear striking power.

As a result of these developments, the issue context within which Western responses to the threats and challenges of the late fifties and early sixties were discussed was such that, particularly in NATO circles, considerations of nuclear strategy seemed at least to take priority over reunification and even over German security. The Federal Republic, which alone among the Western allies has formally committed itself to refrain from the manufacture of atomic, biological and chemical weapons and to accept full NATO command over its armed forces, found itself in the position of a pressure group rather than that of a full partner in the semi-public debates over matters involving the future form of existence and even the physical survival of the German people. Political leaders and public alike came to be affected mainly by the fall-out from these discussions most often in the form of leaks and rumors. In particular, plans for disengagement which eroded confidence in deterrant power of American military support and strategies which contemplated a conventional war in Europe as a kind of cushion to delay or even to evade a resort to nuclear exchanges impinged drastically on the sensibilities of a highly exposed people.

In the context of the situation as he saw it at the end of 1963, Richardson concluded that the balance of advantage for the Western powers lay in maintaining West Germany's willing partnership in the Atlantic community and that continued support for German reunification was a necessary, even though not a sufficient, means to that end. While questions may be raised as to his interpretation of the evidence available to him when he made his study, even more important are those as to whether subsequent events have undermined his assumptions and rendered his proposals obsolete. But, even if his book may be judged as only an epilogue, his effort to bring together the divergent universes of political and strategic discourse merits attention from the inhabitants of both worlds.—Charles B. Robson, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

The Politics of the Common Market. By W. Hart-Ley Clark. (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1967. Pp. xi, 180. $4.95.)

However muddy the waters of European integration may appear, the institutions of the European Communities have continued to develop and the political patterns surrounding them have grown in complexity. Recent decisions have influenced not only the policies of the European Economic Community, the European Coal Community and Euratom, but also the structure and role of these organizations and their component elements. Change of even greater importance can be expected in the next few years. These events are of immediate interest to political scientists concerned with European politics and with theories of integration. A number of books and articles are available to provide a background for observing this shifting pattern. To take a few examples, Leon Lindberg's excellent study The Political Dynamics of European Economic Integration, published in 1963, is still highly relevant and has been made more valuable by Lindberg's more recent articles; Miriam Camps' several works in this area all serve to clarify positions taken by actors as they moved toward major decisions; and the articles in the April-July 1967 issue of Government and Opposition highlight various aspects of politics and decision making in the Communities.

In addition to works such as these, books of a more basic nature have appeared. These are largely directed toward courses on international relations and European government and are designed to provide a brief descriptive introduction to the structure and politics of the Communities. Although varying greatly in quality, the books in this category face similar problems. Their brevity works against a nuanced and detailed exposition, and they run the risk that certain specific information will be rapidly outdated.

It is in this context that Professor Clark's book is to be considered. Writing before the Treaty fusing the executive of the three Communities was ratified, he attempts to introduce not only the formal structure of the E.E.C., but the relationships between its component elements as they have developed. He presents a chapter on each of the components-the Council, the Commission, the Commission's growing administration, the European Parliament and the Court of Justice. These are complemented by chapters on interest groups and public opinion in the Communities, on relationships between the E.E.C. and other states and on implications for world and European politics. Within the limitations which he has set for himself, Professor Clark has provided a useful introduction; many of the criticisms one could make would be directed more toward the limitations than what was done within them.

Yet there are criticisms to be made. Many statements in the book are too strong or potentially misleading, even when accompanied by qualifications. One is struck by such assertions as, "The Council has done more to unify Europe than any other institution in the history of the Continent." In other places Professor Clark presents good material in such a manner as to lessen its effect. For example, the discussion of public opinion contains valuable information, but could easily confuse students; and in concluding that E.E.C.'s economic regulations may have broad effects on attitude, Professor Clark makes a meaningful point; but the conclusion is scarcely strengthened by the statement, "Women's fashions and the format of women's magazines is already 'unified,' for instance, as is the European taste in toys." There are also statements of questionable relevance to the current situation. For example, in view of the fact that the Parliament has never exercised its power to remove the Commission, and is unlikely to do so in the near future, Professor Clark is not directing students toward central political problems when he says, "There is a crying need for at least some provision for the dissolution of Parliament by the Commission if the removal power is used too often."

More seriously, discussions of certain points are less complete than they need be, even in a brief book. Disproportionate attention is given relatively unimportant subjects to the detriment of more important matters. By drastically reducing such sections as the four-page discussion of the location of a permanent European capital, the author could give more attention to other problems. The book would benefit from a clearer picture of the actual politics of the Communities. One possibility would be a more extensive discussion of the Commission's power base. In this, the various references to the 1965-66 crisis could be drawn together to illustrate better the interactions between the Commission and the member states. (And with regard to the crisis one might question Professor Clark's tendency to minimize its effects.) One could make a similar request for more focus in discussions of all the Community components and better integration of the parts.

In conclusion, The Politics of the Common Market does not say anything particularly new about the European Communities and does not provide as much information as it could and it should. However it is a useful introduction and is better than other attempts of its kind. It serves to illustrate the need for more and better classroom materials dealing with the substance of politics in the European Communities.—Robert L. Peterson, The University of Iowa.

Arms Control for the Late Sixties. Ed. By James E. Dougherty and J. F. Lehman, Jr. (Princeton, New Jersey: D. Van Nostrand Company, 1967. Pp. xlvii, 265. $8.50.)

The publication in book form of the papers delivered at a symposium invariably involves problems of focus, coherence, and differential quality. When the topic is arms control, additional questions arise, such as whether the book is already fatally dated and who is supposed to find the book useful. This book, which is the product of a symposium held in April 1966, manifests these problems in a conspicuous manner.

As for focus, there is little. Five complicated topics are discussed: NATO and arms control; ballistic missile defense (BMD); arms control in Soviet and Chinese strategy; nuclear proliferation; and limited war and international peacekeeping. However interrelated arms control issues may be, this is an ambitious undertaking and one wonders how much any mortal is supposed to absorb and retain about, for example, such an abstruse conundrum as BMD when his attention is turned shortly thereafter to the equally murky problem of nuclear proliferation. These topics offer nearly unlimited opportunities for such fecund minds as contributors Edward Teller, Hedley Bull, and Herman Kahn, but I would relish the opportunity to give an examination on just who said what and why to a group of professional political scientists or strategists who had just read the book or heard the papers. It is, in my opinion, just too huge a canvas for either a symposium or

Of course, it is possible to attend only part of a conference or read only selected chapters of a book, especially one of this sort. But are the topical chapters coherent? That is, do the various contributors to a given chapter address the same basic questions or do they merely speak past each other? The chapter on BMD comes off fairly well in this regard, the one on nuclear proliferation slightly better, and the rest hardly at all. With a few exceptions, the papers were quite obviously prepared without reference to each other. There apparently was a felt need for more coherence because the last three articles come under the heading of "Comments on Preceding Papers." But of those assigned this unenviable task, only Klaus Knorr made any serious effort to accomplish it.

In the field of arms control, standards of appraisal regarding quality vary as much or more as in any other field of political studies; and any reviewer's judgments are bound to be somewhat arbitrary. By nearly any respectable standard, however, there are some excellent articles among the 29 in this book. Moreover, they do not reflect any particular approach or set of assumptions. There was an obvious and successful effort to bring together different-sometimes radically differentperspectives and sets of assumptions. The contributors range from Kenneth Boulding to Edward Teller: most of the categories defined in Robert A. Levine's brilliant The Arms Debate' are represented. (Whatever its merits, however, this eclecticism contributes significantly to the problems of focus and coherence noted above.) On various and conflicting sides of the BMD debate, Joseph I. Coffey, Richard B. Foster and Jeremy J. Stone argue brilliantly; James R. Schlesinger's well-known position on nuclear proliferation is cogently presented and contrasted explicitly with that of Hedley Bull; Herman Kahn puts on still another dazzling display, complete with the expected scenarios, policy desiderata, sweeping assertions and audacious presciptions; and Lincoln P. Bloomfield contributes a thoughtful, tentative essay on the control of local conflicts. It could also be argued that while their contributions were, of course, not designed to be scholarly contributions, the politicized speeches of a retired French Colonel, a German politician, and an Indian diplomat add a welcome reminder of the harsh political world with which the learned essays are allegedly dealing. Similarly, William Kintner sets forth in a clear and forceful essay what is almost certainly a set of dominant attitudes in the American military today.

Perhaps all arms control essays should be published as magazine articles or pamphlets. Technology and policy march inexorably on and the only kind of arms control writing that remains fresh after publication between hard covers is of the rather more abstract, speculative sort. Not long after this book was published, for example, the United States and the Soviet Union each began to move with apparent determination toward the deployment of a BMD, there was a Soviet-American agreement on a non-proliferation treaty draft, and it became known that the United States would very likely develop an anti-satellite missile system. A new symposium would have plenty to talk about, but it is less clear that its deliberations would look especially good in print a couple of years later.

¹ Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1963.

Finally, there is the question of whom this book is designed for. Most specialists will have read the more important of the articles long ago. Other prospective readers will run into the problems noted above. In a profession surfeited with unread books, this one will probably join the majority despite the importance of its subject matter and the high quality of many of its articles.—WILLIAM P. GERBERDING, University of California, Los Angeles.

The Quest for Peace Through Diplomacy. By Ste-PHEN D. KERTESZ. (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1967. Pp. x, 182. $4.95.)

This short book by the distinguished diplomat and scholar Stephen D. Kertesz is a review of some of the recent post-World War II developments in the practice of diplomacy. After two short introductory chapters, the author analyses certain aspects of Soviet diplomacy and while revealing a subtle attachment to the notion of "protracted conflict," he does hold out the hope that "Soviet diplomacy might adopt a more cooperative policy."

In the main portion of the book, Dr. Kertesz attempts to describe and to analyze what he calls "the new forms and methods of diplomacy." There is much helpful material in these chapters. Students uninitiated to a study of international organizations can learn the basic composition of the specialized agencies of the UN, the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, the Council of Ministers of the European Economic Community and the various European parliaments. A fairly extensive analysis of the organization, structure and operation of NATO occupies two chapters of the book.

Overall, the approach reveals a distinctly European bias. From this analysis one would have to conclude that non-Western diplomats have nothing to add to the study of post-World War II diplomacy. Even the implications for Western diplomacy of the present revolutionary environment are not fully explored. The author has chosen to concentrate his effort on the new forms of diplomatic activity which have emerged in Western Europe. A full analysis of post-war diplomacy would demand far more than this. The difficulty with the book, on its own terms, is that there is too much description and too little analysis. There is no explicit theoretical framework which would allow the student to generalize new hypotheses or conclusions about the nature of such new diplomatic activity. Some questions worth exploration in respect to the activity of diplomats in various European organizations would be-What is the impact of these new environments on the attitudes and actions of the diplomats themselves? What means are used by governments in dealing with each other in the context of international organizations? and How do these means differ from those used traditionally? Neither is there any concerted effort to build on the work of other theorists such as Morgenthau, Ilke and others. Further, an analysis of the way in which the use of force as a means of advancing national interests has been affected by the existence of such international organizations would have been worthwhile.

Professor Kertesz firmly believes that NATO is still essential to the West. He says at one point "the Soviet threat to all NATO members is the primary reason for the alliance." He writes of the French disenchantment with NATO but argues for a revived and strengthened organization, concluding "the time has come for European states to make a decision about their aspirations, a choice about their role in world affairs. No outside nation can decide the issues for them."

The book, in summary, is a description of some of the basic structures and procedures of a variety of Western-oriented international organizations. The implication seems to be that certain new diplomatic techniques learned in these contexts might be transferred to a more universal context. However, this is never argued explicitly, nor is there any effort to generalize about these new techniques. Professor Kertesz at times seems to imply that traditional diplomacy is on the way out and that the diplomacy of the international organization is the wave of the future, and yet this point is not clearly developed at the conceptual level. The chief thrust of the book seems to be from a traditional cold war perspective. On the other hand, in the final chapter, the author does call for a common attack on common problems by all governments. It would appear that if valid patterns of interaction among Western powers are established, then the Communist world will inevitably be won over to the view that, in unity, men can achieve a more peaceful world.-Louis F. BRAKEMAN, Denison University.

Diplomatic Investigations: Essays in the Theory of International Politics. Ed. By Herbert Butterfield and Martin Wight. (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1966. Pp. 227. $6.25.)

This volume of essays on the theory of international politics will receive a mixed but predictable reaction from American scholars. Those who seek to discern through the study of history patterns of international relations, who believe that normative considerations are appropriate in the study of international relations, and who are not singularly devoted to the establishment of broad gauge theories of international relations will find the volume fruitful and stimulating. Those who are interested in the "scientific" study of international relations and the systematic development and verification of explanatory and predictive theories will find the volume does not measure up to their goals. In other words the authors pursue a traditional or classical approach to the study of international relations. This approach is highlighted by M. Wight in his provocative essay, "Why is There No International Theory?" with his statement that he perceives "international theory" to mean ". . . a tradition of speculation about relations between states, a tradition imagined as the twin of speculation about the state to which the name 'political theory' is appropriated." There is no mention in the essays of general systems theory, game theory, simulation, or the quantification of international activities.

In its origin and purpose, the volume is the British companion to Theoretical Aspects of International Relations edited by William T. R. Fox. Unlike some contemporary American scholars, the six essayists discuss theories of international politics and not theories about international relations as a discipline of study. Their primary concern is the analysis of the nature of the international society and the theories that attempt to explain the behavior of that society. This analysis involves the study of international law and the study of diplomatic history.

Although their conceptual approach will be challenged, the authors have produced a stimulating volume with the essays maintaining a consistently high level of quality. The essay by M. Wight, "The Balance of Power," is a valuable analysis of the notions of the balance of power and the analytical ambiguity that attends the use of the concept. The two essays by Hedley Bull, "Society and Anarchy in International Relations." and "The Grotian Conception of International Society," and the one by M. Wight, "Western Values in International Relations," are solid discussions of the inter-relation between international law and international society. Bull concentrates on the question, found in many classical writings in international law, whether the international society tends toward an international community or whether it is a Hobbesian state of nature. M. Wight discusses the maintenance of order in the international society and the phenomenon of intervention as a means for the maintenance of that order. Of the essays only two do not concentrate on historical material. Of these, the essay, "Threats of Force in International Relations," written by G. F. Hudson in 1961 provides, with the advantage of hindsight, a brilliant forecast of Khrushchev's rationale for the missile venture in Cuba.

Within the framework of their analysis, the authors present quality contributions to the study of international relations. That some may not fully agree with the framework does not deny the quality of the contributions.—Low C. Piper, University of Maryland.

The Politics of American Foreign Aid. By MI-CHAEL KENT O'LEARY. (New York: Atherton Press, 1967. Pp. 172. $5.95.)

One ordinarily expects that a foreword written by someone other than the author of a book will be quite laudatory, but a reviewer could scarcely improve on the prefacing tribute by Professor Harold Karan Jacobson in pointing toward the strong points of this book by Professor O'Leary: "Even if it did not fill such an important need, the book would deserve commendation for its grace and humor, its obvious scholarship, its skillful blend of quantitative and nonquantitative techniques of analysis." O'Leary capped diligent and imaginative research with a refreshingly light literary touch. As Jacobson noted, he endeavored to combine traditional and newer analytical perspectives within a single framework. I especially admired his effort to show how recent American foreign aid policies stem in part from what O'Leary indicates as deep-seated "general traits in the American political culture" (p. 9) going back to the origins of the nation. Yet, the end result was somehow not altogether satisfying, and here it ought to be conceded immediately that disappointment is always a function of expectations. Therefore, the perceived problems are probably a consequence of this reviewer's unfulfilled hopes rather than any inadequacies on the author's part. Perhaps, too, the problems are associated with the fact that O'Leary was allowed only 135 pages of actual text in which to treat an enormously complex subject. Finally, there may be yet another partial explanation for the nature of the overall result, but I will hold that for my concluding comment in order initially to suggest why certain aspects of the emphases in this book in the absence of other considerations present a somewhat troublesome picture of the large subject indicated by the book's title.

The first problem which one might cite is an implicit model of the American political process with the Congress as an almost exclusive focal point. O'Leary devotes the first 88 of his 135 pages to an analysis of public opinions and moods—or, more broadly, "the perceptions and judgments of broad elements of the public" (p. 9)—and how all of these may conceivably be related to "congressional responses." When on page 89 he turns to the Executive Branch and says that the "history of foreign aid is principally the history of policy initiatives taken by the President and his advisers," it makes one wonder whether the history of foreign aid is something wholly apart from the politics of foreign aid. In any case, the title of the chapter beginning on page 89 is "The Executive as Organizer of Attitudes," and the emphasis quickly shifts back to Congress as the focal point around which are configurations of forces the most important of which are public opinions to some extent shaped by presidential actions. It may be useful, in light of the many studies in recent years emphasizing the President and the Executive Branch as the key focus of the political process from which American foreign policy emerges, to have a study that puts the spotlight on the Congress. Yet, even in this connection one might have hoped for somewhat more explicit linkages between the empirical findings of this book and some of the theoretical models of the legislative process formulated in the past decade, not to mention linkages to models of Executive Branch behavior and to models which attempt to relate domestic and international politics.

A second and related problem has to do with an occasional gap between data and conclusions. For example, all of the earlier pages devoted to ways in which public opinion polls and congressional votes can be cut, dried and assessed suddenly appear to have been a diverting but essentially irrelevant playing around with numbers when one finally reads on page 125 that "Until 1963, the chief opponent of foreign aid, Congressman Passman, was so well entrenched in his subcommittee that attempts at political persuasion were a waste of time."

A third difficulty is the relative inattention to trend data. For example, a parenthetical aside on pages 7-8 notes that "the magnitude [of foreign aidl has declined from about 2 per cent of the Gross National Product in 1946 to about one-half of one per cent of the GNP in 1966," but this item of information is not mentioned again nor related to any of the other data or conclusions. In a paragraph on page 23 there is first a reference to a poll in 1959, then back to a poll in 1949, and then forward again to a survey in 1965, as if bits of evidence were picked up wherever they could be found and then scrambled into a conclusion. On page 116 we learn that "Between 1959 and 1963, five special studies of foreign aid were requested by the President," and on page 117 it is noted that the U.S. foreign aid agency has been reorganized and renamed eight times since World War II, but neither of these sets of time-sequential events is further explored with an eye toward suggesting whether they embodied any trends or changes in the politics of American foreign aid.

One is left with the overall impression that American foreign aid policy and politics since World War II is a crazy-quilt subject about which one can say a great deal but from which one can conclude very little in the way of clearcut sets of interrelated patterns. O'Leary himself seems to concede as much when he writes in his conclusion (p. 128): "The twenty-year record of postwar American foreign aid policy is sufficiently vast and complex to provide the observer with evidence for almost any verdict he desires. . . . Judgment of American performance depends upon a baffling calculus . . ." But perhaps it was precisely O'Leary's purpose to reveal this baffling set of circumstances, to hold up a mirror to the events of two decades and to reflect how little sense a pattern-searching behaviorial scientist can make of them. If this was in fact his purpose, he succeeded admirably, and this book is strongly recommended for use as a text in undergraduate and graduate courses for at least three purposes:(1) first, for the wealth of data and bibliographical references; (2) second, for a demonstration of the limits of presently available analytical techniques: (3) third, as a challenge to new generations of students to improve on these techniques. Professor O'Leary in the judgment of this reviewer is one of the ablest younger political scientists at work today, and perhaps what one really ought to say in conclusion here is that any perceived shortcomings in this book are primarily an indication of continuing inadequacies in our arsenal of analytical techniques rather than a criticism of the author. -VINCENT DAVIS, University of Denver.

Imperial America: The International Politics of Primacy. By George Liska. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. 115. $2.25.)

In this second of the Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research's Studies in International Affairs, George Liska calls for a fundamental change in our view of the international system and provides, for those who accept his conceptualizations, an attractive blueprint for American global domination.

He has developed a theory of a unifocal empire-oriented international system—unifocal in that it centers on the United States as the world's pre-eminent imperial power, and empire-oriented in that no effective world organization exists. With only one dominant power, the unifocal system is bipolar or multipolar in appearance only, but it does possess multistate and multipolar characteristics.

Liska first outlines the characteristics and aspects of imperial systems. He draws from a wide range of past empires and his abundant, albeit cryptic, historical references. The contemporary world is analyzed within this framework. Imperial America has its conceptual roots, not in recent colonial endeavors such as the British Empire, but in historic superstates, especially the Roman Empire.

In these terms, an empire "is a state exceeding other states in size, scope, salience, and sense of task." This is Liska's America—indeed, a superstate, but certainly more than a great power in a state system. It is an empire in an imperial system whose interests are coterminous with the international system. It is both globally paramount over all other states and primarily responsible for maintaining at least a minimum world order.

In this unifocal system, world order or equilibrium is to be maintained, not by any simulated balance between the superpowers, but rather by diverse U.S. policies toward regional areas. The United States would progressively reduce its military, economic and political involvement in Europe. It also would encourage a reformation of this sub-system under Soviet Union domination.

America could not delegate leadership in Afro-Asia or in the Western Hemisphere, where, in contrast with Europe, military force still is the critical instrument of influence and control. A regional balance system is not operative in these areas nor do the involved nations recognize a paramount regional power (not even China in Asia). As a result, America must undertake carefully calculated policies, not designed to achieve domination or containment, but to maintain international order. Extreme forms of local behavior which have external implications would be curbed. A wide spectrum of intervention may be necessary, ranging from intimation of intent to direct, but non-excessive, military sorties. To achieve its objectives, the U.S. would use a variety of instruments-access into friendly lands, traditional statecraft, multilateral associations, economic aid, political-military alliances, and military force.

Liska contends that the world now is moving into this "newly emerging constellation of power and order." Vietnam, which he calls America's first imperial war, is given as a dramatic example. The conflict is not to be justified in the usual official way, e.g., preserve independent peoples or contain Chinese communism. Rather Vietnam is merely one unpleasant aspect of America's role as global, imperial policeman. Liska views Vietnam as a police action which may have to be repeated in comparable situations until another imperial or universal power appears. He believes that Vietnam still may prove to have been an ideal operation for training our new imperial-type political-military establishment and in educating the American people to the hard facts of the new Americandominated unifocal system.

Liska is not a conventional interventionist or imperialist; he is far too wise to succumb to such American phobias as the anti-communist crusade or to the traditional Pax Americana. In this book, he enhances his reputation as one of the brightest commentators on international politics. If one accepts his imperial, unifocal theme, it is difficult to conceive of a more articulate and tightly-reasoned analysis.

Still, a successful imperial America must adhere to Liska's well-defined guidelines and must accept his goal of world order (not expanded empire). Is such wisdom to be found among Washington imperialists? However, a more basic criticism centers on the validity of his premise of American imperial supremacy.

It would be unfair to say that Liska looks upon America as a global messiah, the Lord's agents on earth. Yet, his imperial America assumes an American mission and supremacy which critics may find not only chilling but illusory and based on assorted misconceptions. A few questions illustrate this point. In the nuclear age, is not the Soviet Union functionally on a competitive superpower level with the United States? Does not geography alone place China, though no military giant, in the position of No. 1 Asian power? Would not the Afro-Asian and Latin American lesser powers be restive recipients of imperial largesse? Can the United Nations be summarily dismissed? Is Vietnam really more than a tragic blunder? Could not global order be best achieved through developing cooperation by diverse centers of policy and power?

The core question is whether world order really depends on the U.S. as global empire policeman. Liska's book should be read for the affirmative argument and for its contribution to the expanding dialogue on the nature of the international system and of America's role in the operation of that system.—CLIFTON E. WILSON, University of Arizona.

Economic Policies Toward Less Developed Countries. By HARRY G. Johnson. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1967. Pp. xvi, 279. $6.75.)

This book is a product of both the 1964 United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) held at Geneva and the author's long experience as an international economist. Its purpose, which unfortunately is not defined before the final chapter, is to "survey the major issues raised by UNCTAD for U.S. policy toward the less developed countries, and to explore the various policy alternatives open to the United States" (p. 241). The book is focused almost exclusively, however, on the role of international trade, and hence the trade policies of the U.S. and other developed nations, as a means to foster economic growth in the developing world. Only minor attention is directed to other economic policy issues.

Professor Johnson is successful in his attempt to write for an audience expanded beyond professional economists in terms of the clarity of his analysis, but non-economists may be discouraged by his failure to define this problem early in the book and to outline his pattern of attack. Political scientists accustomed to the current literature of comparative politics will be struck by the limited reference to individual nations and perhaps either impressed or concerned with economists' ability to treat the economic growth patterns of developing nations as a single variable. He does recognize that planning is ultimately a political process where economic decisions are often made on other than economic grounds (p. 69). Yet, an inclination to ignore political realities crops up throughout the book: "If the United States is to maintain its leadership and fulfill the responsibilities it has assumed to both the developed and the less developed countries, it must evolve some positive new approach to the problems aired at UNCTAD" (p. 238, italics are mine).

UNCTAD provided a ready platform for the developing nations to voice their general dissatisfaction with the system of international trading relationships that has grown under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, leaving the U.S. in an almost isolated position when other developed nations tended to abstain on many votes. We were, Professor Johnson notes, "a lone voice of negation confronting a chorus of hopeful positive suggestions" (p. 7).

Following two introductory chapters on economic growth and development, the book concentrates on barriers to expanded trade imposed by both the developed and the less developed countries. The latter have often contributed to their own plight through the consequences of nationalistic economic policies, their preference for centralized economic planning, an exploitative attitude toward traditional agriculture, a commitment to import substitution, policies of inflation and currency overvaluation, and a general hostility to private investment by foreigners.

The developed nations, on the other hand, erect barriers by their provision of aid in its present bilateral and project-tied forms, their limitations on commodity trade, their tariff and non-tariff restrictions on manufacturers, and their immigration policies. Subsequent chapters explore ways to reduce or mitigate the effects of the barriers erected by the developed nations. Considered are (1) proposals for action within the existing framework, increasing levels of assistance, substituting multilateral for bilateral aid, private foreign investment, and enlarged opportunities within the GATT framework, (2) possible arrangements for trade in primary products, for example the use of international commodity agreements which are not particularly favored by "most" international trade experts, and (3) the possibility of preference in the markets of developed countries for the manufactured goods of the developing nations.

Professor Johnson then jumps to a discussion of international monetary reform, perhaps a more controversial issue than when the book was written. He argues that the less developed countries would benefit from an international monetary system providing a better combination of liquidity and adjustment mechanisms, preferably an internationally controlled central bank. The author concludes his examination of the role of trade in economic development with a series of questions for future research. Apparently economists, like political scientists, have a few mountains yet to climb.—George M. Platt, The University of Iowa.

American Foreign Policy Beyond Utopianism and Realism. By Donald Brandon. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1966. Pp. 295. Paper, $2.95.)

This book is a temperate, well-balanced and on the whole impartial discussion of the political and intellectual driving forces that have shared in shaping the programs and images of United States foreign policy from the unsteady, early years of the post-revolutionary period to the frustrated years of Southeast Asia's trials and tribulations. It is a chronological analysis, with enough glances both forward and backward to keep the text interesting and meaningful for the reader-whether he is a beginning student or a reasonably well-read layman on American diplomatic thought, practices and history. Professor Brandon writes, so he tells us (and demonstrates), from the viewpoint of "what has been called the Grand Tradition in political philosophy." The basic premise states that the classical and humanist values of the Judae-Christian seeding rather than the "discredited" Utopian and Realist programs which have plagued our previous history form the relevant foundation of our state's participation in world politics today. Hence his appeal to those who make the final choices for direction is first to test their approaches by broad Western philosophic considerations and then to apply these moral and intellectual reflections to the practical international affairs of the moment.

His Utopian analysis is a factual, lively, articulate discussion in the first few chapters, the last two under the rubric of America's first and second crusades. And, as one would surmise, President Woodrow Wilson and his friends, while treated fairly, are nevertheless outside the Great Tradition. Captain Alfred Mahan's theories and Theodore Roosevelt's sympathetic actions are too realistic for current consideration. The opposite dominant political philosophies are equally analyzed and found wanting for today's needs. A reflection of mood and pace in Brandon's book is demonstrated when he suggests that "Utopian scholars" urged a naive government to be branded "an example of American innocence" without suggesting the application at Nuremberg of the object of scorn, the Pact of Paris of 1927.

The author, in his treatment of America's inescapable problems following World War II, including the heroic attempts in Europe by America to curb the Soviet drive toward its revolutionary goals, reveals more than a dash of latent personal political realism. He concedes that "Realists have performed an invaluable service to the nation by their emphasis upon the reality of power in world affairs. They have done much to overcome the sentimentalism and starry-eyed Utopianism . . ." Nonetheless the United States, in or out of Realism, must recognize that a Pax Americana is out of the question. Without advocating the late Pope John's Pacem in Terris Professor Brandon makes a vigorous but not passionate call for the United States to recognize the continuum of the search for world stability. It means a never-ending search for international cooperation through law and order. He is Aristotlian-he seeks the middle ground. He is a guide to that high ground.

In a book well-written and well-manufactured, Brandon calls not so much for a plague on both extremes, but for prudential doses of each making a blend which will differ problem by problem and era by era. And he offers guidance towards finding the formulae. It is a worthy book for practitioner and student alike.—John T. Holden, University of New Hampshire.

Between Two Worlds. By JOHN HOHENBERG. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Published for the Council on Foreign Relations. Pp. xiii, 507. $8.95.)

This is an important book, especially for those of us who believe that a political system derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. As the subtitle indicates, the main thrust of the book is upon "Policy, Press, and Public Opinion in Asian-American Relations." The author, John Hohenberg, who is now a professor of journalism at Columbia University, was a professional newsman for some twenty-five years. In 1963, he and his wife spent six months traveling more than 12,000 miles through seven Asian countries, and everywhere they went they talked more or less informally with many different people about the role of the press (including radio and television) in forming public opinion and influencing public policy. In 1964, Hohenberg and his wife return Asia to conduct a more systematic survey; viewing over a period of four months more 300 persons, including heads of state, foreign isters, American diplomats, foreign correspond university professors and students. They also lected nearly a hundred questionnaires American reporters in Asia that provided a m lany of information about the work of foreign respondents; on their return to the states the culated similar questionnaires among Asian, ish, French, and other foreign corresponder the United States. In 1965 and 1966, unde auspices of the Council on Foreign Relations with the assistance of various organizations ested in the dissemination of news to and Asia, including the Department of State United States Information Agency, and mer of the Washington press corps, Hohe amassed an impressive amount of data or conduct and content of communications "bet two worlds."

The author regards the exchange of ("which includes ideas and opinions") betwee United States and Asia "a political act." He i however, an empirical political scientist; me ology is not his primary consideration no forte; he makes no pretensions to scientifi guiry and does not even claim to be objective the contrary, he freely expresses his own opi and offers his personal value judgments thre out the text; but this is precisely what make analysis both authentic and authoritative. deeply involved and concerned with the releof foreign correspondence to foreign policy, p ularly as it affects American-Asian relations describes his work as "a study in argument ar versity, in the sometimes frightening cacopho a democratic society." As he perceives it, th teraction of journalism and diplomacy takes in a framework of "historic conflict." Althous treats the contestants on both sides with sy thy and understanding, quite obviously he more sympathy and more understanding fo journalists than for the public officials.

The book is difficult to review, for its scor cludes all of Asia, with specific chapters on Restless Japanese," "Red China's Shadow," "Ithe Asian Perimeter" ("Korea: The Forg Front," "Okinawa: The Billion Dollar Base," Changing Philippines," "The Voices of Taiw "South Asia" (India and India's neighbors), of course, "The War in Viet Nam." The chon Viet Nam stands out, perhaps because it most timely; it is a detailed and devastatin tique of "public diplomacy," management of news not only by government officials, high low, by also by publishers and editors, who is determine what Asian peoples know about

United States and what the American people know about Asians. Significantly, the chapter on Viet Nam opens with a cautiously critical discussion of the President's role as "newsmaker"; but the chapter ends with an accolade for the Viet Nam correspondents on whose reports the American people depend for information and for "a true interpretation of the course of events."

A great many names, more American than Asian, clutter the text: the index is virtually a roll call of the newsmen, newspapers, and public officials who have had some part in weaving the tangled web of communications between Asia and the United States since World War II. (The Appendix includes a tabulation of specific information about nearly a hundred foreign correspondents, age, nationality, organization, education, language facility, overseas experience, etc.) Despite too much detail, too many undigested and sometimes irrelevant statistics, and too much repetitious trivia, the overall analysis comes through quite clearly: the obstacles newsmen encounter in getting adequate and accurate information from public officials; the problems foreign policy-makers experience in securing cooperation of the press in engineering consent of the governed; the difficulties both face in persuading publishers and editors, especially in the hinterland, to let the people know what is going on in the world; and the credibility gap which leaves the people anxious to get at the truth but skeptical of even the most reliable sources. As we said, this is an important book, contributing to our understanding of the nerves of public diplomacy that stimulate the messages and convey the responses "between two worlds" which in effect constitute Asian-American relations.-MARIAN D. IRISH, American University.

Hacia America Latina Democratica e Integrada. By Romulo Betancourt. (Caracas, Venezuela: Editorial Senderos, 1967. Pp. 212.)

Since retiring from the presidency of Venezuela early in 1964, Romulo Betancourt has spent most of his time in Europe. There he has been working on a series of books setting forth his ideas on a wide range of subjects and recounting the history of Venezuela's experience with social reform and rapid economic development under the aegis of political democracy over which he presided for five years. The present volume is the first of these several volumes to appear in print.

Betancourt is best known as a doer. However, he is also a thinker, a man of ideas, with a notable capacity for expressing these ideas in sharp and readable prose. The volume under review is evidence of this fact.

This book is concerned principally with two of the major problems facing Latin America: the conflict between democracies and dictatorships, and the need of the area for economic and eventual political unity. Betancourt has long been an advocate of both democracy and Latin American unification.

In the first part of this book, Betancourt goes into considerable detail to defend the policy established by his government in 1959-64 of not extending diplomatic recognition to any Latin American government which had come to power through unconstitutional means, a policy which has been continued by his successor, Raul Leoni. He presents interesting details of correspondence which he had as President of Venezuela concerning this problem with chiefs of state of other American countries, including the presidents of Argentina, Costa Rica and Mexico, and President John F. Kennedy. He also defends the policy against various kinds of criticism to which it has been subjected.

Betancourt also deals with other aspects of the problems facing democracy in the hemisphere. These include a discussion of the Fidelista campaign to foment guerrilla wars against democratic regimes, and an essay on the United States intervention in the Dominican Republic in 1965. The latter includes interesting details, hitherto unpublished, on an attempted mediation of the Dominican civil war by Betancourt Jose Figueres and Luis Munoz Marin.

Betancourt is also concerned with united Latin American efforts for economic development of the area. In one chapter, he deals with the goals and accomplishments of the Alliance for Progress; in another he argues in favor of economic unity of Latin America as well as trade preferences for the area by industrial countries and international price stabilization agreements for key Latin American exports, as part of the answer to the region's economic problems.

This book is valuable not only for the arguments presented in the body of the volume. It is also of interest because it reprints several key speeches on Latin American affairs which Betancourt has made during the last two decades, and because of the publication for the first time of important private correspondence between Betancourt and other leading hemispheric figures when he was President of Venezuela.—Robert J. Alexander, Rutgers University.

Beyond Vietnam: The United States and Asia. By EDWIN O. REISCHAUER. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf 1967. Pp. 242. $4.95.)

Vietnam Triangle: Moscow, Peking, Hanoi. By Donald S. Zagoria. (New York: Pegasus Press, 1967. Pp. xiv. 278.)

Both these books are interesting and thoughtprovoking. Reischauer quickly claims that his book is not about Vietnam, but is more generally concerned with American-Asian relations. This is true if one is accustomed to thinking in mail-slot terms, but false in the larger sense, for the book places Vietnam in its proper Asian setting. Though Reischauer, former American Ambassador to Japan, escapes from the geographic confines of Vietnam, one soon comes to realize that any such escape is academic, for what has happened in Vietnam colors the acts, thoughts and decisions of America, as well as those of Asian nations. Well along in the book the author acknowledges that American frustrations coming from Vietnam could create a new "occident-centered neo-isolationism,' which he sees as a disaster second only to a nuclear war itself.

In pointing out the choices facing the United States in Vietnam Reischauer, reflects an admittec gloom. Honest negotiations cannot be counted on and the alternatives are major escalation, which would wreck our relationship with most of the rest of Asia, and withdrawal, which would be a defeat that would have catastrophic psychological and political effects in the other Asian nations and intensify the already existing instability throughout the area. The remaining alternative is to continue if in a more flexible manner, the present policy Historical hindsight is used to present the argument that the present situation need not have developed, but that it resulted from a series of decisions by four presidents. The always present alternative has been the acceptance of a united nationalistic, Communistic Vietnam. Acceptance earlier is shown as not having been a threat to our international interests, possibly even enhancing it. A point of no return was reached in 1965 when massive troops were committed by the United States. That the four presidents had academic and theoretic choice is true, but whether they had real choices is debatable. For though Reischauer constantly points out what would have been the results in the international sphere if certain decisions had been taken, he does not apply the same approach to the domestic scene. A weakness in this book is the failure to properly develop the effects of various alternatives on domestic politics.

Healthy references are made to the vastness of United States power. This vast power is a handicap, for any sudden change in attitude would have serious effects upon other, friendly, nations. We can only change gradually. Analogies between contemporary Asia and an earlier, less developed Europe are challenged and pointed to as a major source of misconceptions about Asia. America must also begin to think of long-term solutions, and not merely of day-to-day policies. These long-term problems facing us in Asia reflect the disproportionate emphasis upon Vietnam; America must think through its goals in Asia and create the appropriate plans for accomplishment, and we must escape from much of the present oversimplifications. To accomplish this, meaningful coordinating mechanisms must be developed, starvation of the State Department must end, and freedom from traditional concepts of diplomacy must be achieved. In reality, the solution to the world problem, as well as to its Asian aspect, lies in reeducation, re-thinking, and the development of a greater appreciation of the world as a whole.

Reischauer's book has a detailed table of contents and several excellent maps. There is no bibliography, and much of the material is based upon his personal experience of the diplomatic world. Due in part to the organization of the book one finds a degree of repetition. This, however, tends to reinforce certain themes which may well need repetition. On the whole, the book is invaluable both to the average person who has not already irreversibly made up his mind on the area and to those perhaps more astute, who will find themselves re-evaluating certain aspects of their Asian views. It gives good, but blessedly short, historical data, and avoids the fruitless legalistic arguments. I strongly recommend this book.

Zagoria's book is a scholarly work which is easy and pleasant to read. The five chapters total 136 pages, and the remaining 142 pages consist of extensive appendixes, sources, and a short index. The main purpose of the work, admirably carried out, is to give the reader a real grasp of the complexities and differences between the three Communist protagonists in relation to the Vietnam struggle. Conflicting elements, especially within Peking and Hanoi, are clearly brought forward, and the constant interrelation with Washington is most valuable. Zagoria's approach utilizes "Kremlinology"-the reading of various pronouncements of the Communist leaders and comparison thereof. This is connected to the global relationship of the three nation states. While admitted disadvantages are noted by the author, one cannot but help be impressed by the way in which he has handled the materials. What could have been a dull, lifeless work turns out to be rather fascinating and dynamic in both scope and approach. The thought, reasoning processes and evidence are impressive. In addition, Zagoria gives a very interesting analysis of the relationship between Hanoi and the National Liberation Front, explaining why Hanoi is not over-anxious to negotiate, and criticizing the policy of escalation. The author's position is moderate, rational, and well thought out, resulting in a worthwhile book.—George G. Bauroth, St. Vincent College.

Abuse of Power. By Theodore Draper. (New York: The Viking Press, 1966. Pp. vii, 244. $4.95.)

American policy in Vietnam from 1945 to the present is the subject of this volume, which is both an analysis and pointed critique of a war we never intended to fight. Theodore Draper's handling of this subject is uniformly good. He is at his best when assessing the Vietnam conflict within the framework of contemporary American foreign policy. If this book has any drawback, it is that recent preoccupation with this issue inevitably imparts a sense of déjà vue to some of Draper's factual account and criticism of Administration policy.

Based on the assumption that the main instrumentalities of a nation's foreign policy are political, economic, and military, Draper's main thesis is that recent years have witnessed "the suppression of political by military instrumentalities in the conduct of American foreign policy." This point is substantiated by a comparison of U.S. policy in Cuba (1961), the Dominican Republic, and Vietnam, where in each case military force was resorted to following a political failure. This failure in each country resulted from overtly supporting the wrong leader, and particularly in not being sufficiently astute to recognize why he was the wrong man. In Vietnam this pattern of failure is compounded, and "our military position has been strengthened every time the internal political situation has weakened." That the author sees a general pattern existing in the U.S. response to these three policy crises is thought-provoking, although one wonders whether he might have added perspective to his proposition by examining an instance of a successful use of the political instrumentality, such as the relatively flexible and sophisticated policy of the United States in the extended Congo crisis of 1960-63.

The book has a two-sided appeal, polemical and analytical. A committed partisan on the Vietnam issue, Draper has presented a penetrating rebuttal to the Administration's defense of its Southeast Asian policy. The author documents and priticizes the Administration's inability to tolerate ambiguity with regard to issues of nationalism and communism. The "foreign aggression vice civil war" theory, and the gamut of aborted negotiation attempts, are critically evaluated. The Administration's argument that China is the "real" enemy receives predictably rough treatment. On this score Draper documents the rising rate of Russian aid to Vietnam, and can only view in bemused wonder a Government which claims that the "real" enemy has no intention or capability of getting into the war, while at the same time it painfully ignores the main source of Vietnam's support.

However, Draper is more than a polemicist and his policy study suggests insights for the student of international bargaining and conflict behavior. The book offers a good empirical examination of escalation. Not only does it capture the flavor of the policy pronouncements and rationale that accompany the increasing stakes, but it explores the relationship between theory and force, war costs and war aims which occurs as the expenditure of force rises. Theory, says the author, is necessarily escalated with force, which transforms the image of the war into a final confrontation between the West and the proponents of wars of "national liberation." The main effect this has is to reduce flexibility and capacity for policy-making, both on our part and on the part of our opponents.

Most students of public policy today would agree with Senator Richard Russell's pronouncement that "we have made every conceivable blunder" in Vietnam. Let us hope that this unfortunate situation continues to receive the calibre of analysis that Draper's Abuse of Power represents.—Gilbert R. Winham, McMaster University.

Arms Control Arrangements for the Far East. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, Hoover Institution Publications, 1967. Pp. xi, 215. $5.00.)

This is a report produced under contract for the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency by a Hoover Institution Arms Control Project headed by Yuan-Li Wu. The report aims at an objective analysis of arms control and disarmament (ACD) measures and uses the Far East to test a regional approach. The region is defined to include Japan and Taiwan and countries around the Asian rim to India and Pakistan. Communist China, North Korea, and North Vietnam, along with the United States and the Soviet Union, as interested powers, are "extraregional."

Positions of the major outside powers are considered first as a basis for examining regional positions. The basic data are developed from announced positions of the various countries, and are broken down analytically to form charts of considerable length in the appendices. One appendix presents a matrix with 215 analytical items as related to 82 rows of proposals. Small black squares are used to show major power proposals chronologically, and to compare proposals of the United States and the Soviet Union. Another appendix plots bigger black squares for regional attitudes according to degree of enthusiasm for different proposals. Using the matrix, the Hoover team states that 439 questions were answered hypothetically for each of the fifteen countries (Australia and New Zealand being combined as one), giving a total of 6.585 responses. Since this was unmanageable, and slight differences of interpretation might exist, and some countries "if actually put to the test, would probably not take the position we have attributed to them," the questions were grouped and boiled down to 87 (p. 76).

The Hoover team conclude, after the exercise of developing matrices and applying tests to them, that "previous nonregional proposals, regional responses, and regional proposals, give little insight into the content, application, or efficacy of possible ACD arrangements for the Far East," and thus, "the Far East will have to start from scratch" (p. 16). For the Far East, the conclusion is that instead of attacking the most difficult problems, i.e., actual ACD, "it might be better to work for the acceptance and implementation of ACD arrangements that would be relatively simple to achieve" (p. 120). The hope would be that from minor measures would develop positions producing actual ACD.

The text contains material on the region and groupings and a survey of conflicts and tensions, the latter being the basis of a very simple final chart. A final chapter considers the implications for the national interests of the United States.

The charts, upon which the report bases so much of its substance, although simple in form, are not easy to manage. It seems doubtful whether the methodological breakthrough goes beyond playing games on a matrix. A casual remark with respect to the military regimes which exist in almost one half of the regional countries must be noted. They are described often as "one of the best overall tools for reform and progress available to-the nation" (p. 114). That would be a breakthrough, if substantiated.—Dale Pontius, Roosevelt University.

Harry S. Truman and the Russians 1945-1953. By Herbert Druks. (New York: Robert Speller & Sons, 1966. Pp. xii, 219, $7.50.)

This study of the evolution of containment is a useful contribution to the current debate about the origins of the Cold War. Herbert Druks has had access to the papers of most of the principal decision-makers of the Truman administrations and some classified documents of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Additionally, he has canvassed nearly all of the published sources that are relevant to President Truman's statecraft. The resulting treatment is a carefully documented narrative of Truman's major foreign policy decisions during his tenure. Professor Druks' conclusion is that "by raising American foreign policy to a mature level of responsibility, Harry S. Truman became one of the greatest presidents of the United States of America."

Unfortunately the author's conclusion does not follow from his purpose which is to refute partisan charges that President Truman was an "appeaser" or a "warmonger." In this way the reader is provided with two straw men who nearly collapse under their own weight. The book's primary focus is upon the labeling of Truman as an appeaser, and the account of the hypocrisy and unrealism of Republican unilateralist charges from 1948 to 1952 is a familiar and dreary tale.

Nor are there many revelations in the discussion of the formulation of the Truman Doctrine, Marshall Plan, or President Truman's conduct of the Berlin Blockade and the 1948 campaign. In these instances Harry Truman is characterized as combative, decisive and blessed with competent advisers. Contrarily, Stalin is presented as imperialistic, treacherous and a cunning statesman whose "suspicion" of Anglo-American collaboration was a pretext for his diplomatic intransigence. Hence, most of the book is merely a defense of President Truman's risky and costly decisions to contain the Soviet Union and its proxies from 1947 to 1952. The treatment mirrors the conventional American historiography of that phase of the Cold War.

However, the revisionists argue that the Cold War antedates the Truman Doctrine and was prompted by the American principle of self-determination and President Truman's truculent diplomacy borne of the awesome novelty of atomic capability. Gar Alperovitz's Atomic Diplomacy is the most persuasive of the revisionist theories.

Happily, Professor Druks' third chapter, "From Roosevelt to Truman," is the most thoroughly researched section of his book. Although the author concludes that Truman's statecraft of 1945 was a mixture of conciliation, pressure and deterrence with respect to the Russians, much of the evidence cited lends credence to Alperovitz's interpretation. It becomes clear that in spite of the President's initial determination to continue Roosevelt's policy of "friendly firmness" towards the Soviets, there was a shift towards coercion in 1945 as Truman (1) learned of the atomic project the night he became President, (2) was buoyed by the unexpected degree of success of the first atomic test during the Potsdam Conference and (3) realized the psychological efficacy of the use of these weapons at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. It also is evident that the abrupt cancellation of lend-lease to Russia was an attempt to pressure Stalin into accepting the American version of the vague Yalta agreements about the governments of Eastern Europe. Furthermore, President Truman admitted in an interview with Druks in 1962 that the imminent development of the atomic bomb was the rationale for delaying the Fotsdam Conference in spite of British protestations. The author supports the assertion that one reason for dropping the first atomic bomb was to end the war before the pledged Soviet intervention on August 8th. The author also notes that many American military leaders were averse to the new weapon's use because it would be immoral or unnecessary. Finally, President Truman fired Secretaries Byrnes and Wallace primarily because by the end of 1945 he believed that dissuasion and coercion were the appropriate techniques for dealing with the Soviets.

But here ends this book's evidence for Alperovitz's rather Procustean thesis. As Druks points out. President Truman did not reverse Roosevelt's Russian policy. Rather, the new President acted upon Admiral Leahy's account of Roosevelt's growing disenchantment with the Soviet Union's desire to be ringed with Communist regimes. It was not until the stupendous results of the atomic test were known that Truman and his closest advisers decided that Russian intervention in Asia was an unnecessary, rather than a necessary evil. Until that time the President had been counseled to rely upon conventional aerial bombardment and blockade of Japan and a Russian declaration of war that might obviate or cut short the invasion of Kyushu. Furthermore, President Truman bowed to American public opinion in seeking unconditional surrender until the Japanese overtures after the second atomic raid.

Professor Druks' candid account reveals, as one might expect, that there was no prolonged administration conspiracy to demonstrate atomic power to the Soviets no matter the course of the war with Japan. Instead, the atomic bomb became, after July 21, 1954, the deus ex machina that might cause the Japanese to surrender unconditionally before the Soviets intervened and especially before an invasion of Japan. President Truman's early Soviet policy was a series of improvisations and a combination of accommodation, recalcitrance, and threats that have continued to the present. In his brusque way, Harry S. Truman may have hastened the Cold War. But given the American national style, any United States Fresident would have become angered at Soviet perfidy and repression sooner or later and would have led or been led by domestic opinion leaders to resist Soviet expansionism.

Of course the definitive analysis of the Cold War must await the opening of both the American and Soviet archives. Then fuller explanation must be placed within the framework of the national styles, perceptions and objectives of the decision-makers of both states and the interaction of their respective initiatives and capabilities. In the meanwhile, Professor Druks has made an important addition to our understanding of the epochal decision to use atomic weapons and the development of the Cold War.—Lee Denson, United State Air Force Academy.

Soviet Foreign Aid. By Marshall I. Goldman. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. xiv, 265. $8.50.)

As we learn from our first introduction to the treatment of the subject, Dr. Goldman prefers to define Soviet foreign aid rather broadly. In keeping with this preference, he has chosen to include in his geographically oriented survey not only the economic aid extended by the Soviet Union to the countries of the "third world" but also its development assistance to the less industrialized communist countries of Eastern Europe and Asia, He has chosen this particular approach. Dr. Goldman informs us, partly in order to provide some perspective on the evolution of Soviet attitudes and policies toward economically less developed nations since the end of World War II, and in part because, in his words, "certain patterns that were first established in Eastern Europe and China continue to be of significance in the Soviet aid program today."

In the material covered by the first two chapters, which deal with the communist-ruled countries of Eastern Europe and Asia, the reader is presented with detailed information on the specific branches of industry in which the Soviet Union had developed particular capabilities by the end of World War II. He is, therefore, disposed to agree readily with the author that the experience gained in dealing with client countries in the communist camp was in fact indispensable to the future development assistance activities of the government agencies as well as the individual specialists of the U.S.S.R. This previous experience was helpful, first of all, in the sense of providing Soviet personnel with the needed confidence that they will be able to tackle the rather difficult job of transplanting productive capacity of their own manufacture, and the range of operating skills associated with it, into an alien environment and to untrained people speaking a foreign tongue.

In the chapters dealing with the main body of his material, namely the newly developing countries outside the communist camp, Professor Goldman has provided the reader with another useful perspective. He has chosen to examine the record. as well as the impact, of the economic aid programs of the U.S.S.R. in a comparative setting, namely in juxtaposition to the development assistance projects supported by the United States in some of the same countries. To this end, he has introduced into the individual chapters, each devoted to a major recipient area of Soviet economic aid, a judicious amount of economic data, and interpretative comment related to U.S. activities in support of specific development projects in these countries.

Once he has immersed himself in these richly factual and highly readable chapters, the interested reader will continue to be enormously impressed by the industry and patience which Dr. Goldman has brought to his task. In particular, he will find that the author has painstakingly recorded the details of the economic operations which the U.S.S.R. has undertaken in the case of two major recipients, the U.A.R. and India, to whom it has assigned a special place of honor in its foreign aid program. In several instances, in fact, the author has succeeded in enlivening his account by means of a short personal visit to the Soviet-financed projects which he has described. On occasion, too, he has interviewed key officials who play an active role in guiding the assistance programs, or in supervising enterprises under construction.

While unfolding before the reader the record with respect to the two leading client-countries Professor Goldman has chronicled with great patience, and with a degree of dramatic flair, the evolution of some of the more publicized credit transactions between the U.S.S.R. and the recipient countries, detailing the size and capacity of the installations to be erected, and the psychological impact created by the completed enterprise both at home and abroad.

What this reviewer finds somewhat less satisfactory in Dr. Goldman's treatment of the complex subject of Soviet foreign aid is the fact that he has manifested little interest in synthesizing the material he has laboriously assembled into some meaningful analytical findings. As a rule, of course, we are no more justified in quarreling with a man's interest than with his taste. There are, nevertheless, in a study of this importance, a number of points on which the reader has a right to expect the author to confront some of the issues which he himself has raised in the course of positioning his own generalizations. Dr. Goldman has not tried, for example, to offer a valid rationale for the Soviet venture into the costly and unpredictable enterprise of dispensing development aid to non-communist countries that would be sufficiently persuasive to the careful reader. The reader finds himself quite puzzled by the whole massive Soviet undertaking, especially in light of Dr. Goldman's own opinion to the effect that "a successful aid project that strengthens and stabilizes the economy" in a newly developing country is not very helpful to the cause of revolution (p. 199); or that the cause of "communism does not flourish or spread in countries that seem to be solving their economic problems."

On balance, however, this may be a secondary count on which to cavil with a useful book that contains between its two covers a vast amount of factual material on the actual operations of the program of external financial and technical assistance which the Soviet Union has consistently supported since the mid-fifties.—Leon M. Herman, Library of Congress.

The Soviet Union in the World Communist System. By Vernon V. Aspaturian. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, Hoover Institution Publications, 1966. Pp. 96. $1.50.)

Aspaturian's monograph is part of a comprehensive project inaugurated at Stanford University in 1963 to study integration and community building among the fourteen ruling communist-party states. Its predominant ideas may be summarized as follows.

- 1. After the Bolshevik success in 1917, the accomplishments of the Soviet Union and the pronouncements of its leaders were widely regarded as oracular and infallible, and the strategy and tactics of the CPSU came to be a model for successful revolutionary action outside the Soviet Union.
- 2. Lenin and Stalin envisioned their multinational federation as the beginning of a global communist federation. Although subservient relationships between the CPSU and non-ruling parties ensued under Comintern auspices, in time new ruling-party states with particularistic national traditions demanded a rejection of the Soviet Union's Russified Marxism. Perhaps surprisingly, the trend was heralded by Stalin's own failure to sever the Soviet state from its Russian moorings. But in fact, none of Lenin's successors have resolved the special problem of the U.S.S.R. as an arrested universal state, or the contradiction which resulted from "the necessity to be both ethnocentric and ecumenical simultaneously." Thus, instead of being the nucleus of a world communist federation, the U.S.S.R. by 1965 had become "little more than a Russianized socialist multinational state, controlling an East European empire of dependent states."
- 3. Never in history has a state assumed so many "masks." Institutionalized identities include state, party, nation (Russia), and multiple nation (multi-national federation), all of which have led to "political schizophrenia" and more generally to an uncommonly ambiguous Soviet personality. The four identities in turn operate in five political environments: the Soviet social order; the Soviet multinational order; the communist party-state; the general interstate system; and the world communist movement. The result is a "spectrum of internal and external social, political, and ideological constituencies, whose interests impinge upon and influence the behavior of the Soviet Union in its "multiple political roles."
- 4. Not only do Great Russian interests predominate as the chief national input into the Soviet system, but those of the other Soviet nationalities are arranged in an informal hierarchy of priorities. (Here the study would be measurably enhanced if it were to argue and statistically demonstrate this point, rather than assume it. A number of conclusions about preferential treatment are drawn, but without convincing evidence.)

Professor Aspaturian's study is clearly a provocative supplementary piece for college courses. As part of an effort to illuminate integration and community building among Marxist-Leninist states, however, it has a fundamental weakness: it gives much attention to the multinational character of the Soviet Union, and surprisingly little to the roles of Eastern Europe. Even a slight shift in emphasis would help considerably.

For historical, geographical, and political reasons, Eastern Europe is today the only international context amenable to ideological confirmation in support of the Soviet Union-a situation which is somewhat paradoxical in that, faced with system-wide conflicts, the Soviets must ultimately rely upon East European allies where national particularism began in the first place. Significantly, the old one-way relations have long been replaced by an organizational subsystem (COMECON and the Warsaw Treaty Organization), harboring multiple transactions in an atmosphere of mutual dependence and value sharing. Whatever the dynamics of Soviet identities in various operational environments, the primary virtues of the Soviet revolutionary model have really become the promotion of welfare at home, the support of revolution abroad (or in its contemporary form, wars of national liberation), and the development of Marxist-Leninist solidarity among the most advanced ruling-party states of the system. All this means a monumental effort to impart fresh legitimacy to withered dogmas through a trifold policy which assigns high priorities to what in the Soviet purview are ideologically progressive relationships with East European allies.

Among the study's more controversial assertions (p. 65) is that "since the Cuban missile crisis, the credibility of the Soviet Union's willingness to protect its allies under certain conditions has been undermined." It can be argued convincingly that quite the contrary may be true and that the Soviet Union proved its willingness to confront the United States until presidential assurances were given that Fidel Castro's precarious regime would not be destroyed. The same imperative underpins unswerving Soviet support to the Democratic Republic of Vietnam against the odds that a Marxist-Leninist regime might not survive cumulative American military pressures. The withdrawal of missiles from Cuba might have been a tactical defeat and the Soviet Union's le for the DRV, the effect of which is to mire the United States in Southeast Asia and direct attention from Europe where America's increasingly nominal allies sense an important shift in U.S. defense priorities.

The heart of the study lies in what it does not do after presenting a whole range of heuristic insights. Themes and themes are paraded in tantalizing fashion before the reader, and after a few glancing blows dropped without adequate exploration. In this sense, the monograph is a skeletal effort deserving of a full-length definitive work on Soviet foreign policy over a half century, a task for which few are better qualified than Aspaturian.—NISH JAMGOTCH, JR., University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

Israel on the Road to Sinai, 1949-1956. By Ernest Stock. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1967. Pp. x, 284. $6.50.)

Dr. Stock has handled his main theme in a meticulous and objective fashion. He observes piquantly that the sale of French arms to Israel, which made possible Israel's success in the 1956 Sinai campaign, had been approved by the Eisenhower administration which, apprehensive about the effect on the Arab states if American arms were to go to Israel in quantity, referred the Israeli shopping-list to France and gave its "blessing" to the transaction (p. 184).

A smoke-screen of Israeli censorship still surrounds the abortive sabotage operation of 1954 that was apparently designed to damage Egypt's improving relations with the U.S. and Britain. Dr. Stock treats the "mishap" briefly in a section entitled "Ambivalence and Illegitimate Force" (pp. 117-26); but would not its Defense Ministry authors argue that, facing an Egypt that continually claimed to be legally at war with Israel or at least insisted on its "belligerent rights" (pp. 100-102), such a sabotage operation was (subject to the eleventh commandment, Thou shalt not be found out) a legitimate ruse de guerre?

The author frankly tells us (p. 217) that he had written in a concluding paragraph of the book composed some months before May 15, 1967, "The combination of circumstances which made Sinai possible . . . is not likely to recur"; but before these words went to the press, circumstances obliged him to add a "Sequel on the Six-Day War, 1967." Dr. Stock's casual dismissal of the Anglo-French motives for taking seriously Nasser's expressions of the Six-Day War, the Arab-Israel area" (p. 230). This is precisely what Sir Anthony Eden foresaw and feared in 1956 while Dulles and Eisenhower, preoccupied with their election campaign, chose to pass by on the other side. If indeed the Cold War has "subsided" (p. 232), the present maneuvers of Soviet naval vessels between the Arab ports of the Mediterranean suggest an interim Soviet victory.—George Kirk, University of Massachusetts.

Trade Liberalization Among Industrial Countries:
Objectives and Alternatives. By Bela Balassa.
(New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, for the Council on Foreign Relations, 1967. Pp. 246.
$7.95.)

It would be difficult to overstate the value of this book to students of international politics and economics. In about 150 lucidly and authoritatively written pages of text, Professor Balassa reviews the postwar history of trade liberalization; describes, with measures of the protective effect of tariffs calculated by himself, the system of protection in the industrial countries; evaluates the static and dynamic effects of trade liberalization (including an evaluation of the effects of liberalization on international direct investment patterns); and weighs the relative costs and benefits of alternative groupings of countries between which complete liberalization might proceed.

Implications about the trade stance of groups and industries—their success in winning protection or their stake in expanded trade—can be drawn from tables reporting rates of effective protection by-industry by-country, and export-import ratios by-industry by-country.

With the basic data and some simplifying assumptions, Balassa offers several estimates of the effects of trade liberalization, for example, the per cent increase (from 1960 values) of exports and imports of industrial materials and manufactured goods, by country, that might accompany the formation of an Atlantic free trade area (North America, E.E.C., E.F.T.A., and Japan). In this case, the expected changes generally run from 10 to 15 per cent, and the adverse balance of trade effects are small.

The value of this and similar exercises in the book is not that they offer solid predictions. The protective system basically alters the composition and characteristics of industry within countries, and estimates of the effects of suspending protection must necessarily employ the only data available, which are tariff-distorted. And such exercises neglect gains from intra-industry specialization, widening the field of choice for consumers, and stimulating innovation. The value of the exercises is that they provide quantitative benchmarks, the best available with the state of the art, against which discussion of alternative arrangements (e.g., Atlantic free trade area vs. 50 per cent across the board tariff reduction) can be organized, and to which the consideration of less quantifiable effects can be added. Balassa uses the estimates appropriately. The student who follows their derivation will not be misled, but will acquire an understanding of effects of trade liberalization.

Essays on the dynamic effects of liberalization, direct investment and liberalization, and a summary discussion of alternatives, encompass both political and economic considerations.

Complete appendices record data and describe the method and rationale of the computations. There is no bibliography, but there is an adequate index and Balassa conscientiously cites the literature—including some very recently published—in the text and notes. The student attempting to organize a research project, or seeking a grasp of this area, would profitably start with this book.—David S. Ball, North Carolina State University.

The Legal Significance of the Declarations of the General Assembly of the United Nations. By OBED Y. ASAMOAH. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1966. Pp. 274.)

The most significant aspect of international development is the development of international organizations and, correlatively, the development of a so-called "new" international law. This law, derived from a growing corpus of resolutions and declarations, saliently those of the United Nations General Assembly, promotes the identification of political and legal acts in the context of international organizations and obviates the popular arguments that international organizations lack the legislative and executive authority to formulate and to compel adherence to decisions independently of States: thus embodying one form of problem-anticipating or initiatory developments in international politics.

In The Legal Significance of the Declarations of the General Assembly of the United Nations, Obed Y. Asamoah documents that development. Among relatively few such studies, this analysis focuses upon the role of the General Assembly, as the UN's chartered law-making organ, in modifying legal relations between States: it further suggests that the State practice of presenting declarations in that body has broader implications for customary international law—that the practice arising from political as opposed to contractual pressure is law in all arenas, inter-organizational as well as inter-State. Asamoah's thesis has been affirmed in three recent sessions of the UN General Assembly, in 1963, 1965, and 1966 when it constituted and subsequently reconstituted the Special Committee on the Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation Among States. (See, for example, Chapter III under Legal Questions in the Yearbook of the United Nations 1965.)

Asamoah is concerned less with the formal aspects of authority described by sovereignty and the drafting of treaties than with the informal aspects of the observance and enforcement of international law propounded in organizations originating in treaties. In an introductory functional analysis of the constraints imposed upon the United Nations in the initiation and application of international law, the author holds that the validity of law does not depend upon its observance and that over-emphasis on enforcement obscures the qualitative differences between national and international legal systems, the latter achieving a degree of regularity proportionate to the growing corpus of international practices as binding customary rules. The layman's view (that breaches of international law and the lack of instituted means to prevent or to sanction such breaches indicate that there is no international law qua law) ignores the actual political bargaining integral to the behavior of States in international organizations as expressed in recommendations and the quasi-legislative decisions of which declarations are frequently composed. The element of irreversibility in the development of international customary rules is examined implicitly in this analysis and it is hoped that the author, obviously unable to pursue that subject in the present short monographic context, will soon undertake a close study of the junctures beyond which practice can only become rule.

Without attempting to scale the several types of recommendations and binding decisions obtaining in the General Assembly in terms of their significance for the evolution of rules, Asamoah distinguishes among several of them with detail sufficient to provide the political scientist insight into which practices originating in or confirmed by the United Nations General Assembly are more or less capable of initiating legal and political development within and outside that arena. Binding decisions are narrowly identified with the operation of the UN system itself, pertaining, for example, (1) to admissions to certain relations with non-members, (2) to its subsidiary agencies, and (3) to agreements between States delegating legislative competences upon the Assembly. It is in the first of these, in particular the admission of new members, expulsion, and the control of the UN over non-members, that international organizational development may occur with relatively great frequency and intensity. The question of the irreversibility of membership by expulsion or withdrawal has received attention by policy scientists in several disciplines.

Assembly recommendations lack the legislative competence and enforcement procedures latently characteristic of binding decisions, which have an internal base in the Charter. But recommendations may embody assertions of principle observed by the international community as legally binding; thus by reformulating a norm, an assertion extends the boundaries of both norm and UN legal presence. As Asamoah clearly indicates, the decisions of international organizations, though protean in scope and origin, are institutionally defined by the membership of States, as in the UN. Hence, it is valid and analytically fruitful to term as unique the rules emanating from international organizational practice not circumscribed by Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice. This consideration obviates specious comparisons between municipal law and organizational authority with regard to structure and process. Asamoah distinguishes further between the historical influence of the presence of international organizations upon the substance and rate of accumulation of international custom, and the emergent development of an international law internal to the organizations themselves.

Asamoah does not establish an undifferentiated sphere of organizational law; the implicit catalyst if not the aim of the present volume is to isolate a variety of emergent types of organizational law typical of at least one organization and one medium-declarations. What forums exist beyond the Secretariat, but within the UN, which do or could promote de facto the development of international law? Has the signal rule-making role assumed by the General Assembly through declarations lent both that body and its declarations a long-range dominance in international customary practice? Without analyzing the unique attributes of the General Assembly as a rule-making arena or defining its declarations as qualitatively different political processes from those obtaining in other international organizations narrower and more specialized namely, the European Community—the author encourages those exercises by his historical examination of the characteristics of declarations. his categorization of Assembly declarations, and his reference to the interrelationships between declarations and the contexts in which they are promulgated.

Asamoah's categorization may assist analyst and policy-maker in discerning where, in time and in space, the constitutional development of organizations ends and the evolution of practice begins. By delineating Assembly declarations as those (1) positing principles of international law; (2) claiming in quasi-legislative form to create new principles of international law; (3) supporting programs authorized under the UN Charter, the monograph provides the basis for models by which to test the relevance of specific boundaries of organizational constitutions for international legal development.

Assembly declarations have manipulative value according to the modifications they are capable of dictating at any point for such constituted UN behavior as decision-making. As the structure, authorized through evidently flexible norms by the Charter to introduce law, the General Assembly is a delimiting environment for declarations only in that Charter provisions outline the decision-making processes giving initial definition of outcomes. But the Charter is subject to particular opportunistic interpretations of such principles as those of "domestic jurisdiction" and "sovereign equality" in instances which include the Soviet Union's simultaneous endorsement of the intervention in South Africa on behalf of the Indians and refusal to allow examination of the violation of human rights perpetrated in Eastern Europe.

As the author suggests, this contextual analysis of the influence of declarations as an available political instrument in the UN might valuably be extended to other phases and aspects of diplomatic method currently outside the gambit of organizations. The utility of declarations as media of communication, as between States members of the UN and participants in treaty systems perceived by those States as imposing incompatible demands, in establishing coherence among a community of treaty commitments has not been explored as initiatory development.

In this respect as in several others cited above, it is hoped that Asamoah's study of General Assembly declarations will serve as the basis for future collaboration between lawyers and politicians, scholars of the law and political scientists, in seeking new ways to use existing international organizations rather than in encouraging the multiplication of constitutional structures to solve new problems.—A. R. Headley, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

World Politics: The Global System. HERBERT J. Spiro. (Homewood, Illinois: The Dorsey Press, 1966. Pp. xx, 345. $6.75.)

World Politics: The Global System by Herbert J. Spiro is a useful undergraduate textbook that also endeavors to make a contribution to a systems analysis of international politics. After dispensing with power approaches to international politics by demonstrating their ambiguities and deficiencies, Professor Spiro uses a systems approach in which many original concepts are offered to define the growth of community in the international system. In doing this, he makes a plea that if the new institutions of international politics are to develop adequately, they must be used in a variety of contexts.

The book contains an interesting discussion of political styles as they have changed over time in the course of which Spiro provides an adequate background for the student of the course of international politics since 1898. Spiro enters a plea against the use of misleading analogies and metaphors although it is doubtful whether he provides any criteria by means of which insightful and useful metaphors can be distinguished from misleading or harmful metaphors.

Professor Spiro defines the political system in such a way that it is broader than the social system, a definitional peculiarity to which he is entitled but which this reviewer finds inutile. He includes a discussion of the role of international law in the system of international politics that the student will find informative and enlightening. In the course of this, the student is confronted with Roman Law and Common Law traditions and various theories of law, a refreshing contrast with the usual textbook approach.

Undergraduate texts necessarily cover many more areas of human knowledge than any one political scientist can be competent in Spiro's major weakness is in the area of strategic theory. It is not true that nuclear weapons cannot be used to acquire some future good. And it is not true that the international politics of the seventeenth century was a zero-sum game although Spiro is right in believing that many writers of the time conceived it as such (although they used a different terminology, of course). The doomsday machine was invented by strategists as a reductio ad absurdum, not as a preferred strategy. The discussion of strategic doctrine is based upon gross misunderstanding of the literature. Professor Spiro is not to be blamed for this, but it is a comment on the Dorsey Press that they could not afford proper critical help to the author for a book being offered as an undergraduate text.-Morton A. Kaplan, University of Chicago.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

The Managing Editor and printers regret that work stoppages and other production difficulties have caused the delayed publication of this issue of the Review.

1968 ANNUAL MEETING AND SLATE OF OFFICERS FOR 1968-69

The 1968 Annual Meeting of the Association will be held September 4-7 at the Washington-Hilton Hotel, Washington, D. C. Professor Joseph LaPalombara, Yale University, is Chairman of the Program Committee.

At the Annual Business Meeting of the Association, to be held at 8:00 p.m. Wednesday, September 4, in the Grand Ballroom, Washington-Hilton Hotel, the Nominating Committee (comprised of Aaron B. Wildavsky, University of California, Berkeley, Chairman; Richard F. Fenno, Jr., University of Rochester; Robert E. Ward, University of Michigan; Harry Eckstein, Princeton University; Leon D. Epstein, University of Wisconsin; and William S. Livingston, University of Texas) will propose the following officers for 1968-69:

President Elect: Karl W. Deutsch, Harvard University

Vice Presidents: James W. Fesler, Yale University

Hans J. Morgenthau, University of Chicago

Vernon Van Dyke, University of Iowa

Secretary: Bernard L. Kronick, University of Santa Clara Treasurer: Francis E. Rourke, Johns Hopkins University

Members of the Council for two years:

Gordon E. Baker, University of California, Santa Barbara

Samuel DuBois Cook, Duke University Josephine E. Milburn, Simmons College Joseph L. Nogee, University of Houston A. F. K. Organski, University of Michigan

Frank J. Sorauf, University of Minnesota

The best T Caire II in the C The control of the con

Herbert J. Spiro, University of Pennsylvania

Frederick M. Wirt, Denison University

NOTICE

RESOLUTIONS AND CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS AT THE ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING

In accordance with the Constitution of the American Political Science Association, the attention of members of the Association is hereby directed to the provisions of the Constitution that:

"All resolutions shall be referred to the Council for its recommendations before submission to the vote of the Association at its Annual Business Meeting." (Article VIII)

"Amendments to this Constitution shall be proposed by the Council and adopted by a majority vote of the members present at any regular or special meeting of the Association.

"Ten members of the Association may propose amendments to this Constitution. Such proposed amendments shall be referred to the Council for consideration, and by them referred to the Association for its action thereon at the next Annual Business Meeting with such recommendations as the Council may see fit to make." (Article IX)

The Council of the Association will meet during the afternoon of Monday, September 2, and all day Tuesday, September 3, 1968, in the Thoroughbred Room, Washington-Hilton Hotel, Washington, D. C.

The Constitution of the Association is printed in both the 1961 and 1968 editions of the Association's Biographical Directory.

PROGRAM COMMITTEE: 1969 ANNUAL MEETING

The 1969 Annual Meeting of the Association will be held in New York City at the Commodore Hotel, September 3-6. Suggestions for papers to be presented at the 1969 Annual Meeting are earnestly solicited. As before, the program will be divided into sections, each of which will have a number of panels, with each panel providing an opportunity for one or more papers. All of the sections will include some cross-cultural comparisons. No Section Chairman can possibly be familiar with all of the work going on in his domain; thus it becomes necessary for scholars whose work is just coming to fruition to make this work known to the relevant Section Chairmen. This is particularly true when the research forms part of a dissertation currently under way.

Please advise the Section Chairmen (listed below) of research which, either now or within a year, will very likely form the basis for a high quality research report at the meetings. Since the program is currently being shaped, it is not too early to anticipate events more than a year in the future. Proposals should be submitted preferably by October 15, 1968, but not later than December 1, 1968. Members of the Committee are:

Chairman, Robert E. Lane, Yale University

Empirical Theory-James G. March, University of California, Irvine

International Relations, Organization and Bargaining—Harold Guetzkow, Northwestern University

Legislative Roles, Recruitment and Decision-Making—Samuel C. Patterson, University of Iowa

Mathematical Applications to Political Research—Gerald H. Kramer, Yale University

Normative Political Theory-Christian Bay, University of Alberta

Political Socialization in Cultural Context-Jack Dennis, University of Wisconsin

Urban Politics and Problems-J. David Greenstone, University of Chicago

Political and Social Change—Frederick W. Frey, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Political Science as a Policy Science—H. Mark Roelofs, New York University, University Heights

Computer Technology and Political Research—Warren E. Miller, University of Michigan

Multi-Ethnic Communities—Aristide R. Zolberg, University of Chicago

Legal and Judicial Behavior-David J. Danelski, Yale University

Parties and Elections-H. Douglas Price, Harvard University

Administration and Organization—C. Dwight Waldo, Syracuse University

Political and Social Indicators: Development and Use—Bertram M. Gross, Syracuse University

Civil Disorder: Cross-Cultural Analysis and American Implications—Ivo K. Feierabend, San Diego State College

Political Personality and Leadership-Alexander L. George, Stanford University

ERRATUM

In Robert A. Dahl's Presidential address published in the issue of December, 1967, line 2 in since 1955...."

ARTICLES ACCEPTED FOR FUTURE PUBLICATION*

September, 1968

- Robert Alford, University of Wisconsin, "Voting Turnout in American Cities"
- Richard Ashcraft, University of California, Los Angeles, "Locke's State of Nature: Historical Fact or Moral Fiction?"
- Edward N. Beiser, Williams College, "The Reapportionment Cases: A Comparative Analysis of State and Federal Judicial Behavior"
- Moshe M. Czudnowski, The Hebrew University, Jerusalem, "A Salience Dimension for the Study of Political Culture."
- Jerome M. Gilison, Johns Hopkins University, "Soviet Elections as a Measure of Dissent: The Missing One Percent"
- A. James Gregor, University of California, Berkeley, "Political Science and the Uses of Functional Analysis"
- Kenneth P. Langton and M. Kent Jennings, University of Michigan, "Political Socialization and the High School Civics Curriculum in the United States"
- Michael Leiserson, University of California, Berkeley, "Factions and Coalitions in One-Party Japan: An Explanation Based on the Theory of Games"
- Milton G. Lodge, University of Iowa, "Soviet Elite Attitudes in the Post-Stalin Era"
- Martin C. Needler, University of New Mexico,
 "Political Development and Socioeconomic Development: The Case of Latin America"
- Robert A. Schoenberger, University of Michigan, "Conservatism, Personality and Political Extremism"
- Joel J. Schwartz and William R. Keech, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, "Group Influence on the Policy Process in the Soviet Union"
- J. David Singer, University of Michigan, Bruce M. Russett, Yale University, and Melvin Small, "National Political Units in the Twentieth Century: A Standardized List"
- Jack E. Vincent, Florida Atlantic University, 'National Attributes as Predictors of Delegate Attitudes at the United Nations"
- Raymond E. Wolfinger, Stanford University, and Fred I. Greenstein, Wesleyan University, "The Repeal of Fair Housing in California: An Analysis of Referendum Voting"

December, 1968

- Paul R. Brass, University of Washington, "Indian Party Systems: Coalition Politics and the Formation of Non-Congress Governments in North India"
- M. Margaret Conway, University of Maryland, and Frank B. Feigert, Knox College, "Motivation, Incentive Systems, and the Political Party Organization"

- Ernest A. Duff, Randolph-Macon Women's College, and John F. McCamant, University of Denver, "Measuring Social and Political Requirements for System Stability"
- H. D. Forbes and Edward R. Tufte, Princeton University, "A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling"
- Michael P. Gehlen, University of California, Berkeley, "The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite Analysis"
- Ted Gurr, Princeton University, "A Causal Model of Civil Strife: A Comparative Analysis Using New Indices"
- Allan Kornberg, Duke University, and Hal N. Winsborough, University of Wisconsin, "The Recruitment of Candidates for the Canadian House of Commons"
- Michael Lipsky, University of Wisconsin, "Protest as a Political Resource"
- Allan G. Pulsipher, Texas A&M University, and James L. Weatherby, Jr., University of Minnesota, "Malapportionment, Party Competition, and the Functional Distribution of Governmental Expenditures"
- Harry M. Scoble, University of California, Los Angeles, and Robert Alford, University of Wisconsin, "Sources of Local Political Involvement"
- Ira Sharkansky, University of Wisconsin, "Agency Requests, Gubernatorial Support and Budget Success in State Legislation"
- Gordon Tullock, Rice University, "A Note on Censorship"

March, 1969

- Stephen J. Cimbala, University of Wisconsin, "Foreign Policy as an Issue Area: An Exploratory Analysis"
- Arthur S. Goldberg, University of Rochester, "Social Determinism and Rationality as Bases of Party Identification"
- Arthur L. Kalleberg, University of Minnesota, "Concept Formation in Normative and Empirical Studies"
- Lawrence B. Mohr, University of Michigan, "Determinants of Innovation in Organizations"
- Douglas W. Rae, Yale University, "Decision-Rules and Individual Values in Collective Choice"
- R. J. Rummel, University of Hawaii, "Indicators of Cross-National and International Patterns"
- * Production exigencies may occasionally necessitate publication of articles in issues other than those given in this listing.

Professional Placement Service at 1968 Annual Meeting

(September 3-7, 1968)

A professional placement service will again be available to members of The American Political Science Association attending the Washington, D.C. meeting. The placement service will be provided by the U. S. Employment Service. The primary purpose is to provide an efficient means for employers to meet prospective employees and vice versa.

The Professional Placement Service is entirely separate from the APSA's Personnel Service and requires separate registration. There is no fee for use of the Professional Placement Service by employers or applicants at the Convention.

All State Employment Service local offices accept orders and applications in the field of political science on a year-round basis as a regular part of their professional service.

If you plan to attend the Conference and utilize the Placement Service, please mail the form below as soon as possible, but not later than August 3, 1968. Application and/or employer order forms will be forwarded to you upon receipt of the following information.

Name:
(Organization or Institution)	•••••
***************************************		••••••
Address:		•••••
(City)	•	(State)
☐ Employer (check either)		☐ No. of Vacancies
☐ Prospective Candidate		☐ No. of Area(s) of Specialization
Will you be available for interviews during the Annual Meeting?
	☐ Yes	□ No
Fill in appropriate blocks and mail to: Miss Wareteen Smith, USES-DC Professional Career and Information Center, 1111 20th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036

SEATS STILL AVAILABLE APSA SUMMER FLIGHT B

August 3 to September 3 New York to Paris
Round trip $265

For further information write to the Director of Summer Flights, American Political Science Association, 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

AMERICA'S POLITICAL DILEMMA

From Limited to Unlimited Democracy

By GOTTFRIED DIETZE Has the American Dream of democracy and equal rights come true? Professor Dietze's thesis is that the march of democracy has actually made government less reasonable, has eliminated constitutional checks, has jeopardized the rights of men, and has resulted in a foreign policy that allowed the present Soviet threat to American security.

$7.95

FRANCE, DE GAULLE, AND EUROPE

The Policy of the Fourth and Fifth Republics Toward the Continent

BY SIMON SERFATY In this concise, closely-reasoned analysis of French policy toward Europe since World War II, Dr. Serfaty discusses French efforts to regain internal security and a position of world power. His study also includes a critical evaluation of present French European policy, polycentrism in Europe, and French dissensions with her Western allies. $6.95

ALLIANCES AND AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

BY ROBERT E. OSGOOD What changes have occurred in alliances since World War II, and what effect will these changes have on U.S. policy in the future? In answering these questions the author suggests that alliances in the future may be more concerned with conducting diplomacy and interallied politics and that our commitments will tend to be more limited, diversified, and informal. $6.50

NEW JOHNS HOPKINS PAPERBACKS

Huey Long's Louisiana. State Politics, 1920-1952

BY ALLAN P. SINDLER What has been the effect of Longism in Louisiana politics? In an objective analysis of Huey Long and the politics of the state, the author discusses the origins, development, and continuing importance of Longism. "A monumental achievement in political science. . . . Seldom if ever have a state and its leaders been so completely taken apart to see what made—and makes—them tick."—New York Times Book Review

JH-44/$2.25

Nations in Alliance The Limits of Interdependence

BY GEORGE LISKA In a brilliant analysis George Liska interprets the structure and dynamics of alliances, drawing freely on contemporary and historical events. "[It] is a major work which brings diplomatic history and rich insight to bear on many aspects of international politics; indeed, no book in recent years has so many strikingly original interpretations of so many . . . problems."—American Political Science Review

JH-42/$2.25

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS

Baltimore, Maryland 21218

New and forthcoming LAWRENCE H. FUCHS, Editor American Ethnic Politics

"The articles . . . were picked as exemplars of political analysis. [They] concentrate on questions of issues and ethnicity and the distribution of power."-LAWRENCE H. FUCHS. The contributors: Elmer E. Cornwell, Jr., Leon D. Epstein, Lawrence H. Fuchs, Benton Johnson, Dwaine Marvick, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Joseph Schafer, Harry M. Scoble, James Q. Wilson, and Raymond E. Wolfinger.

(July) TB/1368 $2.45

HANS KOHN

The Age of Nationalism

The First Era of Global History

New Introduction by the Author.

"A compact and illuminating guide to the clash of ideals in today's world."—Geoffrey Bruun. "It gives us a view of the subject that is fresh in many ways . . . with Kohn's accustomed vigor and authority."—A. P. WHITAKER, The American Historical Review

(August) TB/1380 $1.45

GORDON K. LEWIS

Puerto Rico

Freedom and Power in the Caribbean

"By far the best general survey of Puerto Rico ever written.... Always stimulating and probing."—FRANK OTTO GATELL, The American Historical Review. "An essential item for the bibliography of almost any social science inquiry or enterprise dealing with the Caribbean or any of its parts."-ROBERT A. MANNERS, The American Anthropologist TB/1371 $2.95

RITCHIE P. LOWRY

Who's Running This Town?

Community Leadership and Social Change

"An intriguing and penetrating study of the effects of accelerated urban change upon the hybrid suburban city. . . . The legend of grass roots democracy in a small town is effectively shattered."-EDWARD SOFEN, The American Political Science Review

(September) TB/1383 $2.25

Conyers Read, Editor

The Constitution Reconsidered

Revised Edition with a New Preface by Richard B. Morris.

"It was an excellent idea to gather together in a single volume these papers. . . . The larger part consists of essays of high interest, and there are a few, notably those of Professors Salvemini, Hamilton, Lerner, and Commager, which are of outstanding value."-H. J. LASKI, The American Historical Review (1939) (September) TB/1384 $3.75

Renzo Sereno

The Rulers

"In significance of subject matter-both for political science and for an understanding of major political problems-in analytic acuteness, and in breadth and profundity of human insight, Professor Sereno's study stands in the very first rank of creative contemporary works in political theory."-F. H. WILLHOITE, The American Political Science Review

A Harper Colophon Book. CN/126 $1.45

KALMAN H. SILVER'T

The Conflict Society Reaction and Revolution in Latin America

"[Includes] case studies covering a long period, theoretical dissertations and brilliant essays based on the author's personal experience."

—International Review of Social History (Amsterdam). "Provides authoritative and lucid discussion of political development in the Latin American countries."—The Book Exchange (London). A Harper Colophon Book. (August) CN/130 $2.25

RICHARD S. WECKSTEIN, Editor Expansion of World Trade and the Growth of National Economies

The contributors: Alexander K. Cairncross, Charles A. Cooper, Gottfried Haberler, Harry G. Johnson, Staffan B. Linder, Benjamin F. Massell, Gerald M. Meier, Gunnar Myrdal, Ragnar Nurkse, Raúl Prebisch, and Hans W. Singer. (July) TB/1373 $2.75

Complete catalog of Harper Torchbooks [653 volumes now in print] available on request from Dept. 51, HARPER & ROW, Publishers, 49 E. 33rd St., New York, N.Y. 10016

PRAEGER

Outstanding new paperback texts in political science

THE CONTRACT OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II Third Revised Edition

JOHN W. SPANIER. To account for significant post-1965 developments, Professor Spanier (author of the recent World Politics in an Age of Revolution, also a Praeger Paperbound Text) now provides an extensively revised edition of the popular historical analysis long required in American government and foreign policy courses. Among the highlights of this largely reorganized and rewritten edition are a penetrating new chapter on "The Third World and the American-Soviet Competition" and a detailed analysis of "The American Empire and Vietnam." ca. 300 pp. June.

A Praeger Paperbound Text/$2.95

REPUBLICAN POLITICS The 1964 Campaign and Its Aftermath for the Party

Edited by BERNARD COSMAN and ROBERT J. HUCKSHORN. "With the approach of the 1968 Presidential election this analysis ... should be of special interest to students of government.... A necessity for the political scientist in understanding the Republican side of the picture in the 1964 Presidential campaign and its post-electoral results."—Library Journal. 320 pp. (Examination copies available now; bookstore orders to be shipped in August.)

U-649/$2.95

EXPANSION AND COEXISTENCE The History of

The History of Soviet Foreign Policy, 1917-67

文字· 图 16 "国际内部公司》中1915年最为65日的公司。

ADAM B. ULAM. The distinguished Harvard historian and political scientist Adam B. Ulam provides scholars and students with an authoritative history of the diplomatic, political, and ideological factors that have shaped Soviet foreign policy since 1917. Professor Ulam's absorbing narrative includes a brilliant analysis of the major diplomatic confrontations of today—and a penetrating look at changing U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations in the 1960's.

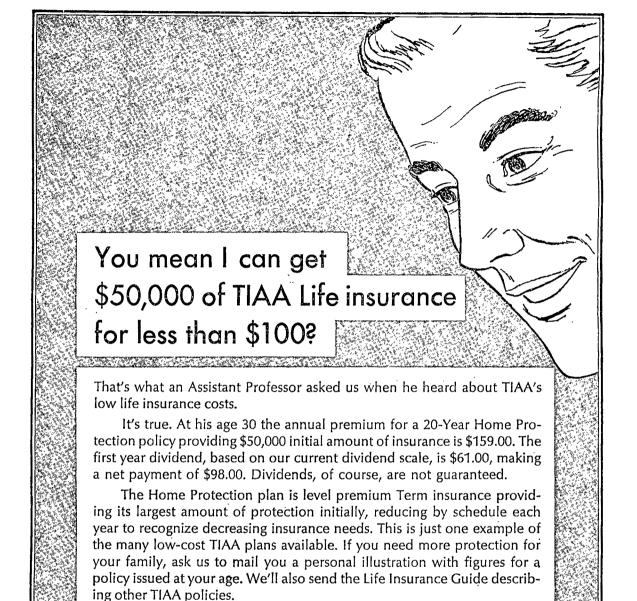

ca. 768 pp. August. A Praeger Paperbound Text/$4.95

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND THE CITY A Survey of Urban Research

Edited by LEO F. SCHNORE. This unparalleled evaluation of the postwar literature of urban affairs in each of the traditional disciplines originally appeared as Part I of Urban Research and Policy Planning (edited by Schnore and Henry Fagin). Upon publication of the original work, in 1967, Choice wrote: "A praiseworthy series of original articles. . . . Excellent bibliography. Should be of considerable value . . . to all social scientists interested in urban affairs." So that the material may now be made more accessible to the growing number of scholars and students of urban affairs, this invaluable survey will be published in an inexpensive paper-bound edition in June. ca. 324 pp.

A Praeger Paperbound Text/$3.95

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, 111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10003

ELIGIBILITY FOR TIAA INSURANCI

is limited to faculty and staff members of colleges, universities, private schools, and other nonprofit educational or scientific institutions that qualify for TIAA services.

TEACHERS INSURANCE AND ANNUITY ASSOCIATION 730 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017	a G
Please mail the new Life Insurance Guide and	d a personal illustration.
Name	Your Date of Birth
Address	Z[P
Dependents' Ages
Nonprofit Employercollege, university, or other

Oxford University Press

Non-Violence and Aggression

A STUDY OF GANDHI'S MORAL EQUIVALENT OF WAR

By H. J. N. HORSBURGH, University of Glasgow. Starting from familiar premises about the ineffectiveness of war as an instrument of policy in a nuclear age, the author examines the claims of Gandhian satyagraha as a morally preferable and comparably efficient method achieving the ends to be obtained by warfare. He relates, in some detail, what a non-viole defense system would be like, and how to adapt the methods Gandhi used against internal of pression to the resistance of external aggression.

The Life of Eleanor Marx, 1855-1898

By CHUSHICKHI TSUZUKI, Hitotsubashi University, Tokyo. This first full-scale biograph of Bleanor Marx, youngest daughter of Karl Marx, explores her inherited wealth of sociali ideas and sentiments which enabled her to play an important part in the introduction of Marxian Socialism and Internationalism in Britain. The book also discusses her absorption drama, literature, and acting during an exciting era of new plays and ideas in England; at by drawing from her letters, reveals the personal tragedy of the woman who personified the Marxian legacy. 3 halftones.

The Notion of the State

AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL THEORY

By ALEXANDER PASSERIN d'ENTREVES, University of Turin. This concise analytic survey, including some linguistic analysis of the different concepts of the State, discusses son of the most significant versions of politics put forward in the past and held at present by so entists, lawyers, and philosophers. The author delves into the problems of political obligatic and shows that much more is explained and understood if the State is viewed in terms of the relations of both law and human values.

Cloth, $5.60. Paper, $2.5

The Inequality of States

A STUDY OF THE SMÄLLER POWER IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

By DAVID VITAL, University of Sussex. This book is the first systematic consideration of the problems which face the small state in its international relations. Dr. Vital analyzes the primary problems faced by small powers as a result of their limited resources, considering their implications for foreign and defense affairs. He then examines the possibilities of national policy which are open to such states: passive, active, and defensive.

WOXFORD WUNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Oxford University Press

Origins of the Fifth Amendment

By LEONARD W. LEVY, Brandeis University. "A work of meticulous scholarship, which makes the experience of centuries past relevant to the legal process of today. It is done with Professor Levy's characteristic scrupulousness and insight, and it illuminates a highly important area of our constitutional law."—PAUL A. FREUND, Harvard University $12.50

The Pendergast Machine

By LYLE W. DORSETT, University of Southern California. "An excellent job, well conceived and sensitively executed. His careful account of the rise and fall of a political dynasty should be of great value to historians. . . . The whole book is good, from first page to last, it certainly maintains a high standard for what is becoming one of the most important series in the field of American history."—A. Theodore Brown, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee. Maps. (Urban Life in America series.)

$6.00

Government and Revolution in Vietnam

By DENNIS J. DUNCANSON. "Scholarly and fascinating presentation of an elusive subject matter... an intensely instructive and gripping narrative."—ROBERT D. MURPHY, former Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. "Without a doubt the most impressive and enlightening thing I have read on this painful subject."—FRANCIS X. SUTTON, The Ford Foundation. Map. $9.50

Woodrow Wilson and World Politics AMERICA'S RESPONSE TO WAR AND REVOLUTION

By N. GORDON LEVIN, JR., Amherst College, Mr. Levin presents an original thesis stating that America's foreign policy from her entry into World War I to the Paris Peace Conference reflected a conscious effort by Wilson to use America's moral and material power against the imperialism of prewar Europe and the revolutionary socialism of Lenin and Soviet Russia. The argument finds implicit in Wilson's program and goals the terms in which American foreign policy is now being conducted.

W OXFORD W UNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

from Lippincott in '68

Second Edition . . .

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS IN A REVOLUTIONARY AGE

W. W. KULSKI, Duke University

A thoroughly revised, completely reset edition which presents a comprehensive view of the trends and tensions that are currently reshaping international politics. The author probes the ruptures within the communist system, the growing Western conviction that a Soviet military move in Europe is unlikely, and the feeling that the Cold War is over. Professor Kulski details the growing independence of the Soviet satellite states, and the moves toward closer economic and political ties between Eastern and Western Europe. The widening gap in living standards between the advanced nations and the Third World is vividly described.

768 Pages

$7.95

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ORGANIZATION

An Introductory Reader

Edited by RICHARD A. FALK, Princeton University, and WOLFRAM F. HANRIEDER, University of California, Santa Barbara

Moving beyond traditional emphasis on legalistic and formalistic aspects, the editors project the study of international law and organization into the wider setting of international relations. The distinctive features of a decentralized legal system are stressed. The result is an approach that is highly compatible with International Relations courses at all levels. The selections, together with the editors' commentaries, provide students with an introduction to the important questions that bear on the character of contemporary international order.

368 Pages

Paperbound -

$3.95

THESE LIBERTIES Case Studies in Civil Rights

ROCCO J. TRESOLINI

Unlike many existing casebooks intended for advanced students and specialized audiences, this new book—a virtual text in civil liberties—is designed for students at freshman and sophomore levels. The author has selected thirty-eight cases that have contributed to the growth of our fundamental freedoms. Each case is preceded by a brief introduction which defines the issues in question; describes the social, political, and economic circumstances surrounding those issues; and gives pertinent facts about the life and career of the Justice rendering the decision.

320 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

College Department

East Washington Square

Philadelphia, Pa. 19105

THE NATIONAL PRESS INC.

128 C Street N. E. Washington, D. C. 20002

VIETNAM FOLLY, by Senator Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser. Here for the first time under one cover is a definitive, comprehensive work on Vietnam by distinguished, authoritative authors. Popular style, plus appendix of pertinent, historical documents, source notes, index, illustrations. Senator Gruening and Mr. Beaser set forth a "third alternative" (as opposed to military victory or abandonment) which may result in peace in Vietnam. 664 p., Cloth, $8.95.

THE ACHIEVING GHETTO, by Eugene P. Foley. C. Sumner (Chuck) Stone says "Gene Foley is the only white man who understands the economic frustrations of the black man in the ghetto." Foley, former Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Economic Development, cuts through the inflammatory oratory of the extremists and the patronizing prose of the do-gooders to lay bare the social and economic problems of the ghetto. Proves by analysis of experience that the American Negro is as capable of achievement as any race, any place. Sets forth a plan for massive economic rehabilitation of ghettos. 155 p. Cloth, $4.95. Paper, $2.45.

COMBAT SOLDIER, by James C. Fry, with introduction by General Mark Clark and jacket endorsement by General James Gavin. An account of the Italian campaign by a brilliant troop commander. General Clark's introduction ties it to Vietnam and current problems of military tactics and leadership. General Gavin praises the author and its authenticity. The publisher sees it as a devastating commentary on the nature and savagery of men in combat, and a heart-rending revulsion against war. 359 p. Cloth, $7.50.

WHERE ARE THE VOTERS? by Jerry W. Friedheim with research assistance and introduction by Richard Scammon. Proves by statistics and sprightly text where American voters are located by age, occupation, race, sex, education, religion, and political preference. Gives professional advice on how to get them to vote for your party or candidate. "Votefinder" charts show how many votes a presidential candidate needs in each State and where he and his partisans can find them and how to get their votes. 332 p. Cloth, $5.95. Paper, $2.95.

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF WORLD POWER, by Senator Gale McGee. Here at last is an authoritative, scholarly presentation of the Johnson Administration's foreign policy. With some 50 books preaching the other side of the story, this one will be sought by partisans as well as students and concerned citizens. GALE McGEE is eminently qualified by education and experience to be the spokesman. He was professor of History and chairman of the Institute of International Affairs at the U. of Wyoming before election to the Senate where he now serves his second term. 276 p. Cloth, $6.95.

HOW TO RUN FOR PUBLIC OFFICE, AND WIN! by Senator Hugh Scott. Millions of young Americans anticipate public service who, a generation or even a decade ago, might never have entertained such thoughts. HUGH SCOTT ran for and won election to the U. S. House of Representatives seven times before running for and winning election and reelection to the Senate. His book tells how to do it. 192 p. Cloth, $5.95. Paper, $2.95.

CROSSROADS U. S. A., by Senator Harrison A. Williams, Jr. Many authorities believe domestic issues today are more dangerous and threatening than Vietnam. This book discusses the causes, present status, and future solutions of such problems as riots, poverty, education, housing, and civil rights. HARRISON WILLIAMS, as a ranking member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, has studied these things and has handled as much New Frontier and Great Society legislation as any man in Congress. Poignant photographs complement the text. 208 p. Cloth, $6.95.

AMERICA, I-LOVE-YOU, by Ralph de Toledano with annotations by Karl Hess. Somethingfor the Conservatives, by one of their most respected and popular writers—his first book since RFK, The Man Who Would Be President. A collection of controversial reports on subversion, espionage, and international politics. Slashing attacks on the Liberal Establishment in the great style of American journalism. KARL HESS, Goldwater's former speech writer, ties it all together with incisive comments, 272 p. Cloth, $7.50. New from Bobbs-Merrill

CHERRYHOLMES and SHAPIRO

Representatives and Roll Calls: A Computer Simulation of Voting in the Eighty-Eighth Congress

by Cleo H. Cherryholmes and Michael J. Shapiro

The simulation attempts to postdict voting outcomes, to identify the processes and determinants of legislative voting, and to approximate the results of those choices for both domestic and foreign policy roll calls.

(forthcoming in Jan. 1969)

256 pages

$7.50 clothbound, on approval

CRAIN, KATZ, and ROSENTHAL

The Politics of Community Conflict: The Fluoridation Decision

by Robert L. Crain, Elihu Katz, and Donald B. Rosenthal

A study of the politics of fluoridation, with emphasis on effectiveness of community leadership structures, using the methodology of survey research.

250 pages $2.95/$6.50

JANDA

Information Retrieval: Applications to Political Science

by Kenneth Janda

"... an excellent, practical, case study approach to important retrieval problems for political science."—Ralph L. Bisco

350 pages

$4.50/$8.50

MOSHER

Governmental Reorganizations: Cases and Commentary

Edited by Frederick C. Mosher

Published jointly with the Inter-University Case Program, Inc.

Thirteen studies of cases of governmental reorganizations, and an extended theoretic essay summarizing their implications.

750 pages $12.00 clothbound, on approval

RIESELBACH

The Roots of Isolationism: Congressional Voting and Presidential Leadership in Foreign Policy

by Leroy N. Rieselbach

The author moves beyond the empirical generalizations to speculate about ways in which the Executive and Legislative branches interact in the making of foreign policy.

280 pages $2.95/$7.50

SPRAGUE

Voting Patterns of the United States Supreme Court: Cases in Federalism, 1889-1959

by John D. Sprague

A statistically imaginative and sophisticated study, evaluating two common descriptions of Supreme Court decision-making against data extended in time.

256 pages 77 tables $6.50 clothbound, on approval

STEWART

Political Power in the Soviet Union: A Study of Decision-Making in Stalingrad by Philip D. Stewart

An analysis of the structure of influence in decision-making at the regional level of the Soviet Communist Party.

217 pages

$2.95/$7.50

College Division

THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY, INC.
A SUBSIDIARY OF HOWARD W. SAMS & CO., INC.
4300 WEST 62nd STREET • INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA 46268

NEW from ST. MARTIN'S

New Approaches to International Relations Morton A. Kaplan, Editor

This volume is the product of the June 1966 Conference of the Norman Wait Harris Memorial Foundation at the University of Chicago. The contributions represent definitive statements of the new approaches to which the profession of political science has so far given recognition, and the contributors are the recognized leading proponents or critics of these approaches. Contributors: Kaplan, Wohlstetter, Golden, Kahn, Deutsch, Alker, Burns, Guetzkow, Galtung, North, Falk, Hsi-shen Chi, Franke, and Reinken.

August 1968 534 pp. $10.00

Political Theory Its Nature and Uses George Kateb

This latest study in St. Martin's Series in American Politics is both a rationale and a description of political theory, defining it in its traditional moral role and demonstrating its importance in the field of political theory. The author discusses how the political theorist generalizes from what he observes of political practices and how he makes use of the classical political theorists.

June 1968 100 pp. $1.75

The New Urbanization

Scott Greer, Dennis C. McElrath, David W. Minar, and Peter Orleans, Editors

The papers in this volume are the result of ten years of interdisciplinary research and collaboration among a group of scholars mainly concentrated around the Center for Metropolitan Studies at Northwestern University. The articles examine the complex and interrelated facets of the urbanization process that is transforming the older social and physical forms.

June 1968 386 pp. $10.00

Now published:

Manual of Public International Law

Sponsored by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Max Sørensen, Editor

1968 976 pp. $12.50

Send for our 1968 Political Science catalog

College Department ST. MARTIN'S PRESS 175 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10010

Already a landmark in its field

THE UNIVERSAL REFERENCE SYSTEM PRESENTS:

A continuing series of computerized bibliographies for political and behavioral scientists.

The 10-volume series on Political Science, Government, and Public Policy cites significant material (books and articles) appearing in social and behavioral sciences, annotated and indexed in depth.

SUBJECT FIELDS:

- I. International Affairs
 II. Legislative Process, Representation, and Decision Making
- III. Bibliography of Bibliographies in Political Science, Government, and Public Policy
- IV. Administrative Management: Public and Private Bureaucracy
- V. Current Events and Problems of Modern Society
- VI. Public Opinion, Mass Behavior, and Political Psychology
- VII. Law, Jurisprudence, and Judicial Process
- VIII. Economic Regulation, Business. and Government
- IX. Public Policy and the Management of Science
- X. Comparative Government and Cultures

UPON SUBSCRIPTION:

10 library-bound CODEXES covering 10 subject fields of Political Science. IN THE FIRST YEAR: 40 quarterly, cumulative, new-literature Gazettes — 10 each quarter in the subject fields. IN THE SECOND YEAR: 40 quarterly, cumulative, new-literature Gazettes.

FOR DESCRIPTIVE LITERATURE & PRICES:

Please write to Dept. C, Princeton Research Publishing Co., 32 Nassau Street, Princeton, N. J. 08540.

LOOKING FOR A BOOK PUBLISHER?

It is no secret that publication is regarded as the foundation stone of a scholar's career. In order to gain recognition, prestige, and advancement, the scholar must seek publication.

Here at Exposition Press, we offer scholars a complete publishing service, under our special academic imprint, "Exposition-University Books." Though the proportion of scholarly publications in the lists of the trade houses is shrinking, due to economic pressures, many of our recent titles in the academic fields have gained popular reviews, professional recognition and steady sales. These books are the result of a publishing plan that is bringing a steady flow of scholarly writers to Exposition Press. They reflect the high editorial standards and quality of design and production which have won the respect of libraries, schools, book-sellers and critics. Ask for free catalogs.

The behind-the-scenes story of book publishing revealed in two fact-filled, illustrated brochures, containing a detailed description of our subsidy plan including a breakdown of contract terms and typical costs (in print for the first time). Copies are available on request. Your inquiries and manuscripts are invited. An editorial appraisal will be furnished promptly without obligation. References upon request.

Please write to Dept. 93C

EXPOSITION PRESS INC., 50 Jericho Turnpike, Jericho, New York 11753

United Nations Publications

Recent United Nations studies and reports

Planning of Metropolitan Areas and New Towns

Twenty-nine papers delivered by a UN expert group on the definitions of the technical and human problems of urban development and presenting a broad review of existing programmes. Photographs, charts. $3.50

Handbook of Civil Service Laws and Practices

A guide giving the basic elements of effective merit systems and their authority, structure, methodology and practice. $4.00

Inducing Social Change in Developing Countries

A study of the opinions of 445 national and foreign experts on the development projects in these specific fields: agriculture, health, nutrition, adult education, home economics, and community development. Cloth $5.00/Paper $3.50

Incomes in Postwar Europe

A study of policies, growth, distribution and redistribution in European market economies, centrally planned economies and Yugoslavia. $6.50

World Economic Survey 1966

A comprehensive review of world economic conditions intended to stimulate interest in international economic problems. Contents include current economic developments and aspects of the problems and experience in the implementation of development plans, Cloth $5.00

Foreign Trade Statistics 1960–1963

Statistical tables for selected Middle East countries classified according to the SITC, Revised, by the UN Economic and Social Office in Beirut.

Iraq	$4.00	Lebanon	$4.50
Jordan		Saudi Arabia	$2.00
Kuwait	$2.00	Syria	$3.50

The Growth of World Industry 1953–1965: National Tables

Measures changes in the level of production and employment in various branches of the industrial sector in the economy of eighty countries. Cloth $10.00

African Agricultural Development

Reflections on the major lines of advance and the barriers to progress in the development of agriculture in Africa. $3.50

The Process of Industrial Development in Latin America

Starting with the period before the depression of the 1930's this study reviews the production of some major industries and presents new industrial development requirements, and industrialization aims and strategies. $4.00

Industrial Development in Asia and the Far East

Selected documents presented to the Asia Conference on Industrialization, Manila 1965.

Vol I Progress and problems of industrialization $5.00

Vol II Country Reports $5.75 Vol III Country Reports $5.00

Vol IV Development of Key Industries $7.00

Export Credits and Development Financing

Part One: Current Practices and Problems Part Two: National Export Credit Systems

A review of existing national systems and international arrangements regarding the granting of export credit insurance and export credits. $2.50

Studies in Petrochemicals

Includes the majority of the techno-economic studies which were presented at the Interregional Conference held in Tehran to examine in depth the development of the petrochemical industries in developing countries. Two volumes, cloth-bound $25.00

United Nations Publications, Room 1059, New York, N. Y. 10017

UNIVERSITY of PENNSYLVANIA PRESS

Coming next month

A book that makes a positive contribution to solving the problems of the elderly in our cities

RELOCATION: From Obstacle to Opportunity in Urban Planning

by Paul L. Niebanck and Mark R. Yessian

The first volume in the important new Environmental Studies Series, this book describes the elderly population which is subject to displacement and evaluates their ability to meet the rigors of urban life. Including a comprehensive statement of recommendations for national relocation policy, this book should be of great value to policy-makers, administrators, practitioners, and researchers.

150 pages $4.95

New by Sam Bass Warner, Jr.

THE PRIVATE CITY: Philadelphia in Three Periods of its Growth

Why Philadelphia? Because this big, messy, industrial city built on centuries of violent change is a city whose history has been repeated again and again, with only minor variations, in the urban network of the entire United States. Typifying the growth and decay of all American urban areas, Philadelphia demonstrates an enduring tradition of the conflict between private and public functions.

208 pages illustrated $4.95

Reprinted

FOUR CITIES: A Study in Comparative Policy Making

by Oliver P. Williams and Charles R. Adrian

$6.00

SUBURBAN DIFFERENCES AND METROPOLITAN POLICIES:

A Philadelphia Story, by Oliver P. Williams, et al.

66.00

UNIVERSITY of PENNSYLVANIA PRESS
Philadelphia 19104

Cornell University Press

LOBBYING IN LONDON

A Rope of Sand

The Colonial Agents, British Politics, and the American Revolution

By MICHAEL G. KAMMEN. Quoting freely from the correspondence of America's colonial agents—Edmund Burke, Benjamin Franklin, and dozens of less prominent men—as well as from manuscripts, documents, newspapers, and pamphlets, Professor Kammen presents a detailed account of this lobby, its successes and failures, and the drift toward the war.

Illus. 376 pages. $10.00

NEW IDEAS AND THE LAW

American Legal Realism Skepticism, Reform, and the Judicial Process

By WILFRID E. RUMBLE, JR. Here is the first full-length work to focus on realist views of the judicial process. Beginning with the movement's origins and nature between the two world wars, the author goes on to describe and evaluate the famous notions of rule- and fact-skepticism, as well as other realist positions. He concludes that despite their limitations, the ideas of the realists possessed a high degree of validity.

268 pages. $6.75

CHURCH-STATE RELATIONS

Religion and the Public Order, Number Four An Annual Review of Church and State, and of Religion, Law, and Society

Edited by Donald A. Giannella. The latest book in this outstanding series contains a comprehensive survey of recent political and legal developments in church-state relations and a review of recent books on religion, law, and society. Contributors include Ralph Potter, William S. Ball, Edward Duff, S.J., Thomas Love, Dennis O'Brien, Robert Rodes, and John Wilson.

320 pages. $6.00

PARTNERS IN TRADE

Reciprocity and the North Atlantic Triangle, 1932-1938

By RICHARD N. KOTTMAN. This diplomatic and political analysis of the economic rapprochement between the U.S., Canada, and the United Kingdom shows how the Triangle functioned. From private papers and government documents, the author uncovers the motivations behind the three major trade agreements and develops interesting new perspectives on America's foreign policy during the thirties.

298 pages. $7.50

Cornell University Press ITHACA, NEW YORK 14850

The Emergence of Indian Nationalism

This is the first of five volumes to be published in a series, Political Change in Modern South Asia, prepared by J. A. Gallagher of Oxford and Anil Seal of Cambridge. The aim of the series is to analyse the interplay between imperialism and nationalism in what were to become the states of India and Pakistan.

In The Emergence of Indian Nationalism Dr Seal studies the social roots of the stirrings toward political organization in the 1870s and 1880s which brought about the foundation of the Indian National Congress. $11.50

The Swatantra Party and Indian Conservatism

HOWARD L. ERDMAN

Dr Erdman examines the background, emergence and growth of Swatantra within the framework of conservative politics in India. (Cambridge South Asian Studies No. 5) $9.50

Sir William Jones and British Attitudes to India in the Eighteenth Century

S. N. MUKHERJEE

A study of Jones's thought and work, assessing the nature of his far-reaching influence on India and British attitudes toward her. (Cambridge South Asian Studies No. 6) $8.50

Locke's Two Treatises of Government

Second Edition

Edited by PETER LASLETT

Mr Laslett's feat of scholarship in producing a definitive text of this major work of political philosophy is well known. For the second edition he has brought the bibliography up to date, revised the introduction, extended the index and the appendices.

$11.50

Cambridge Studies in the History and Theory of Politics

The Social and Political Thought of Karl Marx SHLOMO AVINERI

Dr Avineri believes that no gap existed, as is commonly supposed, between the young Marx — considered to be a humanist thinker — and the older Marx, held to be a determinist with little concern for anything outside his theory of historical materialism. He supports his claim in this detailed study. $8.50

The Conscience of the State in North America

E. R. NORMAN

Dr Norman traces the movements toward the formal separation of church and state since the mid-eighteenth century in Great Britain, Canada and the United States. $6.50

Previously published:

1867: Disraeli, Gladstone and Revolution MAURICE COWLING

$13.50

Liberty, Equality, Fraternity

JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN Edited by R. J. WHITE

$7.50

Cambridge Latin American Studies

The Mexican Revolution, 1910-1914

PETER CALVERT

A study of the development of the revolution and the associated diplomatic conflict which arose between Britain and the United States. For the first time the British side is thoroughly examined from original documentary sources. $9.50

Previously published:

Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence, 1808-1833
SIMON COLLIER $11.00

Church Wealth in Mexico: A Study of the Juzgado de Capellanias, 1800-1856

M. P. COSTELOE

$5.50

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

32 East 57th Street, New York, N.Y. 10022

MILTON KATZ

ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL

Dealing primarily with post-war conflicts within the experience of the United Nations and the International Court of Justice, the former chief of the Marshall Plan in Europe explores whether and to what extent decisions by international tribunals have been significant, or may yet be significant, for the settlement of international disputes, $4.95

A Theoretical Approach and a Brazilian Case Study

DEVELOPMENT

THE RELEVANCE OF INTERNATIONAL ADJUDICATION

Mr. Jaguaribe provides a theoretical discussion of the political requirements of economic development and a detailed analysis of the development process in Brazil from the colonial phase until today, then compares Brazil's experiences with those of other Latin American countries. $5.75

ISAAĆ KRAMNICK

HELIO

JAGUARIBE

BOLINGBROKE AND HIS CIRCLE

The Politics of Nostalgia in the Age of Walpole

Mr. Kramnick revises traditional interpretations to show that Bolingbroke's political attitudes can be regarded as a product of his economic and social position, and in the process presents an enlightening analysis of English thought in the Augustan Age. Harvard Political Studies. $6.95

FREDERICK GRIMKE John William Ward, Editor

THE NATURE AND TENDENCY OF FREE INSTITUTIONS

First published in 1848, Grimke's book, says the editor in his informative introduction, "deserves comparison with Tocqueville's...Democracy in America, and is in certain ways superior. It is the single best book written by an American in the 19th century on the meaning of our political way of life." The John Harvard Library. $12.50

In Canada/Saunders of Toronto, Ltd.

France, Germany, and the New Europe, 1945-1967 F. Roy Willis

Revised and Expanded Edition. First published in 1965, covering the period 1945-1963. "[Willis'] history of the events leading up to Franco-German cooperation and his detailing of the problems faced are thorough and scholarly. In fact, if one is looking for a work that has the mark of excellence on its every page he need look no farther. . . . This is a superb book."—World Affairs. $12.50

Politics and the Labor Movement in Latin America

Victor Alba

A comprehensive history of the Latin American labor movement with emphasis on the political factors, both national and international, that have so largely shaped and been shaped by the movement's course. The original Spanish text, published in 1964, has been corrected, reorganized, updated, and edited for this English edition, and the author has added a chapter on the probable future of the Latin American labor movement.

Social Welfare in the Soviet Union Bernice Q. Madison

Based on over ten years of research and observation, this is the first comprehensive study of Soviet welfare policies and practices from 1917 to the present. It includes an analysis of the relationship between Soviet welfare policies and Marxist theory, a description of the institutional framework of the Soviet welfare system, and several case studies providing illustration of present policies.

August. About $8.50

The Uniting of Europe

POLITICAL, SOCIAL, AND ECONOMIC FORCES, 1950-1957

Ernst B. Haas

A Reissue, with a new Preface. "It is a pleasure to say without equivocation that this work . . . is not only by far the richest book on the unification movement in Western Europe . . . but also a significant theoretical contribution to the study of community formation across national boundaries. The book represents a most impressive combination of meticulous empirical and imaginative theoretical effort."—

The Annals.

$12.50

Order from your bookstore, please

STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

California's Prodigal Sons

Hiram Johnson and the Progressives, 1911-1917

Spencer C. Olin, Jr.

The years 1911-1917—the span of Hiram Johnson's governorship—were among the most exciting and important in the political history of California. Mr. Olin examines Johnson's role as a popular and effective reform governor whose policies were significant in shaping the content of California politics and government for years to come. The book stresses the entrepreneurial aspects of Progressivism and places a special focus on what might be called the "scientific management" of state social and economic problems. A subsidiary theme is the intense battle between conservatives and progressives—a battle that culminated in the fateful Hughes campaign of 1916. Mr. Olin has been able to draw on manuscript materials—including the Hiram Johnson Papers—that were unavailable fifteen years ago. $6.95

The Problem of Restoration

A Study in Comparative Political History

Robert A. Kann

In this major work, a distinguished historian discusses the implications of the replacement of an established socio-political system by a revolutionary one and its subsequent re-establishment. Can such a system be restored without having to adjust to the social change that accompanied the intermediate revolutionary period? And if such adjustment is feasible, will it not destroy the relationship between the original and the re-established system and thus put genuine restoration beyond reach?

Professor Kann, in his examination of these and related questions, gives a series of penetrating case studies ranging from the return of the Jews to their homeland after the Babylonian captivity to the establishment of the second German empire under Bismarck.

$15.00

Indian Foreign Policy in Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam, 1947-1964

D. R. SarDesai

In this analysis of India's attitude toward the states of former French Indochina, an area of crucial interest to the world's powers, Mr. SarDesai provides us with important insights into Nehru's policy toward neutralized Laos, non-aligned Cambodia, West-allied South Vietnam, and Communist-allied North Vietnam. Of particular interest is the treatment of the change in India's policy after the outbreak of hostilities with China in 1962 and of India's position as Chairman of the International Control Commission.

SUMMER $10.00

THE

ATLANTIC

(a body of water with land on each side)

COMMUNITY

(a body of nations having political, economic and social interests in common)

QUARTERLY

(a publication issued four times a year)

THE ATLANTIC COMMUNITY QUARTERLY: a publication whose articles represent the best current thought on both sides of the Atlantic concerning the problems and prospects of developing a true Community.

A PARTIAL LISTING OF THE CONTENTS OF THE SPRING ISSUE:

NATO and a Changing Europe by Lester B. Pearson . . . Relations Between Europe and America—A French Viewpoint by Leo Hamon . . . Soviet Security and the West by Altiero Spinelli . . . The high Price of Europeanism by Douglas Jay plus others as well as source material, letters to the editor and bibliography of important books.

THE ATLANTIC COMMUNITY QUARTERLY

1616 H Street, Northwest-Washington, D.C. 20006, U.S.A.

Please enter my subscription as checked below:
☐ 1 year	$5 □ 2 yea	rs $9 🔲 3	years $12
(Add $1 per year for delivery outside the United States, its possessions and Canada)
	☐ Payment Enclosed	☐ Bill me	•
Name		•
Address

NEW & RECENT POLITICAL SCIENCE TEXTS from PERGAMON

GUIDE TO CONTEMPORARY POLITICS N.C. Dexter and E.G. Revner

An unusual stimulating and up to the minute survey of the British political scene. This text explains the ideas and methods of operation of democratic government. It sketches in the aims and policies of the four main parties, adopting the dialogue approach.

"This is a rewarding book on British political scene."—Professor I.H. Khan, Skidmore College, New York 1966 332 pp.

flexi-covered $3.95

THE EMERGENCE OF THE EASTERN WORLD

Seven essays on political ideas from 1200 to 1500 G.L. Seldler

This text will meet the need for an authoritative survey and assessment of Eastern political thought and ideas between the 13th and 16th centuries. The author describes the ideas against the broad socio-economic background and explains their effect on history. The book should produce a greater insight and understanding of the problems now facing Eastern countries. 1968 280 pp. $11.00

WESTMINSTER WORKSHOP

A Student's Guide to the British Constitution Second Edition

R.K. Mosley

This is a completely revised and enlarged edition of a work which has quickly become established as a textbook for British Constitution students. It has been recommended by several authorities and adopted by many universities.

1967 230 pp. flexi-covered $4.00

ASPECTS OF BRITISH POLITICS 1904-1919
D. Collins
1966 372 pp. flexi-covered $5.00

TOWARD

INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

S. Lewis 1966

vis 332 pp. flexi-covered $4.50

THE UNITED NATIONS

AND WORLD REALITIES

M.J. Lee

1966 255 pp.

flexi-covered $3.95

PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

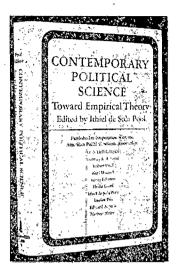

A.J. Anthony Morris

1967 200 pp.

flexi-covered $3.50

For copies on approval write College Division PERGAMON PRESS, INC. 44-01/21st Street Long Island City, N.Y. 11101

"What relevance, if any, does the 2,000-year heritage of political theory have today?"

—from the Foreword to Contemporary Political Science

Published in Cooperation with the American Political Science Association . . .

CONTEMPORARY POLITICAL SCIENCE: Toward Empirical Theory

Edited by Ithiel de Sola Pool, Massachusetts Institute of Technology. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science.

The state of the art in political theory is discussed in this important collection of statements by the country's outstanding political scientists. The following papers delivered at the 1966 Plenary Session of the American Political Science Association explore the relevance of the heritage of political theory for modern political science and illustrate how modern behavioral political research has illuminated some of the great questions which political theorists have posed over the centuries. Gabriel A. Almond, Political Theory and Political Science; Robert A. Dahl, The Evolution of Political Systems; Karl Deutsch, Nation and World; Harry Eckstein, Political Science and Public Policy; Heinz Eulau, Changing Views of Representation; Ithiel de Sola Pool, The Public and the Polity; Lucian W. Pye, The Formation of New States; Edward Shils, Privacy and Power; Herbert A. Simon, The Changing Theory and Changing Practice of Public Administration.

Also From McGraw-Hill . . .

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY: Perspectives and Analysis

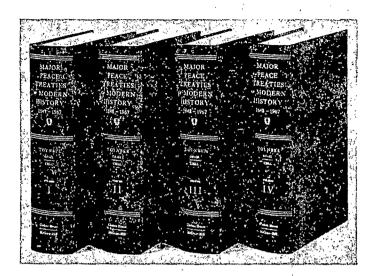

By William P. Gerberding, University of California, Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science.

ELEMENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, Seventh Edition

By John H. Ferguson, The Pennsylvania University; and Dean E. McHenry, University of California. Santa Cruz.

METHODOLOGY IN SOCIAL RESEARCH

Edited by Hubert M. Blalock, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill; and Ann B. Blalock.

"These four volumes contain the most important documents for studying the present worldwide network of international relations between local sovereign states."

—Arnold Toynbee

McGRAW-HILL BOOK COMPANY in association with CHELSEA HOUSE PUBLISHERS is proud to announce the publication of a truly significant reference work . . .

THE MAJOR PEACE TREATIES OF MODERN HISTORY: 1648-1967 Edited by Fred L. Israel, with Commentaries by Emanuel Chill Introductory Essay by Arnold Toynbee

4 volumes, over 3000 pages, 103 treaties, 40 pages of full-color maps, fully indexed, $110.

Compiled for the first time in one complete reference source — every significant international document of peace signed during the past 300 years . . .

The coverage provided by these books is exceptional in two important ways. First, the full texts of so many essential peace documents have never before been brought together in one convenient source. Secondly, of the treaties presented here, seventeen have never appeared before in English, and the majority can be found only in the State Papers of the participating nations. For example, the full text of the 1954 Geneva Accord which terminated French involvement in Vietnam has not been generally available until its inclusion in this comprehensive reference.

Covers the development of international relations from Westphalia to Tashkent . . .

From the decline of Hapsburg power and the ascendancy of France to the current division of world power between the United States and Russia, this detailed reference presents more than three centuries of international relations. It examines the modern epoch in terms of the treaties which embody its political evolution.

McGRAW-HILL BOOK COMPANY, 330 WEST 42ND STREET, NEW YORK, 10036

NEW BOOKS IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS —

CONFLICT AND PEACE IN THE MODERN INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM

EVAN LUARD, ST. ANTONY'S COLLEGE, OXFORD

The author, a British M. P., systematically surveys the types of behavior that cause international conflict, with emphasis on the period after World War II; and he analyzes the principal methods used to secure peace: disarmament and arms control. He then evaluates the various contemporary means for dealing with conflict: the United Nations, international law, and public opinion. An earlier version of the book was published as Peace and Opinion in 1962.

Paperbound 352 pages 5% x 81/4

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND POLITICAL CRISIS AN ANALYTIC CASEBOOK

LAWRENCE SCHEINMAN AND DAVID WILKINSON, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, LOS ANGELES

This is a book of penetrating case studies of six modern international crises: The Berlin Blockade, The Kashmir Dispute, The Suez Canal, Indonesia's Campaign to Crush Malaysia, The Cuban Missile Crisis, The Dispute over Financing the United Nations. Eight experts explore the relationship between international legal norms and eventual state action and analyze how law is actually used by states.

Paperbound 273 pages 53/8 x 81/4

INTERNATIONAL REGIONALISM READINGS

JOSEPH S. NYE, JR. HARVARD UNIVERSITY

This important collection of articles deals with the role, value, and future of today's many international regional organizations. The articles emphasize the variety of problems regionalism poses for current policy and for contemporary political theory. An incisive introduction, maps, and listings of major non-military groupings will help the student clarify the issues.

Paperbound 432 pages 53/8 x 81/4

LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY

34 BEACON STREET, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02106

POLITICAL THEORY:

A Conceptual Analysis

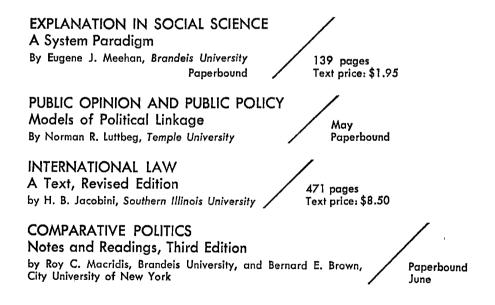

By JOSEPH S. MURPHY, Office of Educational Opportunity

This book is not a chronological record of political thinkers and political movements, and it does not suppose that the study of political theory necessarily involves or requires a parallel consideration of political events and historical institutions. It is written from the viewpoint of analytic philosophy and it construes political theory as an activity whose purpose is the clarification, analysis, and explication of political concepts. June.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE LEGAL SYSTEM

By JAY A. SIGLER, Rutgers, The State University

The author launches what he believes is a rescue operation for the study of public law. It is believed essential since an understanding of legal processes is central to the problems of social control and authoritative decision making. Emphasis is not on methodology; but on a clear and direct approach to the legal system. July

Published in the Dorsey Series in Political Science

Consulting Editor: NORTON E. LONG,

Brandeis University

Homewood, Illinois

DORSEY

PRESS

NEW

from

POVERTY AND POLITICS

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

Sidney Baldwin

Inspired history of a controversial New Deal agency. This meticulously documented case study captures the essence and passions of the era when the agency's bold innovations in behalf of chronically poor sharecroppers and tenant farmers rubbed many political nerves raw. Subjected to bitter and unremitting attack the agency was an important symbol of the period and provides interesting analogies to the problems of poverty today. 400 pages. Illustrated with photographs by famous photographers of the period.

448 pages

$10.00

THE DYNAMIC OF MEXICAN NATIONALISM

Frederick C. Turner

After a thorough study of the hundred years before the Revolution the book focuses on the effects of the Revolution on social groups, the manifestations of a nineteenth-century xenophobia, and the ways in which literature and the arts promoted the Mexican nationalistic spirit which has deeply influenced the country's society, economy, and political system.

344 pages

$8.50

THE POLITICS OF EXILE

PARAGUAY'S FEBRERISTA PARTY

Paul H. Lewis

This behavioral analysis of party organization illuminates the process of institutionalizing a revolutionary ideal. The workings of the party, its ideology, its formal organization, and the patterns of relations among its leaders are explicated and related to the more general literature on political parties.

200 pages

$6.00

NORTH CAROLINA POLITICS

AN INTRODUCTION

Jack D. Fleer

A comprehensive, concise analysis of the structure and nature of North Carolina politics. Delineating the complexities of a rapidly evolving political structure the book is a model study of a state's political workings.

168 pages

cloth, $4.95—paper, $2.45

At bookstores or from the publisher

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS Chapel Hill, North Carolina 27514

ATHERTON PRESS

70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10011

Available this Summer

POLITICS AND SOCIETY

ROBERT M. MACIVER

Edited by DAVID SPITZ Ohio State University

This carefully integrated selection of essays represents the most significant statements MacIver has made on ethics and politics, society and the state, government and political change, war and peace, and the conditions of a viable international order. Here for the first time are a number of unpublished and highly important works on the passions and their relation to morals, the social and political ideas of Bertrand Russell, Mein Kampf, the art of contemplation, as well as the striking exchange of letters between MacIver and Bernard Bosanquet on political theory. In his introduction, David Spitz assesses the importance of MacIver's teachings and relates each essay within the broad context of his political and social thought. The total work serves to dramatize the astonishing versatility and incisiveness of the mind of a great social scientist over a period of sixty years.

THE POWER OF THE PRESIDENCY

Concepts and Controversy

ROBERT S. HIRSCHFIELD Hunter College of the City University of New York

The essence of the American Presidency is its power. How powerful is the President? Does he have sufficient power to meet today's needs, or do the problems of the nuclear age demand a more powerful executive? Is there a danger of dictatorship in the growth of presidential authority, or will it remain an office of constitutional democratic leadership? The scope, limitations, accomplishments, and possibilities of the most important political office in the world are viewed from a variety of contemporary and historical standpoints. The result is a highly topical, lively, and provocative approach to one of the most critical issues of our time. $8.95

THE SOVIET SYSTEM AND MODERN SOCIETY

GEORGE FISCHER Columbia University

This book presents a serious challenge to prevailing theories of modernization throughout the world. The notion that non-Western countries may well become fully modern without adopting a pluralist model of society is examined in the context of the Soviet Union. The author's conclusions are relevant to many aspects of social change in communist, authoritarian, and emergent nations. $7.50

A 20% PROFESSIONAL DISCOUNT and free postage and handling on all orders accompanied by payment. Write Department R, Atherton Press, Inc., 70 Fifth Avenue. New York, N.Y. 10011.

FORO INTERNACIONAL

Revista trimestral publicada por El Colegio de Mexico

Vol. VIII

Núm. 1

Articulos

INDICE

Ruy Mauro Marini y Olga Pellicer de Brody, Militarismo y Desnuclearización en América Latina. El Caso de Brasil.

Wolfgang König, América Latina y la Cooperación Monetaria Internacional. Peter Sturm, El Crecimiento Económico en Alemania Occidental y Oriental. César Sepúlveda, Reflexiones sobre la Alianza Para el Progreso.

Crítica de Libros Libros Recibidos

Suscripción anual: US $5.00 (franqueo incluido) Ejemplar suelto: US $1.25 (franqueo incluido) Colección completa Vols. I-VII US $35.00

Suscripciones y correspondencia a:

FORO INTERNACIONAL
EL COLEGIO DE MÉXICO
GUANAJUATO 125 • MÉXICO 7, D. F.

Checklist of SOUTHEAST ASIAN Serials

Southeast Asia Collection, Yale University Library

Estimated 5,000 cards reproduced in 1 volume Prepublication price: $25.00; after January 31, 1969: $30.00

Catalog of the AFRICAN COLLECTION

Northwestern University Library, Evanston, Illinois

28,300 cards reproduced in 2 volumes

Price: $120.00

Index to

LATIN AMERICAN PERIODICAL LITERATURE, 1929-1960

Compiled in the Columbus Memorial Library of the Pan American Union, Washington, D.C.

Estimated 45,000 cards reproduced in 2 volumes

Price: $105.00

10% additional charge on orders outside the U.S.

Descriptive material on these titles and a complete catalog of publications are available on request.

G. K. HALL & CO.

70 Lincoln Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02111

Peace

ARMS CONTROL FOR THE LATE SIXTIES

Edited by James E. Dougherty and J. F. Lehman, Jr., both of the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania. 1967, 312 pages, $8.50.

Student Edition also available in paperback.

The editors have selected essays written by twenty-seven of the world's leading authorities on the technical, strategic, and political aspects of disarmament negotiation and arms control policies.

People

ISLAM IN AFRICA

James Kritzeck, University of Notre Dame and William H. Lewis, Division of Research and Analysis for North and East Africa, Department of State and George Washington University Fall 1968 and George Washington University. Fall 1963.

Islam in Africa is a general survey of the remarkable success that the Islamic religion is registering in Sub-Saharan Africa. Extensive attention is devoted to the contemporary scene in selected countries, particularly Nigeria, Uganda, the Congo, and Cameroon. Various sects and religious fraternities are also examined.

Politics

CONSTITUTIONS AND CONSTITUTIONALISM,

Third Edition

Edited by William G. Andrews, State University College, Brockport, N. Y. Fall 1968, about $1.95 (paper).

A new statistical appendix and the first English translation of the 1966 amendments to the Statutes of the CPSU are among the additions to this forthcoming Third Edition. Also, the texts of the French, West German, and Soviet constitutions incorporate all amendments enacted by April 15, 1968. This is an ideal text for courses in comparative government and comparative law.

CONGRESSIONAL ETHICS:

The Conflict of Interest Issue

Robert S. Getz, Kent State University. 1967, $1.95 (paper).

New Perspectives in Political Science—16

Recommended Use: Courses in American Government, Political Parties, Legislative Process, American Political Behavior, Congress, Introduction to Political Science—an ideal supplementary text.

AMERICAN LEGISLATIVE BEHAVIOR:

Selected Readings

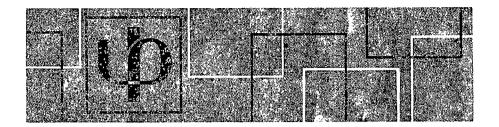

Edited by Samuel C. Patterson, University of Iowa. Fall 1968, about $5.95 (paper).

Some of the best research from professional political science journals on legislative behavior in the United States have been selected and organized with introductory notes by the editor.

Van Nostrand Political Science Series Franklin L. Burdette, General Editor

Send for your on-approval copies. Write College Department indispensable for the coming elections . . .

NATIONAL PARTY PLATFORMS 1840-1964

THIRD EDITION

compiled by Kirk H. Porter and Donald Bruce Johnson

Here is the only complete collection of American political party platforms in existence. The compilers of the volume have made it possible to answer virtually any question about national party platforms, from their beginning through the 1964 elections, by assembling authenticated copies of all the platforms of the major parties—and of the principal minor parties. They have taken account of the size of the group, its relative permanence, and its historical significance. All parties which have seemed to be of consequence by these standards are included in this unique barometer of opinion in American political history.

698 pages. $10.75.

Reviewers' comments about this and previous editions include:

"This is an important and indispensable reference volume . . . important data for the social scientist is encapsulated in these campaign documents despite our well-known impatience with platform equivocation in national political life."—The American Political Science Review.

"For students of American politics in general, and of the minor parties in particular, this is an important service."—Political Science Quarterly.

"In no other single reference work are the authenticated platforms of both the major and minor political parties available. The political researcher and writer will welcome this volume."—Human Events.

"There is a little something for every political researcher in this book, be he Democrat, Republican, Communist or Greenback."—Washington Post and Times Herald.

Just published ...

The Information Machine

The United States Information Agency and American Foreign Policy

Robert E. Elder

An examination in depth of the purpose, function, organization, and operation of USIA, its role in and relation to American foreign policy, and its decision-making processes, this pioneer study covers the period from 1963 to 1967 and USIA under three directors, Edward R. Murrow, Carl Rowan, and Leonard Marks. $10.00

Toward Strategies for Public Administration Development in Latin America

John C. Honey

Preface by Fred W. Riggs. Commentaries by Peter D. Bell, Richard A. Fehnel, James R. Himes, and George Sutija

Examining the problems faced by Latin American countries in their efforts to improve their administrative capabilities, the author stresses the relation of administrative development to the modernization process and makes concrete proposals for programs to be undertaken by individual countries or by regions.

The commentaries relate the proposals to the situations in Brazil, Chile, Peru, and Venezuela. $5.75

International Organization in the Western Hemisphere

Edited, with Introduction, by Robert W. Gregg

A former U.S. ambassador to the Council of the OAS, a British historian, a Mexican economist, and an American political scientist explore many aspects of inter-American organization—its development, its relation to peace and security and to Latin-American political, economic, and social development, and the impact of U.S. dominance in inter-American relations. Texts of major treaties and agreements are included in this thoughtful and timely study.

$6.95

From your bookseller or Syracuse University Press
Syracuse, New York 13210

Book News from Macmillan

A Bill Becomes A Law:

Congress Enacts Civil Rights Legislation, Second Edition By the late Daniel M. Berman, The American University

The way in which a bill proceeds through Congress to become law is the subject of this revised edition, illustrated by the Civil Rights Acts of 1960 and 1964. The student is able to compare the factors that resulted in a weak bill of 1960 with those that contributed to the strong 1964 bill.

1966, 146 pages, paper, $1.95

The Consent of the Governed, Second Edition By John C. Livingston and Robert G. Thompson, both, Sacramento State College

The Second Edition of this successful text has been sharpened and clarified by establishing—in the first four chapters—the democratic frame of reference needed before proceeding to an examination of American practices and institutions. The authors then pose questions about the nature of democracy and present their answers as well as those propounded by liberal, conservative, and "brokerage" theory.

1966, 591 pages, $7.95

The Dynamics of International Politics, Second Edition By Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Colonel George A. Lincoln, United States Military Academy

Shifting relationships within the power blocs, accelerated technological change, the mounting world population, agitation for nationhood and economic betterment, the slow progress toward larger community—these and other vital elements of the international political environment receive detailed consideration in the extensively rewritten and updated Second Edition of a successful and widely adopted text.

1967, 617 pages, $8.95

The Soviet State

By Ellsworth Raymond, New York University

This new text provides a thorough analysis of the economics, politics, government, and history of the Soviet Union from the revolution to the Brezhnev-Kosygin regime. The author discusses Soviet political and economic geography, administration of foreign policy, non-governmental mass organizations, and many other subjects. Lively details, personal anecdotes and unusual photographs highlight the text. Each chapter contains a list of suggested readings.

1968, 462 pages, $7.95

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

866 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10022

In Canada, write to Collier-Macmillan Canada, Ltd., 55 York Street, Toronto 1, Ontario

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Books of Interest

Forging World Order: The Politics of International Organization

By Jack C. Plano, Western Michigan University, and

Robert E. Riggs, University of Minnesota

This textbook investigates modern international organization by drawing upon a process and an institutional and problems approach to political behavior. This synthesis of approaches reveals to students the interaction of political institutions and the individuals who shape them. Emphasizing the problems and institutions of the 1960's, the authors discuss the setting for the contemporary scene, the international organization as a political process, and the problem-solving aspect of global and regional organization.

1967, 600 pages, $8.95

Politics, Economics, and Power: Ideology and Practice Under Capitalism, Socialism, Communism, and Fascism

By Nathaniel Stone Preston, The American University

"A real contribution to the teaching literature, for both comparative government and comparative economic systems courses."

—Professor Michael D. Reagan, University of California, Riverside This well-written book analyzes the major politico-economic systems which dominate the world today: capitalism, socialism, communism, and fascism. The author begins by providing a brief history of the development of political and economic forces in Western civilization. Chapters which follow describe the four major ideologies, each beginning with a review and then proceeding to contemporary objectives and operating principles of the ideology under discussion.

1967, 242 pages, paper, $2.95

Politics U.S.A.: Cases on the American Democratic Process

Second Edition

By Andrew M. Scott and Earle Wallace, both, University of North Carolina

Each selection in this book represents the study of a given case in the democratic process and provides the student with insight into the actual working of American politics. 1965, 576 pages, paper, $4.75

The United Nations: International Organization and Administration Edited by Maurice Waters, Wayne State University

"Though addressed to students this collection of speeches and papers topically arranged will also appeal to the general reader who would like varied views on the U.N."

—Booklist, September 15, 1967

This valuable collection contains readings, sources, speeches, and documents relating to all phases of the United Nations. Set in the context of the historical development and the theoretical considerations of international organizations, the material is structured to show both the external and internal features of the U.N. 1967, 583 pages, paper, $4.95

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

866 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10022

In Canada, write to Collier-Macmillan Canada, Ltd., 55 York Street, Toronto 1, Ontario

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

. Vol 35 no 1 Spring 1968

SOCIAL RESEARCH

An International Quarterly

FOCUS—TRENDS AND ISSUES IN AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE

The Behavioral Movement in Political Science: A Personal Document

Systems Theory and Political Science

On the Use of Functional Analysis in American Political Science

The New Political Economy

Political Socialization and Political Theory

A Critique of Current Studies on Political Development and Modernization

Social Science and Political Reality: The Problem of Explanation

The International Scene—Current Trends in the Social Sciences

Economic Systems in Search of Nations

Heinz Eulau Morton Kaplan Martin Landau William C. Mitchell

James Steintrager

Chong-Do Hab and Jeanne Schneider

John G. Gunnell

Jahangir Amuzegar

EDITORIAL AND BUSINESS OFFICE

New School for Social Research 66 West Twelfth Street, New York 10011, N. Y.

Subscriptions. $10.00 a year, domestic and foreign Single copies—$2.50

SOCIAL RESEARCH is published quarterly by the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science of the New School for Social Research, and appears in Spring, Sammer, Autumn and Winter issues. All correspondence concerning manuscripts should be addressed to Dr. Peter L. Berger.

March, 1968

COMMUNIST CHINA

The Domestic Scene: 1949-1967

by

Peter Tang and Joan Maloney cloth, $10.00

Also Available:

C. Y. Cheng, Communist China's Economy, 1949-1962 cloth, $5.00

Mandarin Chinese Dictionary Series English-Chinese

Chinese-English

paper. $5.50 ea.

Chinese Language Textbook Series Three Sets, Twelve Volumes

SETON HALL UNIVERSITY PRESS, SOUTH ORANGE, N. J.

Four studies, timely and penetrating . . . inaugurating a new series on

INTEGRATION AND COMMUNITY BUILDING IN EASTERN EUROPE

The unifying theme of the series is the relations of the communist-ruled countries of Eastern Europe with other communist party states.

Written by an authority on the individual country treated, each study assesses the degree, rate, and direction of integration of the country with other communist countries. Each author carries his analysis through five historical periods:

- · the pre-communist background
- the period of the communists' consolidation of power after World War II
- the repression and rigid controls of the Stalin era
- the period of relaxed controls following Stalin's death
- the last ten years.

The historical, geographic, social, economic, and political characteristics of the country are described and analyzed. Periods and events are emphasized which have the greatest significance for the country examined.

Though published in a series, each book is complete in itself, a full and penetrating analysis of the subject country.

General Editor: Jan F. Triska, Professor of Political Science, Stanford University, and Director of the University's program of Studies of the Communist System.

THE GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

Arthur M. Hanhardt, Jr., University of Oregon

$6.00 cloth / $2.45 paper

THE POLISH PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC

James F. Morrison, University of Florida

$6.50 cloth / $2.95 paper

THE DEVELOPMENT OF SOCIALIST YUGOSLAVIA

M. George Zaninovich, University of Oregon

$6.50 cloth / $2.95 paper

THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF ALBANIA

Nicholas C. Pano, Western Illinois University

$6.50 cloth / $2.95 paper

Additional studies, coming early in 1969, will focus on BULGARIA, CZECHOSLO-VAKIA, HUNGARY, and RUMANIA.

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND 21218

Forthcoming

Securing the Blessings of Liberty THE CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

Revised Edition

By Arthur N. Holcombe, Emeritus, Harvard University Introduction by Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey

Written by one of the nation's foremost authorities on the genesis and development of the American constitutional system, this book focuses upon the crucial need for preserving and enhancing the benefits of a living Constitution within the context of a swiftly changing and complex world. Discussions on the activity of Congress, the decisions of the Supreme Court, and the increasing authority of the Executive, are both timely and provocative. Scott, Foresman American Government Series. Ready in August, approx. 207 pages, softbound: $2.25, hardbound: $4.25

CONSTITUTIONALISM AND POLITICS Conflict and Consensus

Edited by C. Peter Magrath, University of Nebraska

The nature of a living constitution is explored in readings which emphasize the influence of Federal Supreme Court and judicial decisions, the President, Congress, parties, administrative bureaus, interest groups, and shifting public opinion on the historical development and evolving interpretation of the United States Constitution. Scott, Foresman American Government Readings Series. Ready in August, approx. 208 pages, softbound, prob. $2.95

THE SUPREME COURT AND PUBLIC POLICY

Edited by MARTIN M. SHAPIRO, University of California, Irvine

This reader presents the Supreme Court as a political institution. It utilizes court decisions, scholarly writings, and empirical research to provide a carefully balanced view of the institution and its historical background. Inner operation and its relationship to the general public and to other political institutions are emphasized. Scott, Foresman American Government Readings Series. Ready late Fall, approx. 192 pages, softbound, preb. $2.25

SCOTT, FORESMAN AND COMPANY College Division

Glenview, Illinois Atlanta Dallas Palo Alto Oakland, N.J.

Legal Order in a Violent World

RICHARD A. FALK

Professor Myres S. McDougal of the Yale Law School calls this examination of the relation of law and violence in contemporary international society "... a profound, perceptive, and eloquent contribution to the most important problem of our time." Professor Falk places great emphasis on two distinctive challenges to world order—nuclear weapons and civil strife. Published for the Center of International Studies, Princeton University.

$15.00

West Bengal and the Federalizing Process in India

MARCUS F. FRANDA

Professor Franda deals with the complexities of India's federalizing experience by analyzing the politics of center-state relations as they affect one Indian state, West Bengal. He explores the various ways in which central and state leadership groups in India and West Bengal have developed working relationships and examines the effect of state and regional political, economic, and social conditions on the evolution of center-state behavior patterns. $7.50

Politics and Statecraft in the Kingdom of Greece, 1833-1843

JOHN ANTHONY PETROPULOS

Three foreign oriented political parties, Russian, French, and English, emerged during the Greek Revolutionary period from 1821-1827 and played a prominent role in Greek politics until the 1850's. The author seeks to determine the membership and role of the parties under a non-constitutionalist regime at a time when the basic structure of the Greek state was being created. $17.50

Princeton University Press

Princeton, New Jersey 08540

$|F_{p}|$

Coming in June, 1968 . . .

THE STUDY OF POLICY FORMATION

Edited by Raymond A. Bauer, Harverd University, and Kenneth J. Gergen, *Swarthmore College*Foreword by Robert C. Wood

Professors Bauer and Gergen have made a major contribution to the study of a complex social process—policy formation—by bringing together nine original, empirically oriented papers. The essays provide critical reviews of approaches to the subject, consider the methodology of research in policy-making, and examine a number of areas of decision-making. Together, they provide a synthesis of past study and a ready reference to modern techniques of examination.

CONTENTS

The Study of Policy Formation: An Introduction—R. A. Bauer. Public Policy and Normative Economic Theory—R. Zeckhauser and E. Shaefer. Descriptive Decision Theory from the "Administration" Viewpoint—J. L. Bower. The State of the Art in Policy Studies—E. C. B. Schoettle. Assessing the Leverage Points in the Process of Policy Formation—K. J. Gergen. Methodology in the Study of Policy Formation—K. J. Gergen. Urban Mass Transportation: A Survey of the Decision-Making Process—L. M. Schneider. The Problem of Technology Transfer—E. E. Furash. The Role of Information in Decision-Making on Foreign Aid—T. Geiger and R. D. Hansen. Index.

June, 1968

416 pages

$9.95 tent.

THE AGE OF INDUSTRIALISM IN AMERICA Essays in Social Structure and Cultural Values Edited by Frederic Cople Jaher, University of Chicago

With the response to industrialism as a basic perspective, this interdisciplinary collection of twelve critical essays analyzes various facets of American life from the post-Civil War years to the present.

CONTENTS

Introduction. Economic Growth and Change in the United States Under Laissez Faire: 1870-1920—H. Ross. Industrialism and Political Leadership: A Case Study of the United States Senate—A. Hoogenboom. Immigration and Political Life—M. Parenti. The Negro's Response—A. Lane. Atlanta in the Progressive Era: A Dreyfus Affair in Georgia—L. Dinnerstein. Metropolism and Urban Elites in the Far West—G. Barth. The Boston Brahmins in the Age of Industrial Capitalism—F. G. Jaher. Class, Status, and Community Power in Nineteenth Century American Industrial Cities. Paterson, New Jersey: A Case Study—H. G. Gutman. Career Leadership and American Trade Unionism—D. Brody. Horatio Alger, Jr., and the Response to Industrialism—R. Weiss. America on Display: The World's Fairs of 1876, 1893, and 1933—J. G. Cawelti. Protestantism's Response to Social Change: 1890-1930—D. Reimers. Index.

June, 1968

approx. 410 pages

$8.95

Just Published . . .

THE KOREAN DECISION June 24-30, 1950

By Glenn D. Paige, University of Hawaii Introduction by Richard C. Snyder

This hour-by-hour case study of a crucial decision documents seven days of deliberation that led to three years of war and the death of more than 33,000 Americans in Korea. It includes a wealth of new material drawn from extensive interviews with President Truman and other United States policy makers. In addition, the author discusses earlier East-West confrontations and provides the first application of the decision-making approach to the study of foreign policy as presented in Foreign Policy Decision Making, edited by Richard C. Snyder, H. W. Bruck, and Burton Sapin (The Free Press, 1962).

Just Published

419 pages

cloth, $6.95

paperbound text edition, $3.95

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION A Reinterpretation of the Intentions of the Founding Fathers By Paul Eidelberg, North Carolina State University, Raleigh Foreword by Herbert J. Storing Virtually every major controversy in American politics involves the Constitution. This philosophical reconstruction of the debates of the Constitutional Convention portrays the Founding Fathers' hopes for the nation and demonstrates the relevance of their thought to the problems of our times. Through an original application of multi-level analysis Professor Eidelberg portrays the regime envisioned by the Founders, the kind of men intended to be its leaders, and the purposes they were intended to serve.

Just Published

355 pages

cloth, $6.95

paperbound text edition, $2.95

THE ACTIVE SOCIETY A Theory of Societal and Political Processes By Amitai Etzioni, Columbia University

An active society is master of its technology and lives with and through perpetual change. Describing today's conflicts between society and its tools, this provocative volume reveals how societies and basic human values can be preserved in the post-modern period. Professor Etzioni depicts an active society as one that is responsive to its changing membership and is engaged in intensive and perpetual self-transformation. In presenting his theory he combines political and sociological analytic perspectives with an historical approach. From these viewpoints he offers postulates and hypotheses which serve as the basis for a theoretical framework within which additional propositions can be formulated and data codified.

Just Published

723 pages

$11.95 more from The Free Press >

$\widehat{|F_P|}$

An Original Paperbound Series . . .

THE SUPREME COURT IN AMERICAN LIFE General Editor: Samuel Krislov, University of Minnesota

Designed as a general introduction to the political, social, and economic consequences of Supreme Court decisions, The Supreme Court in American Life series illuminates the nature and scope of the highest court in the United States. Each volume examines and clarifies the Court's role in one well-defined area of American life, and highlights the far-reaching political, economic, and human implications of the Court's work.

THE SUPREME COURT AND POLITICAL FREEDOM By Samuel Krislov, University of Minnesota

The freedom of political expression as guaranteed by the First Amendment is the subject of this volume. In addition to discussing specific cases and legal approaches, the study is placed in a philosophical and historical context.

CONTENTS: Introduction. An Elite Instrumentality of a Democratic Society. Liberty in the Views of Historians and the Works of Judges. Constitutional Developments and Political Freedom. Issues and Dilemmas. The Power of the Court. The Court and the Public. A Note on Further Reading. Table of Cases. Index.

1968 249 pages $2.95

THE SUPREME COURT AND AMERICAN CAPITALISM By Arthur Selwin Miller, George Washington University

Professor Miller's study examines how the Supreme Court has handled questions concerning American capitalism in the past, and how it is likely to proceed in the future. Major attention is accorded the rise of the "Positive State" and the growth of multinationalism in corporate affairs.

CONTENTS: Preface. Corporate America. Constitutional Doctrine and the Consolidation of Corporate Power. Constitutional Revolution Consolidated: The Rise of the Positive State. The Need for a New Constitutional Theory. An Industrial America in an Industrial World. The Desuetude of the Supreme Court? Epilogue. A Note on Further Reading. Table of Cases. Index. 1968 271 pages $2.95

THE SUPREME COURT AND ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES By Martin Shapiro, University of California, Irvine

Here is an analysis of the relations between the Supreme Court and the federal administrative agencies. The author disputes the traditional view that courts and agencies are inherently different types of institutions with different roles.

CONTENTS: Introduction. Courts and Agencies. Administrative Law. The Supreme Court and the Patent Office. The Supreme Court and the Federal Power Commission. Conclusion. A Note on Further Reading. Table of Cases. Index.

1968

298 pages

$2.95

THE FREE PRESS

A Division of The Macmillan Company 866 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

New and recent

POLITICS IN TRANSITIONAL SOCIETIES: The Challenge of Change in Asia, Africa, and Latin America

Edited by HARVEY G. KEBSCHULL, North Carolina State University at Raleigh. "Excellent" — "Well-organized"— "The best paperback of readings in comparative politics of the developing nations"—are among early comments on this fine volume.

March 1968 435 pages 3 maps paperback $4.95

WORLD TENSIONS: Conflict and Accommodation

ELTON ATWATER, KENT FORSTER, and JAN S. PRYBYLA, all of The Pennsylvania State University. "A remarkable compilation"—"Outstanding"—"Important, objective, timely"—sum up reaction to this recent book, already in wide use.

July 1967 396 pages illustrated paperback $3.95

CASES IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 3rd Edition

Edited by ROBERT E. CUSHMAN, National Historical Publications Commission; and ROBERT F. CUSHMAN, New York University. Completely revised, reset, and reorganized. The most thoroughgoing and up-to-date casebook available today.

August 1968 1104 pages $10.00 (tent.)

CASES IN CIVIL LIBERTIES

Edited by ROBERT F. CUSHMAN. An inexpensive paperback version of the second part of Cushman and Cushman's Cases in Constitutional Law, 3rd Edition.

August 1968 500 pages paperback $4.95 (tent.)

REMEMBER: Two annual Cushman supplements—1964-1966 and 1966-1967—already are in print. Each $.95. Also ready for fall use, a third supplement, 1967-1968.

Appleton-Century-Crofts

DIVISION OF MEREDITH CORPORATION

440 Park Avenue South, New York 10016

"an obscure new book"*

THE POLITICAL BELIEFS OF AMERICANS:

A STUDY OF PUBLIC OPINION

by Lloyd A. Free and Hadley Cantril

*"Considerable attention at Nixon's headquarters has been devoted to an obscure new book by Lloyd A. Free and Hadley Cantril. Using public opinion samplings, Free and Cantril conclude that Americans may be opposed to the welfare state in concept but accept it in fact. That is, they are "ideological conservatives" but not operational conservatives."—ROWLAND EVANS and ROBERT NOVAK, Inside Report

"I am extremely enthusiastic about the book. It provides an entirely new insight into the political orientation of Americans, especially into why some are conservatives and some are liberals... A book every student of politics should read and ponder."—GEORGE GALLUP, Founder, The Gallup Poll

"A very useful audit.... It probably gives in brief compass the most comprehensive picture of American public opinion as it is related to government and politics that we have today."—HARWOOD L. CHILDS, Editor, Public Opinion Quarterly

"... provides anyone concerned with politics an understanding of the patterns of political thought since the New Deal days which must be taken into account ... in estimating public opinion trends in the present and forecasting them in the future."—WILLIAM E. ROBERTS, Spencer-Roberts & Associates, Los Angeles

"The most useful book in showing how opinion research can chart the mainstreams of the public's political thought."—PAUL LAZARSFELD, Professor of Sociology, Columbia University

"Lloyd Free and Hadley Cantril... approach the study of public opinion with the dispassionate intrigue of first-class meteorologists surveying the elements.... The questions they are examing... are specific in application, but they go beyond tactics. They have to do with the relation of national policy to national purpose, with the cohesion and conflicts of debate, accommodation, and momentum within a society that prides itself on both diversity and unity. They have to do with the very nature of the American system."

-BILL D. MOYERS

Hadley Cantril is Chairman of the Board and Lloyd A. Free is Director of the Institute for International Social Research.

240 pages, tables, appendices, notes $10.00

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY PRESS

New Brunswick, New Jersey 08903

Federation of the West Indies

by Sir John Mordecai, C.M.G.

This history of federation in the British West Indies offers an incisive analysis of the reasons why federations have proved so unstable in the postwar world. The author brings into focus the years of negotiation and compromise leading to creation of the Federation in 1958, its collapse, and the resulting predicament of the islands.

476 pages $13.75

Russian Peasants and Soviet Power

by Moshe Lewin

The years 1928 and 1929 form a particularly significant period in Soviet history, one marked by tremendous forward thrust in industrialization, as well as by the mass collectivization of the peasantry. This study analyzes the problems of the period from the view of both the politician and the peasant.

556 pages $11.50

The Supreme Court and the News Media

by David L. Grey

Beginning with an analysis of the Supreme Court as a news source, the author traces the problems of the news media in reporting the facts and significance of Court opinions to various legal and lay publics.

194 pages $5.95

Northwestern University Press

1735 Benson Avenue

Evanston, Illinois 60201

NEWLY REORGANIZED:EDITORS:

GEORGE SHEPHERD
EZEKIEL MPHAHLELE

EXPANDED CONTENT ENTIRELY NEW FORMAT

AFRICA TODAY

subscriptions:	EDITO	DRIAL BOARD:	AFRICA TODAY
Student Rate $3.00	Robert Browne Kenneth Carstens	Fred Burk Stanley Diamond	e/o Grad Sahool
	Kenneth Carstens William H. Friedland	Collin Gonze	of Int'l Studies, Iniversity of Denver, nver, Colorado 80210 y Now Bill me
Z iears $5.50 Tilden	rge Houser Lemelle Joh	Betsy Landis Pa	y Now Bill me
	Rotberg James rnik Richard Ste	Scaritt /
Sheldon' Weeks'	Peter Weis Wallerstein
11111101100	i taminerardin	State	Zip Code

Law Without Sanctions

Order in Primitive Societies and the World Community by Michael Barkun

Drawing on the resources of jurisprudence and political science and on sociology, anthropology, and social psychology as well, Mr. Barkun proposes that primitive "stateless" societies and the contemporary international community—each without the sanctioning forces of police and courts deemed essential to municipal law—may well possess legal systems encompassing "law-with-order," although not necessarily "law-with-justice."

The Franco-Moroccan Conflict, 1943-1956

by Stéphane Bernard

This monumental case study of decolonization traces in detail the history of the Franco-Moroccan conflict and analyzes the sociological mechanisms involved in the severance of the protectorate from the mother country. A translation of volumes 1 and 2 of the 3-volume French edition, the work is published for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace as one of its Case Studies of International Conflicts.

Peasant Communism in Southern Italy

by Sidney G. Tarrow

Offering programs of land reform and regional rebirth, the Communist Party experienced a mixture of success and failure among the backward peasants of Southern Italy. Mr. Tarrow's analysis illuminates important elements of Italian society and politics but goes beyond this to examine problems of political development similar to those of Asia and Latin America.

$8.75

Party Democracy

Politics in an Italian Socialist Federation

by Samuel H. Barnes

Through an intensive empirical study of a single political party in an Italian province, Mr. Barnes investigates some broad theoretical questions of participation and democracy in political parties. The author brings to data analysis both the statistical tools of contemporary social science and the perception of a sensitive, informed scholar, providing in this book many leads for future research in political science. $7.50

Colombia: The Political Dimensions of Change

by Robert H. Dix

The central fact of political life in the developing nations is the process of modernization—the manner in which hierarchical social patterns and a narrow political base are altered by the demands of industrialization and urbanization. Mr. Dix characterizes the various regimes which have evolved in Colombia to meet the challenges of modernization, beginning with Alfonso Lopez' "revolution on the march" of 1934.

Yale University Press New Haven and London

New from the University of Chicago Press

China in Crisis

Volume I: China's Heritage and The Communist Political System Edited by Tang Tsou and Ping-ti Ho

Perhaps more than any other modern country, China offers a unique opportunity to examine the relationship between tradition and modernity, between continuity and change in political and social institutions. This two-volume major work explains both traditional and contemporary China as well as her position in the current crisis in international affairs. The papers assembled here were presented at the inaugural conference (1966-67) of the Center for Policy Study at the University of Chicago. With a foreword by Charles U. Daly.

1968 LC:68-20981 Volume I, 2 books $20.00

China in Crisis

Volume II: China's Policies in Asia and America's Alternatives Edited by Tang Tsou

The continuing debate in the United States over policies toward China and Vietnam provides a compelling occasion for re-examining the objectives and capabilities of Communist China and her relations with major countries in Asia. This second volume of papers presented at the Center for Policy Study conference discusses China's military strength; her diplomatic opportunities, capacities, and constraints in Asia; her growing contacts with Japan; and three alternative American policies toward China.

1968 LC:68-20981 $10.00

As A Tale That Is Told

The Autobiography of R. M. MacIver

One of America's foremost social scientists tells of his long, zestful life. Born on the Scottish island of Lewis, MacIver became Lieber Professor of political philosophy and sociology at Columbia. He has always been an opponent of the tendency to make sociology too scientific, to reduce the essence of human behavior to statistics. His views on people and governments, and controversies he engaged in are part of this narrative, together with tales of boyhood, student days, and teaching.

1968 LC:68-15632 264 pages, illus., $7.50

Angels in Marble

Working Class Conservatives in Urban England Robert McKenzie and Allan Silver

In a brilliant blend of historical analysis and sociological research, the authors have defined the roots of British working class conservatism—the belief that men of wealth and position are best fitted to serve "the national interest." The work will be of special interest to political scientists and sociologists concerned with Britain but will have wider appeal as a study of the very nature of democratic politics.

1968 LC:67-30555 304 pages, $11.00

Machine Politics

Harold F. Gosnell

This 1968 edition of the history of Chicago machine politics during the depression contains a new foreword by Theodore J. Lowi and a postscript by the author. Lowi looks at Gosnell's Chicago through the contemporary experience of New York. Gosnell's postscript gives a review of the main political events in Chicago since 1937. Both contend that Chicago's political system has undergone relatively few changes and that the basis for machine strength still exists.

1968 LC:68-16692 288 pages, $7.95 Paper, $3.45

University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

THE STRATEGY OF WORLD ORDER

A Set of Materials edited by

RICHARD FALK, Princeton University, and SAUL MENDLOVITZ, Rutgers Law School

Vol. I: Toward a Theory of War Prevention Vol. III: The United Nations

Foreword by Harold D. Lasswell

Foreword by Oscar Schachter

Vol. II: International Law

Foreword by Wolfgang Friedmann

Vol. IV: Disarmament and Economic Development

Foreword by J. David Singer

"Professors Falk and Mendlovitz have planned and executed a program designed to shape an academic discipline oriented toward the principal policy question of the epoch. It is entirely appropriate that such a program should spread among professional and graduate schools, and ultimately permeate college and pre-college years.

The tone is sternly professional. It is responsible, scholarly, scientific, predictive, inventive, and critical."

From the Foreword to Volume I by Harold D. Lasswell

Projected for 1968 publication: Volumes V and VI supported by The Carnegie Corporation.

Vol. V: Regionalism and World Order

Vol. VI: The Role of the Individual and World Order

Four volume set, paperbound $10.00; Hardcover $14.00; Volumes I and II, $2.50 each; Volumes III and IV $3.50 each. 2,296 pp.

WORLD LAW FUND 11 West 42nd Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

Cornell University Press

READINGS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Bill of Rights Reader

Leading Constitutional Cases—4th Edition

Edited by MILTON R. KONVITZ. "A noteworthy contribution to modern constitutional thought . . . indispensable to those who desire currency in their comprehension of rights, obligations, and powers of individuals and authorities," said the California Law Review in commenting on an earlier edition of this well-known book.

The fourth edition includes thirty new cases, some decided as recently as 1967. Many of these concern civil rights demonstrations, the right of privacy, censorship, the administration of criminal justice, and voting rights. The opinions of the court, together with concurring and dissenting opinions, have been skillfully chosen and edited for the light they shed on the significance of the controversies.

Cornell University Press 1THACA, NEW YORK 14850

Book Reprints in Political Science

CHAMBERLAIN, LAWRENCE H.	Available
Loyalty and Legislative Action A Survey of Activity by the New York State Legislature 1919-1949. (Cornell Studies in Civil Liberty)
COUNTRYMAN, VERN. Un-American Activities in the State of Washington. The Work of the Canwell Committee. Ithaca, 1951. (Cornell Studies in Civil Liberty)	Availablecloth $15.00
Great Britain in the World Economy. New York, 1946. (Reprints in Government and Political Science)	ilable Summer 1968
LASKI, H. J. The Dangers of Obedience and Other Essays. With a new introduction by Glenn R. Negley, Duke University. (Reprints in Government and Political Science)	ilable Summer 1968
MOWRY, ARTHUR MAY. The Dorr War; or, the Constitutional Struggle in Rhode Island. With an Introde Albert Bushnell Hart. Providence, 1901.
PHILLIPS, PAUL CHRISLER. The West in the Diplomacy of the American Revolution. Urbana [1913]. (Illinois. University. Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences. Vol. 2, no. 2/3
REIFF, PAUL FRIEDRICH. Friedrich Gentz, An Opponent of the French Revolution a Urbana-Champaign, Ill., 1912. (Illinois. University. Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences. Vol. 1, no. 4)	-
THOMPSON, CHARLES MANFRED. The Illinois Whigs before 1846. [Urbana, 1915]. (Illinois. University. Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences. Vol. 4, no. 1).	Available
U. S. CONTINENTAL CONGRESS. Secret Journals of Acts and Proceedings of Congress, from the first meeting thereof to dissolution of Confederation by ad Constitution of United States. Boston, 1821. 4 vols.	Available
WRIGHT, QUINCY. The Enforcement of International Law through Municipal Law in the United States. [Urbana, 1916]. (Illinois. University. Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences. Vol. v, no. 1)	Available
Many other titles in production or preparation. Please send for our deta REPRINTS IN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICAL SCIENCE.	illed brochure,

AND DERDING ASSOCIATION

JOHNSON REPRINT CORPORATION

111 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10003

JOHNSON REPRINT COMPANY LTD.

Berkeley Square House, London W.1, England

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

THE LATIN AMERICAN TRADITION

CHARLES WAGLEY

A collection of essays on the unity and diversity in Latin American society. The author discusses the set of traditions, institutional values, and patterns of behavior which are shared by most Latin Americans, stressing the persistence of traditional ways of thought and behavior patterns and their tenacity in the face of the dynamic social and economic changes now underway in Latin America. By describing the regional and internal subcultures of Latin America (such as the tribal Indian, the peasant, the metropolitan middle class) as well as seeking the universal or common denominator in Latin American culture, the author presents a framework for the understanding of Latin America as a distinctive culture area in the modern world.

SOUTHERN AFRICA AND THE UNITED STATES

WILLIAM A HANCE, Editor, with LEO KUPER, VERNON McKAY, and EDWIN S. MUNGER

In this book four of the foremost authorities on Africa assess the factors which bear upon United States relations with southern Africa (including the Republic of South Africa, Rhodesia, and Portuguese Angola and Mozambique) in the light of changing circumstances and attitudes in the U.S., in southern Africa, and in independent black Africa. Some of the topics discussed are the case for and against United States disengagement from South Africa; the sharp dichotomy which exists between the races in South Africa; and the complex international relations which affect the confrontation between black Africa and those parts of southern Africa under white domination. $6.50

POPULATION AND POLITICAL SYSTEMS IN TROPICAL AFRICA ROBERT F. STEVENSON

This is a reply to the claims set forth in the classic African Political Systems of Fortes and Evans-Pritchard that, on the basis of African data, no relationship could be determined between population density and political organization in a given area. Historical materials here supplement the original synchronic approach to demonstrate a strong relationship between population density and political complexity in tropical Africa. $10.00

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

440 West 110th Street New York, N. Y. 10025

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

NEW PAPERBACKS FROM COLUMBIA

SPACESHIP EARTH

BARBARA WARD

"... although her diagnosis is painfully realistic, her conclusions are not those of a pessimist.... Her vision, although necessarily speculative, is compelling."—

The Times Literary Supplement $1.95

MARXISM IN MODERN FRANCE

GEORGE LICHTHEIM

"Mr. Lichtheim presents us here with a solid and provocative exegesis . . . the book has some important conclusions not only for historians but for economists, philosophers, and sociologists as well.—American Historical Review $2.25

POLITICAL SUCCESSION IN THE USSR

Second Edition

MYRON RUSH

"His thesis . . . is that the nature of Soviet society, with its lack of a defined procedure for political succession, must produce a succession crisis. . . . Rush's point may well be debatable, but it is argued with considerable force and conviction; to date, history has not contradicted him."—Journal of Modern History $2.75

THE PEOPLE'S CHOICE: HOW THE VOTER MAKES UP HIS MIND IN A PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Third Edition

PAUL LAZARSFELD, BERNARD BERELSON, and HAZEL GAUDET

The authors were among the first to use a now accepted method of social research—the panel, or repeated interview technique, to achieve a step-by-step account of how representative voters arrived at final vote decisions in the 1940 elections. The present edition explores questions which arose after the initial study.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

440 West 110th Street New York, N. Y. 10025

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

Important titles from RONALD

GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Webb S. Fiser, State University of New York at Albany; Stuart Gerry Brown, University of Hawaii; and John S. Gibson, Tufts University

Recently Published—This text surveys concisely but comprehensively the framework of the American governmental system. Intergovernmental relations are developed as cooperative action between levels of government rather than as compartmentalized treatments of federal, state and local systems. Going beyond discussion of politics, parties, and pressure groups, this book shows how the political process unfolds around concrete policy issues in the context of changing historical developments. Particular attention is given to such currently important problems as urban renewal, metropolitan areas, poverty, race relations, law enforcement, agriculture, and education. Instructor's Supplement available. 1967. 803 pp.

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

Russell M. Ross, University of Iowa; and Kenneth F. Millsap, Assistant City Manager, Iowa City, Iowa

This text provides a thorough treatment of the governmental activities of the 50 states and their local governmental units. Although predominant emphasis is on administrative aspects of state and local government, the book also presents material on the structure of governmental units below the national level. The role of counties, the position of the municipalities and special districts, and the peculiar problems of metropolitan areas are examined in detail. The importance of intergovernmental coordination is stressed, as is the growing relationship between the national and local governments. 1966. 705 pp., illus. $8.50

POLITICAL Geography

Paul Buckholts, Eastern Michigan University

Provides a systematic approach to political geography for students of geography or related fields. It focuses on the need for stressing relationships within a state before attempting a meaningful exploration of the international aspects. References to history disclose views of the subject which emphasize both its continuity and the variety of approaches taken to it. Main theme is how man, as a political animal, controls and affects, or is influenced by, his environment—never alone but in relation to differing environments. 1966. 534 pp., illus. $9.00

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

John M. Pfiffner, University of Southern California; and Robert Presthus, York University, Toronto

The Fifth Edition of this famous text examines administration at all levels of government. It integrates descriptive-institutional materials of administrative science with behavioral analyses of administration in action. It analyzes such aspects as the historical and institutional framework, separation of powers, role of executives (particularly that of the modern specialist), and the problem of obtaining auperior talent. Covers decision-making and the data-processing revolution, and incorporates recent research into group behavior, individual motivation, and leadership dynamics. 5th Ed., 1967. 567 pp.

$8.00

ESTABLISHED 1900

The Ronald Press Company

79 Madison Avenue • New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE

The Repeal of Fair Housing in California: An Analysis of Referendum Voting
Raymond E. Wolfinger and Fred I. Greenstein	753
Factions and Coalitions in One-Party Japan: An Interpreta- tion Based on the Theory of Games
Michael Leiserson	770
A Comparative Analysis of State and Federal Judicial Behavior: The Reapportionment Cases Edward N. Beiser	788
	100
Voting Turnout in American Cities Robert R. Alford and Eugene C. Lee	796
Soviet Elections as a Measure of Dissent: The Missing One Percent
Jerome M. Gilison	814
Soviet Elite Participatory Attitudes in the Post-Stalin Period Milton Lodge	827
Group Influence and the Policy Process in the Soviet Union Joel J. Schwartz and William R. Keech	840
Political Socialization and the High School Civics Curriculum in the United States Kenneth P. Langton and M. Kent Jennings	852
Conservatism, Personality and Political Extremism Robert A. Schoenberger	868
A Salience Dimension of Politics for the Study of Political Culture
Moshe M. Czudnowski	878
Political Development and Socioeconomic Development: The Case of Latin America Martin C. Needler	889
Locke's State of Nature: Historical Fact or Moral Fiction? Richard Ashcraft	898
National Attributes as Predictors of Delegate Attitudes at the United Nations	-
Jack E. Vincent	916
National Political Units in the Twentieth Century: A Stan- dardized List	•
Bruce M. Russett, J. David Singer, and Melvin Small	932
Communications to the Editor	952
Book Reviews and Notes	0
Richard F. Fenno (ed.)	957
Announcements	1074

VOL. LXII SEPTEMBER, 1968 NO. 3

Published Quarterly by

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

From Commentary To College Classrooms

You can have samples free of the most important articles to appear in "one of the world's best edited periodicals." (C. P. Snow)

List the five Commentary Reports, on your letterhead, that you would consider for classroom adoption and we'll send them right out.

Special Reports:

- American Reactions to The Six-Day War. Robert Alter, Arthur Hertzberg, Milton Himmelfarb, Martin Peretz $1.00
- ☐ Liberal Anti-Communism Revisited. A symposium: Lionel Abel, David T. Bazelon, Daniel Bell, Lewis A. Coser, Paul Goodman, Michael Harrington, Sidney Hook, Irving Howe, Murray Kempton, Robert Lowell, Dwight MacDonald, William Phillips, Robert Pickus, Philip Rahv, Harold Rosenberg, Richard H. Rovere, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Stephen Spender, Diana Trilling, Lionel Trilling, Dennis H. Wrong S1.00

Quantity discounts for classroom purchases: 25-49 copies less 10%; 50-99 copies less 15%; 100-299 copies less 20%; 300-499 copies less 30%; 500-1,000 copies less 40%; more than 1,000 copies less 50%.

Write for the Commentary Classroom Magazine Subscription Plan too.

Į
	☐ The American Presidency—A Defective Institution?—Andrew Hacker	50¢
	☐ The Origins of Human Bonds—Selma Fraiberg	50¢
	☐ The Legacy of Che Guevara—Norman Gall	50¢
ļ	☐ The Shape of American Politics—Richard N. Goodwin	50¢
1	☐ A Guide to Reagan Country-The Political Culture of Southern California-James
	Q. Wilson
ļ	☐ "Bonn Is Not Weimar"—Reflections on the Radical Right in Germany-Walter
i	Laqueur	50¢
	☐ Counterrevolutionary America—Robert L. Heilbroner	50¢
ļ	☐ The President and the Negro: The Moment Lost—Daniel P. Moynihan	50¢
ĺ	☐ Communism in Asia—Donald S. Zagoria	50¢
I	☐ The Failure of the Warren Report-Alexander M. Bickel	50¢
I	☐ The Unremembered Genocide—Marjorie Houseplan	50¢
I	☐ In Defense of 'Black Power'—David Danzig	50¢
i	☐ Black Power and Coalition Politics—Bayard Rustin	50¢
ļ	☐ Church and State: How High a Wall?—Milton Himmelfarb	50¢
ĺ	The Problem of the New Left-Tom Kahn	50¢
İ	☐ The Myth of the Jewish World Conspiracy—Norman Cohn	50¢
Į	☐ The Arab Refugees—A Zionist View—Marie Syrkin	50¢
Į	☐ Conservatism After Goldwater—David Danzig	50¢
i	☐ The Meaning of Negro Strategy—David Danzig	50¢
l	☐ The State of Soviet Jewry-Maurice Friedberg; Soviet Anti-Semitism: An Ex-
I	change-Bertrand Russell & Aron Vergelis	50¢
۱	☐ Up From Apathy—The Woodlawn Experiment—Charles E. Silberman	50¢
۱	☐ The Failure of Urban Renewal—A Critique and Some Proposals—Herbert J. Gans	50¢
I	Five Years of Castro's Cuba—Theodore Draper	50c
Ì	□ Public School 165-Richard Schickel	50¢
I	☐ The Watts 'Manifesto' and the McCone Report—Bayard Rustin	50€
l	☐ From Protest to Politics: The Future of the Civil Rights Movement—Bayard Rustin	50¢
Į	☐ The American Reading Problem—Selma Fraiberg	50¢
I	☐ Big Business and the Democrats—David T. Bazelon	50¢
ļ	☐ Mutual Aid and the Negro-John Slawson	50¢
l	☐ The Trial of Jesus—Paul Winter	50¢
İ	☐ China's Strategy A Critique—Donald S. Zagoria	50¢
I	☐ The Future of Capitalism—Robert L. Heilbroner	50¢
I	☐ Chinese Visions and American Policies—Berljamin Schwartz	50¢
ı	☐ The Negro and the New York Schools—Midge Decter	50¢
I	☐ Intermarriage and the Jewish Future—Marshall Sklare	50¢
l	☐ American Catholicism After the Council—Michael Novak
١	Lessons of the 'Long Hot Summer'-Bayard Rustin	50e
l	☐ My Negro Problem—and Ours—Norman Podhoretz
ļ	☐ Negroes and Jews: The New Challenge to Pluralism—Nathan Glazer
ı	☐ The John Birch Society—Fundamentalism on the Right—Alan F. Westin	50¢ t

Write to: John Gladstone

Commentary Report

165 E. 56th St., New York, N. Y. 10022

NATIONS IN A MULTIPOLAR WORLD

Cecil V. Crabb, Jr.

The author examines and analyzes succintly, yet completely, the basic data needed to understand the field of international relations. Recognizing that the field of international relations is vast and diverse, he utilizes several approaches or principles to make the subject matter meaningful, intelligible, and relevant. Historical background, domestic factors, economic and sociological data, "behavioral" approaches, and ideological and philosophical studies are related, where significant, to the country or region under examination.

702 pages. $11.00

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE MAKING

Eleanor Lansing Dulles

370 pages. $3.95. Paper

BEYOND IDEOLOGY: THE REVIVAL OF POLITICAL THEORY

Dante Germino

254 pages. $5.00

Harper's Comparative Government Series

MICHAEL CURTIS, EDITOR,

New Volumes

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS: AN INTRODUCTORY ESSAY IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Michael Curtis. This core volume in the series examines the subect of comparative politics both analytically and functionally. 266 pages. $3.50. Paper.

THE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF CONTEMPORARY ITALY

Dante Germino and Stefano Passigli. Discusses the constitution, the historical dimension of contemporary problems, Italian communism, and interest groups. 212 pages. $3.25. Paper

FRENCH POLITICS AND POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

Roy Pierce. A thorough analysis of French politics, based on the broad range of recent research by European and American scholars. It covers events through the legislative election of March, 1967. 275 pages. $3.25. Paper

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS 49 EAST 33D STREET, N.Y. 10016

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

MERLE FAINSOD* Harvard University

President-Elect DAVID EASTON* University of Chicago

Vice Presidents

STEPHEN K. BAILEY Syracuse University

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD Columbia University

Treasurer

JACK W. PELTASON University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana

Secretary

HARVEY GLICKMAN Haverford College MAX M. KAMPELMAN Washington, D. C.

Program Chairman JOSEPH LAPALOMBARA* Yale University

Executive Director

Associate Director DONALD G. TACHERON Managing Editor, APSR

AUSTIN RANNEY* University of Wisconsin

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK* 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N. W. Washington, D. C. 20036

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officiis

1966-1968

M. MARGARET BALL Duke University WILLIAM BUCHANAN Washington and Lee University H. PAUL CASTLEBERRY Washington State University HERBERT KAUFMAN Yale University CHARLES A. MCCLELLAND University of Southern California ALFRED G. MEYER University of Michigan CLARA PENNIMAN University of Wisconsin CLINTON ROSSITER*

1967-1969

HOLBERT N. CARROLL University of Pittsburgh CHARLES O. JONES University of Arizona MERLE KLING Washington University, St. Louis ROY C. MACRIDIS Brandeis University PAUL L. PURYEAR Fisk University ROBERT A. SCALAPINO* University of California, Berkeley GLENDON SCHUBERT University of North Carolina DANIEL WIT

Northern Illinois University

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW ALBERT SHAW FREDERIC N. JUDSON JAMES BRYCE A. LAWRENCE LOWELL WOODROW WILSON SIMEON E. BALDWIN ALBERT BUSHNELL HART W. W. WILLOUGHBY JOHN BASSETT MOORE ERNST FREUND JESSE MACY MUNROE SMITH HENRY JONES FORD PAUL S. REINSCH LEO S. ROWE WILLIAM A. DUNNING HARRY A. GARFIELD JAMES W. GARNER CHARLES E. MERRIAM

Cornell University

CHARLES A. BEARD WILLIAM B. MUNRO JESSE S. REEVES JOHN A. FAIRLIE BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH EDWARD S. CORWIN WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY ISIDOR LOEB WALTER J. SHEPARD Francis W. Coker ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE THOMAS REED POWELL CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA CHARLES GROVE HAINES ROBERT C. RROOKS FREDERIC A. OGG WILLIAM ANDERSON ROBERT E. CUSHMAN LEONARD D. WHITE John M. GAUS WALTER F. DODD

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON HENRY R. SPENCER QUINCY WRIGHT JAMES K. POLLOCK PETER H. ODEGARD LUTHER H. GULICK PENDLETON HERRING RALPH J. BUNCHE CHARLES MCKINLEY HAROLD D. LASSWELL E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER V. O. KEY, JR. R. TAYLOR COLE CARL B. SWISHER EMMETTE S. REDFORD CHARLES S. HYNEMAN CARL J. FRIEDRICH C. HERMAN PRITCHETT DAVID B. TRUMAN GABRIEL A. ALMOND ROBERT A. DAHL

^{*} Members of the Executive Committee, 1987-1968.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

Austin Ranney, Managing Editor, University of Wisconsin

FRED I. GREENSTEIN, Wesleyan University HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Columbia University

WARREN E. MILLER, University of Michi-

WALTER F. MURPHY, Princeton University

J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College John E. Turner, University of Minnesota

VERNON VAN DYKE, University of Iowa Myron Weiner, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

James W. Prothro, Book Review Editor, University of North Carolina Mary H. Grossman, Madison

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR
North Hall, University of Wisconsin
Madison, Wisconsin 53706

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W. Washington, D.C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students; five-year limitation). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy; for back issues prior to 1963 address Johnson Reprint Corp., 111 5th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10003; subsequent to 1963 send request directly to the American Political Science Association.

Applications for membership, orders for the Review, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 25th day of the month before publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the Review to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis. 53706. All manuscripts should be submitted IN DU-PLICATE. They should be double-spaced and may be in typed, mimeographed, hectographed, or other legible form. Footnotes should appear at the end of the manuscript, not at the bottom of the page.

Since manuscripts are sent out anonymously for editorial evaluation, the author's name and affiliations should appear only on a separate covering page. All footnotes identifying the author should also appear on a separate page.

Address books intended for review to Richard F. Fenno, 575 Mount Hope Avenue, Rochester, New York 14620; information, including News and Notes, for the Association's newsletter P. S., should be sent to 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036; advertising, reprint and circulation correspondence to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the Review before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Political Science Abstracts and the International Index to Periodicals index current issues. Microfilm of the Review, beginning with Volume 1, may be obtained from University Microfilms. 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan. A Cumulative Index of the Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963, may be obtained from Northwestern University Press, 1735 Benson, Evanston, Illinois.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1968, by The American Political Science Association.

The BIG Issues in Politics ...from Spectrum A Books

Uses of the Seas An American Assembly Book

edited by Edmund A. Gullion, Tufts University

The race for the oceans, riches has begun! Who should regulate the use? In this book, a distinguished group of economists, political scientist foreign policy experts, and marine scientists face the issues raised by a expanding sea technology. The contributors reveal the financial, political legal, and international implications for government and industry, as provided needed guidelines for American policy on the use and exploration of the seas. Sept., 1968 Paper $2.45, Cloth $4.95

Law in a Changing America An American Assembly Book

edited by Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., University of Chicago

In articles ranging from the effect of social science on law and la making, to the controversial issues of individual rights and social resposibility, the fifteen authorities who contribute to this book propose fareaching suggestions for reform of the American legal profession. Jun 1968 Paper $2.45, Cloth $5.95

The Politics of Violence Revolution in the Modern World

by Carl Leiden and Karl Schmitt, both of the University of Text

Using Cuba, Mexico, Turkey, and Egypt as examples, the authors analy the causes and meaning of violent revolution in the twentieth century. The project their findings into the future to reveal the course of today's potential revolutions. April, 1968 Paper $2.45, Cloth $5.95

Modernizing American Governmen The Demands of Social Change

edited by Murray S. Stedman, Jr., Trinity College

Seven authorities assess the structure and functions of American go ernment today and offer provocative proposals for modernizing out-of-da methods and institutions. April, 1968 Paper $1.95, Cloth $4.95

SPECTRUM (A)BOOKS

Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, N. J. 07632

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LXII

SEPTEMBER, 1968

THE REPEAL OF FAIR HOUSING IN CALIFORNIA: AN ANALYSIS OF REFERENDUM VOTING*

RAYMOND E. WOLFINGER Stanford University

FRED I. GREENSTEIN Wesleyan University

In the summer of 1963 the California legislature passed the Rumford Act, prohibiting racial discrimination by realtors and the owners of apartment houses and homes built with public assistance. California real estate and property management interests, which had fought the Act's passage, then placed on the November 1964 ballot an initiative provision (Proposition 14) that would amend the state constitution to repeal the Rumford Act and prevent the state or any locality within it from adopting any fair housing legislation. During most of 1964 intense and lavishly financed campaigns were fought by supporters and opponents of Proposition 14. Almost 96 per cent of the people who turned out on election day voted on the measure, which passed by a ratio of two to one. In one sense the campaign and balloting were an exercise in futility, for in May of 1967 the United States Supreme Court declared Proposition 14 unconstitutional. Some short-term consequences of its passage were apparent, however. For several years there was a severe weakening of legal sanctions against racial discrimination in housing, resulting in abandonment of many cases that were underway before the 1964 election. For eighteen months the federal government froze $120 million in funds for California urban renewal projects. Less tangibly, it is claimed that the proposition's overwhelming popularity contributed to the Watts riots and other racial violence in California.

* Most of the data on which this article is based were collected by the Field Research Corporation. We are grateful to Mervin Field, Robert Heyer, and Penny Dufficy of this organization and June Chacran and Charles Y. Glock of the Survey Research Center of the University of California at Berkeley for their kind help in making the data available to us. For invaluable advice and assistance in data processing we are indebted to John Gilbert and Ted Cooper. Hale Champion, Russell Murphy, James Payne, Nelson W. Polsby, Edward R. Tufte, and Barbara Kaye Wolfinger made useful comments on an earlier draft of this paper, which was delivered at the 1965 annual meeting of the American Association for Public Opinion Research, Financial assistance was provided by the Graduate Division of Stanford University, the Stanford Computation Center, and the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences.

¹ A brief account of the background and passage of the Rumford Act and the Proposition 14

Our purpose is to describe various aspects of the voting decision, both for their historical interest and as evidence on more general problems of political behavior, including the role of campaigns in clarifying the choices before voters, the adequacy of "direct democracy" devices such as referenda, the degree to which whites are willing to support Negro aspirations for equality, and the ways in which civil rights attitudes and voting behavior differ among various population groups. We will trace the voters' responses at different stages of the campaign, assess the level of support for the proposition from various elements of the population, and explore to some extent the motivations campaign may be found in Thomas W. Casstevens, Politics, Housing, and Race Relations: California's Rumford Act and Proposition 14 (Berkeley: Institute of Governmental Studies, 1967.)

that lay behind this voting, touching as we proceed on some broader issues that the Proposition 14 election illuminates.

The major source of data for this analysis is five state-wide sample surveys conducted by the Field Research Corporation's California Poll in March, May, early September, early October, and late October of 1964. Each sample included approximately 1200 persons. The margin of difference between the late October survey findings and the outcome of several candidate and proposition elections was less than five percentage points. We also draw occasionally on analyses of the relationship of aggregate election returns to census data on the 335 incorporated California communities with 1960 populations of 2,500 or more.

I. TWO INADEQUATE EXPLANATIONS: CALIFORNIANS' CONSERVATISM AND VOTER ERRORS

It may be well to begin by pointing out the inadequacies of two arguments that were offered to explain the election outcome. After the passage of Proposition 14 it was said that California is a conservative state and that the success of the proposition was merely a reflection of this conservatism. Another explanation, particularly common among California liberals who fought against the proposition, stressed the confusing intricacies of proposition voting and argued that voters' mechanical or perceptual errors, rather than their underlying beliefs, were responsible for the overwhelming "yes" vote.

There is a good deal of superficial evidence to support the California conservatism thesis. Senator Barry Goldwater clinched the 1964 Republican presidential nomination by his victory in the California primary, the only contested primary he won. The John Birch Society and other radical-right organizations are notoriously successful in the state, particularly in its southern counties. But much of this and other evidence reflects intense minority right wing activity rather than widespread conservative attitudes in the population. In the California primary only Governor Nelson Rockefeller opposed Goldwater on the ballot and write-in votes were not permitted. Rockefeller's divorce and recent remarriage had alienated many voters and his young second wife had a baby a few days before the election, thus providing a fresh reminder of her husband's marital troubles. The California Poll clearly showed the thinness of Goldwater's California backing when the state's Republicans were given their choice of all presidential candidates.3 More relevant for our purposes, it does not appear that Californians are any more hostile to residential integration than people in other parts of the North. In the May 1964 California Poll, respondents were asked "If colored people came to live next door, would you move?" Only 13 per cent replied that they would. In response to the same question, 17 per cent of a Gallup sample of respondents in the Northeastern and Midwestern states said "ves" in 1963 and 10 per cent said "yes" in 1965.4

² The California Poll is financed by four television stations and a number of newspapers in the state, and conducted by the Field Research Corporation. It is based on stratified random samples. The nature of the sample varied slightly from one survey to the next. The March respondents were registered voters. May respondents were voters registered in a party who planned to vote in the June primary. September respondents were registered voters and people who intended to registered voters, excluding those who said they intended not to vote.

There are two versions of the explanations of Proposition 14's success in terms of voters' mistakes. The first version emphasizes response

- ³ When given a choice among all Republican presidential candidates, California Republicans were not much more enthusiastic about Goldwater than those in Oregon, where all candidates were on the ballot and Goldwater got 19 per cent of the vote. Goldwater wrote off the Oregon primary and did no serious campaigning there, while he built an extremely large and enthusiastic organization in California and spent a good deal of time there before the primary. In the May California Poll Goldwater was the first choice of 27 per cent of the Republican respondents, running second to Lodge, who did not campaign. Rockefeller was in third place and Nixon in fourth. Goldwater placed fourth (behind Rockefeller, Nixon, and Lodge) as a second choice candidate. He was most frequently chosen by Republicans as the candidate whose nomination would be objectionable.
- ⁴ We are indebted to Irving Crespi of the Gallup Organization, Inc. for making the non-California data available. A nationwide study of white attitudes toward Negroes conducted by the National Opinion Research Center in December 1963 showed the three Pacific states (75 per cent of whose population is in California) and the Middle Atlantic region to be the most liberal parts of the country on race relations. See Paul B. Sheatsley, "White Attitudes Toward the Negro," Daedalus, 95 (Winter, 1966), 226–227.

set. Californians vote on anywhere from 15 to 30 propositions in every statewide election. Many of these measures are quite esoteric; a considerable mythology has developed about the impact of mechanical aspects of the ballot on the fate of particular propositions. Since most of the 1964 propositions passed by large margins, it has been argued that the success of Proposition 14 was due in part to its ballot position; surrounded by popular propositions, it received many affirmative votes which were merely the result of inattentive repetition.

This argument may be rejected by examining the vote for two other measures on the ballot in 1964. Proposition 16 was a proposed constitutional amendment to establish a state lottery and license a particular firm, created for the purpose, to conduct the lottery. The antithesis of 16 was Proposition 13, which prohibited naming any firm in any proposed constitutional amendment considered in a referendum, and provided further that any amendment doing so would be void. The first of these contradictory propositions was defeated by 69.06 per cent; the second was passed by 69.09 per cent. Thus the voters evidently were capable of making acute distinctions in referendum voting; more than perfunctory response repetition went into voting on the propositions surrounding number 14 on the ballot.

The second, and for our purposes more interesting error argument concerns the wording of Proposition 14, which appeared on the ballot as follows:

SALES AND RENTALS OF RESIDENTIAL REAL PROPERTY. Initiative constitutional amendment. Prohibits State, subdivision, or agency thereof from denying, limiting, or abridging right of any person to decline to sell, lease, or rent residential real property to any person as he chooses. Probibition not applicable to property owned by State or its subdivisions; property acquired by eminent domain; or transient accommodations by hotels, motels, and similar public places.

A positive vote on Proposition 14 was a negative vote on fair housing legislation, and vice versa. A number of observers felt that the voters found this confusing and voted on the proposition as they felt on the issue of fair housing. As a consequence, the argument runs, many of the "yes" votes were erroneous attempts to express support for fair housing legislation. By examining the shortcomings of this explanation of the passage of Proposition 14, we can begin to move toward a more adequate understanding of the election outcome.

Initially there was considerable confusion about the proposition's meaning. Only half of the May respondents were sure that they had heard of Proposition 14. By September (the last survey in which the question was asked) this had grown to two thirds of the sample.5 The Rumford Act itself was more familiar. In March 72 per cent of the sample knew something about it; by early September this had grown to 87 per cent. For reasons that will become apparent, we think that by election day most of the initial confusion about the proposition's meaning had been dispelled by the flood of campaign propaganda, so that the vast majority of the electorate cast votes that were consistent with their attitudes toward fair housing legislation.6 Furthermore, as we will show, whatever confusion remained could not have contributed to the proposition's passage.

Table 1 shows voting intentions on Proposition 14 from March through late October. Throughout this period there were substantially more "yes" than "no" intentions. The "yes" vote remained stable through early September and then grew in the final two surveys. Table 2 shows attitudes toward the Rumford Act from March through September (after which the question was not asked). There was essentially no change in the two-to-one opposition to the act during the spring and summer.

The extent of confusion about how to express one's attitudes toward fair housing legislation can be measured through September by combining the respondents who favored the Rumford Act but nevertheless intended to vote for Proposition 14 with those who opposed the act but planned to vote against the proposition. As Table 3 shows, in March 38 per cent of those with attitudes on both subjects were inconsistent. By early September this proportion had dropped to 29 per cent.

In the spring such inappropriate voting intentions were most common in the lowest educational categories (Table 3) and among Negroes. The latter were particularly ill-informed about the proposition in the early stages of the campaign. In March Negroes were about

- ⁵ We excluded respondents who claimed knowledge but were unable to produce a fragment of an accurate description.
- ⁶ We do not mean to imply that confusion and ignorance rarely accompany proposition voting in California. An intensive analysis of voting patterns on individual ballots in the 1964 election indicates some tendency for voters to abstain when unable to make "quick and easy" decisions. See John E. Mueller, "Reason and Caprice: Ballot Patterns in California," (Los Angeles: unpublished doctoral dissertation, UCLA, 1965).

TABLE 1. VOTE INTENTION ON PROPOSITION 14—THROUGHOUT CAMPAIGN^a

	March	May	Early September	Early October	Late October
Would Vote Yesb	48%	48%	47%	54%	58%
Would Vote No	33	32	37	37	27
Do Not Know & Qualified	19	20	15	10	14
			_
	100%	100%	99%	101%	99%

a In the first four surveys respondents were handed a card with the wording of Proposition 14 as it appeared on the ballot and asked how they would vote. In the early October survey half the respondents indicated their choice by marking a "secret ballot" and placing it in a "ballot box." This technique did not appreciably alter the responses. In the late October survey half the respondents were handed a card with the ballot wording and half were given summaries of the pro and con arguments from the booklet distributed to voters by the Secretary of State. Results of this technique are discussed in the text.

evenly split for and against the proposition, although they overwhelmingly favored the Rumford Act (Table 4).

Assuming for the moment that the level of confusion found in September persisted through election day, Table 5, which reports the vote intentions of supporters and opponents of the Rumford Act, shows why voting errors cannot have been responsible for the passage of Proposition 14, or even have added to the percentage by which it passed. Equal proportions of the friends and the enemies of the Rumford Act had the wrong idea about Proposition 14. But, as the number of cases in each column shows, there were almost twice as

TABLE 2. ATTITUDE TOWARD THE RUMFORD FAIR HOUSING ACT—MARCH, MAY,

AND SEPTEMBER^a

	March	May	Early September
Approve Disapprove	30 % 58	27% 57	33 % 55
Don't Know & Qualified	12	15	12
	100%	99%	100%

A The question (after asking if the respondent has heard of the Rumford Act): "As you may know, the Rumford Act is a law which makes it illegal for apartment house owners, owners of publicly-assisted housing, and real estate brokers to discriminate against anyone because of race, color, religion, national origin, or ancestry in the renting or selling of housing accommodations. From what you know of it, do you approve or disapprove of the Rumford Act?"

TABLE 3. VOTE INTENTIONS ON PROPOSITION
14 INCONSISTENT WITH ATTITUDES ON RUMFORD ACT, BY EDUCATION—MARCH,
MAY, AND SEPTEMBER^a

77	Per cent inconsistent at each educational level
Educational Level	March	Maya	Septem- ber
Less than high school	43%	39%	29%
High school graduates	33%	32%	33%
1 to 2 years of college	41%	33%	28%
More than 2 years
of college	23%	19%	25%
		-
Total inconsistents	33%	32%	29%

^a Since the May sample was limited to people intending to vote in the June primary, one would expect it to be somewhat better informed than the September sample, which included everyone registered to vote in the general election or who intended to register. This table is limited to people with attitudes on both the Rumford Act and Proposition 14. There seems to be no basis on which respondents who favored the Rumford Act and nevertheless intended to vote "yes" on a proposition designed to invalidate it could be behaving consistently. On the other hand, a complex constitutional argument could be mounted for opposing the act and planning to vote "no" on Proposition 14. We believe that the voters in this second category also were responding out of confusion, however, since they scored lower than consistent voters on various indexes of political information, and since the general literature on voting behavior suggests that such complex rationalizations are not common.

b I.e., to repeal fair housing legislation.

many people against the act, and therefore many more mistaken votes would have been cast against the proposition than for it.

In fact, the number of "wrong" votes resulting from confusion about the proposition's impact on fair housing legislation does not seem to have been great. The rate at which confusion was resolved in the spring and summer was, as we have seen in Table 3, relatively moderate. But between Labor Day and election day this rate must have greatly accelerated. For one thing, by October Negroes were uniformly opposed to Proposition 14, a vote intention consistent with their equally unanimous support of the Rumford Act. For another, a split-sample interviewing technique used by the California Poll in the late October survey produced findings suggesting that confusion was not an important factor in the election outcome. Interviewers handed half the respondents a card bearing the description of the proposition that appeared on the ballot, as

TABLE 4. ATTITUDES TOWARD THE RUMFORD ACT AND PROPOSITION 14 THROUGH

THE CAMPAIGN, BY RACE^a

	Proposi	tion 14	Rumfor	d Act
, -	Whites	Negroes	Whites	Negroe
		Мат	ch
Approve	50%	41%	30%	56%
Disapprove	33	38	61	16
Don't Know ^b	17	22	8	28
	100%	101%	100%	100%
•		Ma	y
Approve	51%	29%	26%	73%
Disapprove	32	39	65	16
Don't Know ^b	18	32	9	11
		—
	101%	100%	100%	100%
		Septer	nber .
Approve	51%	23%	31%	86%
Disapprove	36	66	61	13
Don't Know ^b	13	11	8	2 .
	100%	100%	100%	100%
	•	Early O	ctober
Approve	57%	10%	1	,
Disapprove	34	83	•
Don't Knowb	8	. 6	-
	_
	99%	99%		•
		Late Oct	ober
Approve	60%	15%
Disapprove	26	80
Don't Know ^b	14	5
	100% ·	100%

a Orientals have been excluded from this table.

TABLE 5. VOTE INTENTION OF PERSONS PRO AND CON RUMFORD ACT—SEPTEMBER

Intention on Prop. 14	Attitude toward Rumford Act
Yes No	Approve 26% 59	Disapprove 64% 26	DK 28% 21
DK & Qualified (mostly DK)	14	10	51
N	$\frac{99\%}{372}$	100% 625	100 % 82

they had done in previous surveys. The other half of the sample, matched to the first half, was given instead of a summary of the arguments for and against the proposition taken from the booklet distributed to all voters by the Secretary of State. This technique slightly reduced the number of "don't knows," but it provides no support for the contention that the election result was significantly affected by the wording of the proposition or by ignorance of its meaning. Virtually identical proportions of the two halves who had a definite voting intention were in favor of the proposition (67.9 per cent and 68.2 per cent).

Perhaps the most persuasive evidence that voting reflected underlying attitudes toward the Rumford Act is the remarkably close fit between attitudes toward the act in September and toward Proposition 14 in October. As Table 4 shows, 61 per cent of the white respondents were hostile to the Rumford Act in September, while in late October 60 per cent said they would vote for the proposition. This same relationship holds for subgroups in the sample.

It is evident from the Rumford Act's initial and continuing unpopularity that supporters of fair housing faced an uphill fight. The reverse wording of Proposition 14 was not as great a difficulty as many of them thought, for their chief problem was not to explain the relationship between the two measures (which seemed to be the purpose of most of their efforts), but to win converts to the cause of fair housing legislation. As it turned out, changes in response to the Rumford Act occurred most strikingly among Negroes. While Negroes consistently favored the act, many of them evidently were not well enough informed to express an opinion on it in March (Table 4). For the white population, the Rumford Act seems to have remained a fixed point of reference throughout the campaign: as voters learned how to express their attitudes toward it, their vote intentions shifted accordingly.

b Includes a few qualified responses.

TABLE 6. CHANGE IN WHITE RESPONDENTS' INTENTIONS ON PROPOSITION 14 DURING THE CAMPAIGN—BY EDUCATION^a

Educational	per cent of group who will vote	per cent of group who will vote;
\mathbf{Level}	YES	NO	know
Less than 8 grades 9 to 11 grades High school	+23 + 9	-14 - 8	-8 -1
graduates	+15	-13	-2
1 to 2 years of college More than 2 ye	+ 3	- 1	-2
of college	+ 1	+ 2	-3

^a Determined by comparing vote intention of each group in March and late October.

This shift in intentions resulting from clarification probably explains the increased support for the proposition found in the October surveys (Table 1), since, as we have seen, the net effect of confusion favored the fair housing forces rather than acting against them. The likelihood that the process of clarification increased the "yes" vote also is supported by the finding in Table 3 that the greatest clarification on the proposition's consequences occurred at the lowest educational level, since opposition to fair housing is negatively related to education. This likelihood is documented more directly in Table 6, which shows that the greatest changes in the direction of a "yes" vote came in the low education categories. Thus we can see that, at least in this instance of a hard-fought, wellfinanced, highly publicized referendum, the campaign had the consequence of making clear to voters how to express their attitudes. It did not lead them to change those attitudes. nor—by the very nature of referendum decision making—did it lead to the typical outcome of policy formation by elected officials: some accommodation between the initial positions of the contending groups.

II. BACKGROUND VARIABLES AND THE VOTE

It is commonly believed that northern opposition to the civil rights movement has been strongest among members of the working class, particularly second- and third-generation Americans. We cannot explore this proposi-

⁷ See, e.g., Seymour M. Lipset, "Beyond the Backlash," Encounter (November, 1964), 11-24. For data showing that various nationality groups sition directly with our survey data, whi clude no information on the generati respondents' residence in the United and no satisfactory information on their pations. Our ecological data show a slig lationship in this direction; the correcoefficient (Pearson's r) between the against Proposition 14 and the percent the labor force employed in manufactur—.28 for the state's 335 incorporated cit are more opposed to interracial neighborhood William Brink and Louis Harris, Black and (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1967), ⁸ Quite different findings are reported he chael Rogin, who studied the vote given the bama's Governor George Wallace in the Democratic presidential primary in Wise For 18 suburbs in Milwaukee County, Rogorts a correlation coefficient of -.77 betwee vote for Wallace and the percentage of the force employed in manufacturing. See his lace and the Middle Class: The White Ba in Wisconsin," Public Opinion Quarter (Spring, 1966), 98-108.

This strong negative correlation, plus similar data on the Wallace primary, leads to the conclusion that opposition to racial ity is more common in the middle class th working class. Our findings suggest that this the case. It is not at all clear, however, th dependent variable-voting for Proposition and Rogin's-voting for Wallace-are c rable measures of anti-Negro feeling. Wa opponent was the very unpopular incu governor, who was soundly beaten in the g election that fall despite President Joh landslide victory in Wisconsin. There is no knowing how many of the middle-class Re cans who voted for Wallace were motivaracial prejudice and how many-undistrac a contest in the Republican primary-tovantage of this opportunity to register the tility to the governor. Voting in another I primary requires some effort and sophisti beyond what is needed to vote in a genera tion. Such qualities are more common middle class. Given equal levels of hosti Negroes in the middle class and the working members of the former group would be more to express this attitude by voting in the c tion's primary.

Furthermore, Rogin's measure of racis tudes—Wallace's percentage of the Demprimary vote—inflates the score attained b dle-class districts. The more Republican t trict, the fewer the number of Democrats in the Democratic primary and hence the state proportion of the total Democratic vot

Our survey data do show that people with more education were less likely to vote for the proposition. This relationship is demonstrated in Table 7, which is based on white gentiles only. (Jews, Negroes, and Orientals, groups which are unequally distributed among educational levels and which have distinctive responses to fair housing, have been excluded from this tabulation.) Only one-sixth of whites who had not graduated from high school intended to vote "no" in late October. As the level of education increases, so does the proportion of respondents planning to vote against the proposition. Only the small group with post-graduate training was predominantly opposed to the measure, however. These findings are consistent with the existing literature on the relationship between education and racial tolerance.9

In addition to Negroes and members of various European nationality groups, California has two more distinctive ethnic minorities: Mexican-Americans and Orientals. Discrimination in housing does not appear to be a tributed by Republicans crossing over. In a district where, say, 75 per cent of the voters are Democrats, a vote for Wallace by a third of the Republicans will account for a far smaller proportion of the total Democratic vote than will a Wallace vote by a similar fraction of the Republicans in a district where only 25 per cent of the voters are Democrats. (We are indebted to John E. Mueller for bringing this point to our attention.)

9 For an inventory of the literature on racial attitudes see Frank R. Westie, "Race and Ethnic Relations," in Robert E. L. Faris (ed.), Handbook of Modern Sociology (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1964), pp. 576-586. For typical survey findings, including data on the relationship between prejudice and social status, see Hazel Gaudet Erskine, "The Polls: Race Relations," Public Opinion Quarterly, 26 (1962), 137-148; and Mildred Schwartz, Trends in White Attitudes Toward Negroes (Chicago: NORC, 1967). The 1963 NORC study included an eight-item scale of prointegration attitudes. Northern white respondents with no more than a grade school education had a mean score on this scale of 3.88; those with nine to twleve years of education averaged 5.01; and respondents who had attended college scored 5.96 (Sheatsley, op. cit., p. 226). For a collection of findings specifically on housing, see Mrs. Erskine's "The Polls: Negro Housing," Public Opinion Quarterly, 31 (Autumn, 1967), 482-498. The most recent surveys reported there show no differences in attitudes on interracial housing by education. income, or occupation (p. 491).

TABLE 7. VOTING INTENTION ON PROPOSITION 14, BY EDUCATION

Educational -	1	Intention	1:
Level	Yes	No	Don't Know
Less than high school	59%	18	23
High school graduates	66%	20	14
1 to 2 years of college	57%	29	15
3 to 4 years of college	52%	39	9
Graduate study	45%	53	2

major problem at present for either of these groups. The Orientals have attained phenomenal social mobility since the war, while Mexican-Americans frequently complain that their problems are overlooked in the currently fashionable concern for Negroes. Perhaps for these reasons, various journalists have claimed that these minorities are unduly hostile to Negroes and expressed their feelings by enthusiastic support for Proposition 14. Our data strongly contradict these assertions: 61 per cent of the Orientals planned to vote "no," as did 53 per cent of the Mexican-Americans.10 While we have far too few cases to permit controls for education, it still is clear that these minorities were much less favorable to the proposition than were whites. In addition, twothirds of the Jewish respondents planned to vote against the proposition.

What we found more noteworthy was the importance of a third class of background char-

10 Unless otherwise indicated, all percentages given hereafter are based only on respondents with a definite voting intention in late October. Data on Mexican-Americans are from a sample survey of Los Angeles County residents directed by Professor Dwaine Marvick, to whom we are grateful for these data. It is likely that Mexican-Americans in Northern California were more hostile to Proposition 14, for reasons we discuss later. In 1960 5.6 per cent of the state's resident's were Negroes, 2.3 per cent were Orientals (fairly evenly divided among persons of Chinese, Japanese, and Filipino origin), and 9.1 per cent were Mexican-American. Ten San Francisco precincts with an average Chinese-American population of 92 per cent voted 74 per cent "no" on Proposition 14. (Source: Murray Adelman and Angus Mc-Bain, "Ethnic Voting in San Francisco," unpublished paper, Stanford University.) The principal Oriental and Mexican-American civic organizations were strongly opposed to Proposition 14.

TABLE 8. PARTY IDENTIFICATION AND VOTE INTENTION ON PROPOSITION 14 WITH EDUCATION CONTROLLED—WHITE GENTILES ONLY

Educational Level	Per cent intendingato vote no:
Tevel	Republicans	Democrats
Less than high school	10%	29%
High school graduates	8%	30%
1 to 2 years of college More than 2 years	27%	32%
of college	33%	64%

a "Don't know" responses were excluded from the bases.

acteristics-political variables-in differentiating the voters. Party identification and, even more, voting intentions in the presidential election, were much more powerful discriminating factors than education. Forty-one per cent of the Democratic respondents were opposed to the proposition, compared to 22 per cent of the Republicans. 11 Table 8, which compares the Proposition 14 vote intentions of white gentile Republicans and Democrats at each educational level, demonstrates the strong relationship between party identification and attitudes toward the proposition. As can be seen, a Democrat without a high school diploma was scarcely less likely to vote "no" than a Republican with a college education. These data show that party identification was, in 1964, at least as strong an independent variable as education, a finding that may serve as a corrective to interpretations of discrimination and backlash politics that place exclusive emphasis on social class as an independent variable.12

Preferences in the presidential election dis-

¹¹ Recent surveys showing no differences by status variables also indicate that party identification is an important independent variable: Erskine, "The Polls: Negro Housing," op. cit., p. 491.

Perceptions of the two parties' stands on this issue were far more common and much less ambivalent in 1964 than in 1960. In the earlier year only 20 respondents mentioned civil rights attitudes may have been much stronger in 1964 than in previous elections. Perceptions of the two parties' stands on this issue were far more common and much less ambivalent in 1964 than in 1960. In the earlier year only 20 respondents mentioned civil rights stands as something they particularly liked about one party or the other, and these mentions were evenly split between the two parties. But in 1964 criminated even more strongly than party identification among supporters and opponents of the proposition. Forty-six per cent of Democrats intending to vote for Johnson planned to vote "no," compared to 16 per cent of the Democrats for Goldwater. Fifty-one per cent of the Republicans for Johnson were opposed to the proposition, compared to only 12 per cent of those sticking with Goldwater. (Ten per cent of the Democrats and 27 per cent of the Republicans planned to defect to the other party's presidential candidate.)

The importance of party identification as an independent variable probably was in part a reflection of nationwide images of the two parties in 1964, which are summarized in note 12. The pronounced association in popular images of the Democratic party with civil rights doubtless resulted both from Senator Goldwater's well-publicized vote against the landmark Civil Rights Bill of 1964 and from that law itself. Although congressional Republicans played an important and constructive role in shaping and passing the bill, it seems likely that for those voters who are aware of such matters it was a Democratic bill, proposed by one Democratic President, passed by a Democratic Congress, and signed into law by another Democratic President.13

And at the state level the very different positions taken on the fair housing issue by the two parties no doubt helped many voters to see what position on Proposition 14 would be congruent with their own attitudes on fair housing. Governor Edmund G. Brown made passage of the Rumford Act part of his "urgent" legislative program in the 1963 session and made several strong public statements in its support during the spring. Legislators voting on the bill divided sharply by party. Republican state senators were unanimously against it, while all but two Democrats voted "yes." All Democratic assemblymen voted for the bill, along with three Republicans; all 25 opposed votes were cast by Republicans. (After the bill had been approved by the senate, nine more Republican assemblymen voted "yes" on final passage of the senate version.) Most Democratic officials and candidates opposed Proposition 14, as did the Democratic State Central Committee, and local clubs worked vigorously against it.

67 respondents mentioned the Democratic Party's civil rights stand favorably and only one liked the Republicans'. By the same token, equal numbers of 1960 respondents thought each party had gone too far on this issue, while in 1964 74 respondents said this of the Democrats, compared to only five for the Republicans. See Angus Campbell, "The Meaning of the Election," in Milton C. Cummings, Jr. (ed.), The National Elections of 1964 (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1966). pp. 267-268. More than 80 per cent of the 1964 respondents correctly identified both Johnson's and Goldwater's civil rights positions, a far higher than normal proportion. See Angus Campbell, "Civil Rights and the Vote for President," Psychology Today, February 1968, p. 29.

¹⁸ David B. Filvaroff and Raymond E. Wolfinger, The Civil Rights Act of 1964 (in preparation).

Early in 1964 the California Democratic Council, the party's grass-roots organization, passed a resolution urging that only realtors supporting the Rumford Act be patronized. Ninety-one per cent of a sample of the California delegation to the 1964 Democratic National Convention were strongly opposed to Proposition 14.14 On the other hand, the major Republican citizens groups, the United Republicans of California and the California Republican Assembly, endorsed repeal of the Rumford Act, as did Secretary of State Frank Jordan, the only Republican state-wide office holder.15 Most Republican candidates and party officials took a position of neutrality, while only seventeen per cent of a sample of Republican convention delegates were hostile to the proposition.16 Furthermore, many interest groups generally associated with the Republican party supported the proposition, while many groups usually allied with the Democrats attacked it. Thus as a consequence of the actions of national and state party leaders, the well-known cue-giving functions of voters' party identifications seem to have been in play in this referendum election, albeit to a lesser degree than would be expected in a partisan candidate election.

Finally, we want to touch on another important independent variable, the regions of the state with their intriguing and puzzling differences in political climate. Opposition to Proposition 14 varied enormously from one ¹⁴ Edmond Costantini and Kenneth Craik, "Two Faces of Republican Leadership: Goldwater and Rockefeller Elites in California" (Davis, California: unpublished paper, 1967), p. 10.

¹⁵ A few Republican leaders, including Senator Thomas Kuchel and Caspar Weinberger, a former state chairman, opposed the proposition. Joseph Martin, Jr., having resigned as Republican National Committeeman to work for Rockefeller in the primary, subsequently became Northern California co-chairman of the anti-14 campaign.

¹⁶ Costantini and Craik, p. 10. Three-fifths of the Rockefeller slate defeated in the June primary were opposed to Proposition 14.

city to another and from one part of the state to another in ways that are not explained by differences in any of the conventional Census demographic indices.17 The most interesting and politically important of these variations is between Southern California and the San Francisco Bay Area. The Bay Area voted 42 per cent "no," while the Los Angeles metropolitan area voted 32 per cent "no" and the rest of Southern California was even more hostile to fair housing legislation. 18 Of the 25 cities which voted against the proposition only three—all of them highly deviant communities—are in Southern California.¹⁹ On the other hand, all but one of the 25 cities most in favor of the proposition are in the South, as are all but three of the 60 most favorable cities.

While this regional split is found among members of both parties, it is more pronounced among Republicans.²⁰ Analyzing regional dif-

17 Including income, white collar population, median education, ethnicity, and race. By assigning a numerical value of three to each Bay Area city, a value of one to each Southern California city, and a value of two to all other towns, we were able to compute simple and partial correlation coefficients to measure the relationship between region and votes against Proposition 14. The simple correlation coefficient (Pearson's r) is .55. When the vote for Johnson and Salinger, percentage of the labor force employed in manufacturing, median family income, and percentage non-white population are all partialled out, the coefficient is .39.

18 There are eight counties in Southern California. Los Angeles and Orange Counties, the Los Angeles-Long Beach Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area, contain about three-quarters of the region's population. The other six counties, which include the San Diego metropolitan area, are, by and large, quite similar to the Los Angeles area socially, economically, and politically, and will be combined with it in the discussion that follows.

For present purposes we include the San Jose metropolitan area (Santa Clara County) in the San Francisco Bay Area, which thus includes seven counties. The remainder of Northern California, about 18 per cent of the total population of the state, is excluded from consideration in our North-South comparisons.

¹⁹ The three deviant cities are the largely Jewish communities of Beverly Hills and Lake Elsinore, and Compton, which was 40 per cent Negro in 1960.

²⁰ Cf. Totton J. Anderson and Eugene C. Lee, "The 1964 Election in California," Western Political Quarterly, 18 (June, 1965), p. 465. Regional differences in California generally are much larger ference by party and region explains much more of the variance than when either independent variable is examined singly. Forty-four per cent of Bay Area Democrats and 32 per cent of those in Southern California intended to vote "no." The difference among Republican respondents was much greater: 33 per cent of the Bay Area Republicans planned to vote "no," compared to only 14 per cent of Southern California Republicans.

The populations of the two regions are virtually identical in education, income, occupation, and age. It is especially interesting that the two regions did not differ on one set of factors of obvious relevance to voting on Proposition 14: attitudes toward Negroes. White respondents from Southern California were no more or less liberal in their responses to a series of questions about race relations asked in the May California Poll.²¹

How then are we to account for the regional split in voting on Proposition 14? An important clue is the finding that results when regional variations in Proposition 14 voting are examined by various indices of socioeconomic status.

The regional difference is greatest at the highest status levels. In the Bay Area 57 per cent of white gentile respondents with three or more years of college intended to vote against Proposition 14; only 31 per cent of the same subgroup in Southern California planned to vote "no." The figures for respondents with less than three years of college are 32 per cent for the Bay Area and 22 per cent for Southern California. The regional difference for the better educated group is 26 per cent, compared to 10 per cent for the less educated respondents. The same phenomenon can be seen by in Republican primaries than in general elections. In the 1964 presidential primary, for example, Governor Rockefeller carried the Bay Area by more than 60 per cent, but got scarcely 40 per cent of the vote in Southern California.

²¹ Twenty-two per cent of persons moving to Southern California from 1955 to 1960 migrated from the southern and border states, compared to 16 per cent of such newcomers to the Bay Area. However the 1963 NORC survey found that "Northerners who formerly lived in the South (and these may be either Southern migrants or Northerners who spent some time in the South) are only slightly less pro-integrationist than their neighbors who have never been exposed to Southern life" (Sheatsley, op. cit., p. 227).

²² For further data and analysis of this point see Raymond E. Wolfinger and Fred I. Greenstein, "The Political Regions of California," (forthcoming in this Review). comparing regional variations in voting returns from cities with different income levels. Bay Area cities with 1959 median family incomes of less than $6000 had a mean "no" vote only six percentage points higher than comparable cities in Southern California, whereas Bay Area cities in the over-$8000 category had a mean "no" vote 19 per cent higher than their southern counterparts. The greatest differences of all are found in the richest communities in the two regions. For example, Southern California's San Marino, which had the highest median income ($16,728) of any incorporated city in the state, voted 14 per cent "no." Pacific Heights, the highest status neighborhood in San Francisco ($18,381 median family income and 36 per cent of all families making over $25,000), voted 48 per cent "no." Both San Marino and Pacific Heights are adjacent to Negro districts.

We explore elsewhere the proposition that the roots of California's political split may be found in the very different orientation of the leadership groups in the two parts of the state.23 California's regional voting patterns seem to be most divergent in referendum and primary elections. Voting choices in such contests are likely to be more responsive to leadership group influence than those in general election voting, where party identification guides most voters. Thus in the former elections newspaper endorsements, for example, will tend to be far more important.24 Most newspapers in Southern California urged their readers to vote for Proposition 14, while those in the Bay Area were largely opposed. The proposition was the creation of the California Real Estate Association, which also contributed a good deal of money to the election campaign; but several real estate boards in the Bay Area passed resolutions opposing it. The San Francisco Junior Chamber of Commerce also took a stand against the proposition. In the North bumper stickers—an index of opinions of the politically active-were predominantly against the proposition; in the South the vast majority urged support for it. Southern California is, of course, a center of highly organized and vociferous radical right activity. While the actual number of people engaged in these activities is small in absolute terms, it amounts to a much larger proportion of the electorate there than around the Bay Area.

23 Thid

²⁴ Or so the conventional wisdom tells us. On the other hand, Mueller's analysis of patterns on individual ballots in the 1964 election indicates minimal press influence on proposition voting decisions (Mueller, op. cit.).

Santa Clara County, at the south end of San Francisco Bay, provides an example of the effects of unusually intense leadership activity in the form of campaigning. In addition to the core city of San Jose, the county includes traditional farm towns as well as a variety of suburbs ranging from brand-new, workingclass tract cities to established, well-to-do communities. Palo Alto and other suburbs heavily settled by people from Stanford University and adjacent scientific industries were the source of an intensive anti-14 effort. This area produced more than 2000 precinct workers who campaigned against the proposition in all parts of the county, and also contributed $65,000 to the state-wide campaign. Several local real estate boards passed resolutions opposing Preposition 14. The effects of this activity, and the general opinion climate that it both reflected and enhanced, can be seen in the voting returns. Santa Clara County voted 47 per cent against the proposition. More significantly, none of the 15 cities in the county voted less than 42 per cent "no."25

A particularly striking example of the impact of precinct work and other efforts to shape community sentiment can be found in Table 9. which compares the socioeconomic characteristies and voting performance of two quite similar towns, one (Milpitas) in Santa Clara County and the other (Newark) a few miles up the freeway in another county. Both communities are quite new and both are populated largely by skilled and clerical workers who live in moderately priced subdivisions. As Table 9 shows, the demographic characteristics of the two towns' residents (many of whom work in a mammoth automobile assembly plant in Milpitas) are almost identical. Yet Milpitas voted 47 per cent "no" and Newark voted 30 per cent "no." We find it difficult to explain this difference except as a result of the vigorous anti-14 campaign waged in Santa Clara County.

The voting patterns of those parts of Northern California outside the Bay Area also suggest that campaign activity and the positions taken by particular community leaders may have had considerable impact on voting patterns. California contains vast stretches of very thinly populated land which is unsuitable for farming. The occasional towns in this area, which comprises most of California to the north ²⁵ Another example of the effect of precinct work is Marin County, a well-to-do suburban area just north of San Francisco. The county as a whole voted 48 per cent against Proposition 14 and no city in the county voted less than 42 per cent "no."

TABLE 9. COMPARISON OF VOTING AND CENSUS DATA FOR MILPITAS

AND NEWARK

	Milpitas (Santa Clara County)	Newark (Alameda County)
Per cent No on Prop. 14	47	30
Per cent for Johnson	72	69
Per cent for Salinger	63	57
Per cent employed in mfg.	44	44
Per cent non-white	6	2
Median family income	$6700	$ 6700

of San Francisco, depend for their livelihood on logging, fishing, livestock, and mining. The only county of the 58 in California which returned a majority against 14 is Modoc County. located beyond the main range of the Sierra Nevada in the extreme northeastern corner of the state, more than 300 miles from San Francisco. The local newspaper there opposed Proposition 14, as did the only metropolitan daily with any circulation in the county. A very active campaign against the proposition was conducted in Modoc County, in good measure by an articulate and energetic minister who organized discussion groups, stimulated the circulation of literature, and easily bested proponents of the proposition in debate. Various prominent citizens in the area publicized their hostility to Proposition 14, as did civic organizations. Not nearly so much was done by the proposition's supporters.

Modoc County is the most striking example of a somewhat surprising finding: many of the places where Proposition 14 was most unpopular are in the backwoods. Several cities in the remoter parts of California even returned majorities against the proposition. On the other hand, other similar towns voted quite strongly for it. Either the long-term character of these towns or the more or less fortuitous inclinations of those people who participated actively in the 1964 campaign, or some combination of these factors, evidently had a good deal to do with the voting in these communities.²⁶

²⁶ At the county level, the proposition fared worst in three counties in the Bay Area: Marin, Santa Clara, and San Francisco (47 per cent "no"); and three backwoods counties, all hundreds of miles from any city of consequence: Modoc, Siskiyou (48 per cent "no"), and Shasta (48 per cent "no"). It was most popular in a disparate pair of counties: Orange, the famed heartland of Southern California conservatism (22 per

There are very few Negroes in the remote parts of California and civil rights is not much of an issue there.²⁷ We think it likely that the lower salience of the issue in such places increased voter susceptibility to the influence of leading citizens or, for that matter, anyone who happened to exert himself on one side or the other on the proposition, even without intensive door-to-door campaigns of the sort mounted in Santa Clara County.

III. MOTIVATIONS UNDERLYING VOTING ON PROPOSITION 14

Opponents of Proposition 14 based their case on the desirability of providing equal housing opportunity for minority groups, particularly Negroes. The "no" vote was solicited, in the phrase of the bumper stickers, as "a vote against prejudice and discrimination." Needless to say, the proposition's proponents did not argue in favor of "prejudice," "discrimination," and "inequality," at least not in their public messages. The "yes on 14" forces stressed the principles of "property rights" and "non-compulsion," and succeeded in wording the proposition accordingly: the state and its subdivisions were barred from limiting the "right of any person to sell, lease, or rent residential real property to any person...he chooses" [our emphasis].

What attitudes and values actually lay behind the voting? Can we attribute the proposition's success simply to race prejudice? Or was it in part a vote in favor of "property rights," as many optimistic liberals and complacent conservatives claimed? Were some cent "no"), and Mono, a vast expanse of deserts and mountains behind the Sierra Nevada (22 per cent "no").

The phenomenon of sharply divergent voting by ecologically similar (and typically rural) political units has been reported for such diverse settings as Indiana, Alabama, and southern Italy. See V.O. Key, Jr. and Frank Munger, "Social Determinism and Electoral Decision: the Case of Indiana," in Eugene Burdick and Arthur J. Brodbeck (eds.), American Voting Behavior (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1959), pp. 281-299; V.O. Key, Jr., Southern Politics (New York: Knopf, 1949), p. 282; and Sidney G. Tarrow, Peasant Communism in Southern Italy (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966), p. 193.

²⁷ Rogin found that Wallace was less successful in Wisconsin's rural counties and attributed this to the paucity of Negroes and consequent abstract quality of the race issue there (op. cit., pp. 105–106).

people voting for the principle of noncompulsion in social relationships, or perhaps just in real estate transactions?

We have already dismissed the contention that Californians voted "yes" on Proposition 14 mistakenly because of response set or inability to understand that one had to vote "no" on the proposition in order to express approval of fair housing legislation. A rather more sophisticated voter-confusion thesis might be called the "item wording hypothesis." This hypothesis argues that the wording of the proposition, by stressing certain positively valued symbols-"rights," "any person . . . he chooses"-succeeded in winning over the electorate, and that a proposition in support of fair housing, if equally positively worded, would have been approved by the electorate. This explanation falls apart when we look at the California Poll's wording of its question about the Rumford Act. The Act was explained to respondents (after their level of familiarity with it had been ascertained) in positive terms which are fully consistent with current rhetoric in defense of the American Creed:

... the Rumford Act is a law which makes it illegal for apartment house owners, owners of publicly assisted housing, and real estate brokers to discriminate against anyone because of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry in the renting or selling of housing accommodations.

Nevertheless, we have seen that the voters consistently expressed their disapproval of the act—initially even more so than their approval of Proposition 14. The unpopularity of fair housing legislation among white voters is evident. Homeowners were about 8 per cent more hostile to the Rumford Act, but because they were also more likely to be Republicans, Southern Californians, etc., we are unsure that this finding can be interpreted as indicating the importance of a belief in "property rights."

One serious impediment to believing that opposition to the Act (and opposition to civil rights laws in general) was based on anything but prejudice is the commonplace use of non-prejudice arguments by opponents of such measures in circumstances when it is obvious that these arguments are a mask for intolerance. This is particularly clear, of course, in the southern case against national civil rights legislation. Hence it is difficult to accept such "philosophical" arguments when they are advanced elsewhere. For example, allegations that dislike of "compulsion" underlies opposition to civil rights laws meet the fact that until very recently Jim Crow laws compelling separation of the races in various contexts were commonplace in the South. Similarly, it seems likely that most of the people, in both North and South, who still support laws against miscegenation are undeterred by "constitutional" objections to compulsion. It has been less than fifteen years since California law prohibited people born in the Orient from owning land in the state.²⁸ In short, the pitfalls in such interpretations are enormous.

Yet the simple explanation of the election result in terms of "race prejudice" is unsatisfactory, since race prejudice is not a simple, unidimensional phenomenon. The conception that Gunnar Myrdal introduced in his formulation, "rank order of discrimination"29—that attitudes toward different aspects of racial equality can be ranked in descending order of popularity—is now well established by research, although different studies show slight variations in rankings depending upon such considerations as the time and place of the survey and the precise wording of the question.30 And it is also well established that in all regions of the United States there has been a steady increase in receptivity toward equality for Negroes in various spheres, as well as a general decrease in negative stereotypes about Negroes.31

As our comparison of the May 1964 California Poll findings with data from other states indicates, Calfornians clearly have participated in the general trend toward liberalization of racial attitudes; they also fall in the familiar pattern of contextual variation in the extent to which they support Negro equality. Thus in the May survey the substantial disapproval of the Rumford Act was not part of a general pattern of racism: we have already noted that only 13 per cent said they definitely would move if Negroes "came to live next door." Two-thirds favored national legislation requiring equal treatment of Negroes in public accommodations (restaurants, hotels, etc.). Eighty-eight per cent would have no objection to "sending your children to a school where a few of the children are colored." Fifty-eight per cent favored a substantial program of Federal expenditure for Negro education and job training. On the other hand, large majorities (of about 75 per cent) were opposed to Negro mass demonstrations and when the questions about school and residential integration were phrased so as to raise the spectre of substantial numbers of Negroes in the school or neighborhood, white opposition rose sharply.

²⁸ This was done by means of the alien land law, which, made largely inoperable by court decisions, was repealed by referendum in the 1956 election: 1,391,000 people voted against its repeal.

Attitudes toward residential integration appear to occupy a peculiar position in "the rank order of discrimination" of white Americans, particularly Northerners. These attitudes seem to stand almost as a watershed between areas in which resistance to accepting Negroes as equals is high enough to be virtually at the taboo level and areas in which resistance now has become relatively slight, possibly because of the implications for intimacy of personal association that residential integration has for many people. Thus in a 1966 Harris survey the percentage of whites who would object if their teenage child "dated a Negro" was 88; if a close friend or relative married a Negro, 79. But few objected to more segmented, impersonal interracial relationships—for example, to sitting next to a Negro in a restaurant (16 per cent) or movie (20 per cent). Other studies show that resistance to job and political equality is low. The proportion of objections in the Harris survey to "a Negro family moving next door" was 48 per cent, roughly half way between the two clusters of responses.32 As Hyman and Sheatsley point out in their review of liberalizing trends in racial attitudes over a 22-year period, "the shift of attitudes in the North . . . has been smallest on the residential issue."33 Surveys taken since 1964 indicate that this trend has stopped altogether, at least for the moment.34

We have analyzed the May California Poll findings on racial attitudes in order to see how these attitudes relate to views on fair housing legislation. The general finding that emerges is that people who are opposed to all forms of racial contact and to other civil rights legislation are very likely to be hostile to the Rumford Act, while the most "extreme" minority on the other side, those people who take the liberal position even when it is quite unpopular, ²³ Gunnar Myrdal, An American Dilemma (New York: McGraw-Hill paperback edition, 1964; originally published in 1944), I, pp. 60ff.

³⁰ See the works cited in note 9.

³¹ Herbert H. Hyman and Paul B. Sheatsley, "Attitudes toward Desegregation," Scientific American (July, 1964), 16-23; and Schwartz, op. cit., ch. 1.

³² Newsweek (August 22, 1966), p. 26.

³³ Hyman and Sheatsley, op. cit., p. 19. Their review does not consider the taboo areas of interracial marriage and dating. Attitudes on these issues seem to have been reasonably stable.

³⁴ Erskine, "The Polls: Negro Housing," op. cit., pp. 491, 493, 495.

TABLE 10. IMPRESSIONS OF THE RUMFORD ACT, OF WHITE SUPPORTERS

	Attitude toward the Rumford Act
	Approve	Disapprove
Equality in housing Force, taking away	47%	19%
freedom of choice	4%	44%

are by no means as likely to be wholehearted supporters of the act. Only about one-eighth of the white respondents would definitely move if a Negro family moved in next door; about 14 per cent of these people favor the Rumford Act. Only eight per cent of the minority of whites who are opposed to a public accommodations law favor the Rumford Act. But liberal minorities do not display anything like this level of unanimity. The quarter of whites who say they would not move if many Negroes moved into their neighborhood, the group which might be considered most tolerant of residential integration, divides about evenly on the Rumford Act. Similar relationsips are found on other questions where the most liberal position is taken only by a minority.35 In short, the most tolerant respondents are split on the Rumford Act, while the most prejudiced minority is almost wholly opposed to it.

Can reasons other than antipathy to Negro neighbors help explain the unwillingness of Californians to accept the Rumford Act? The data in Table 10 provide some preliminary clues. In March respondents were asked what the Rumford Act was about. Table 10 shows certain of the answers of white supporters and 35 The extensive nationwide survey of attitudes on racial issues by Louis Harris Associates in 1963 produced similar findings: for any given aspect of race relations a great many more whites said they were for integration than supported laws aimed at securing it. Thus 88 per cent approved equal job opportunities, but only 62 per cent supported federal fair employment practices legislation. See William Brink and Louis Harris, The Negro Revolution in America (New York: Simon and Shuster, 1964), p. 142. Conceivably this is a case of white hypocrisy: lip service in favor of equality and unwillingness to do anything to bring it about. But if talk is so cheap in an interview, if the respondent is insincere in his protestations of belief in equality. why should he become frank when talking about legislation?

opponents of the Act. People hostile to the law seem quite concerned about the element of compulsion involved, while its supporters are totally unconcerned about this aspect. In contrast to the Act's supporters, its opponents do not appear to care much about discrimination —perhaps because they ignore it, but perhaps in at least some cases because they are unaware of it. It appears that a substantial proportion of the white population does not believe that Negroes are discriminated against. Fifty per cent of the May California respondents did not feel that Negroes were denied job opportunities in Calfornia, compared to 33 per cent who acknowledged that this was the case. And nationally, the great bulk (69 per cent) of Americans feel that "most Negroes are treated fairly in the United States," a percentage that (unlike anti-Negro prejudices) has not changed markedly since the early 1940's.36 These and other data suggest that fair housing propaganda emphasizing the theme of racial discrimination is quite ineffective with many people, since their perspectives on this issue do not include acceptance of the fact of discrimination.37 We have no way of knowing how much of this is due to ignorance of and indifference to the problem, and how much to selective perception resulting from anti-Negro sentiment or other stereotyped orientations.

IV. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

To summarize: the voting outcome cannot be attributed to the putative conservatism of 36 Bruno Bettleheim and Morris Janowitz, Social Change and Prejucice (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1364), p. 13. See also Schwartz, op. cit., pp. 71-72. There appear to be no useful data on white recognition that Negroes are denied equal opportunities to obtain decent housing (ibid., pp. 52-53), except perhaps for the 1966 Harris finding that two-thirds of all whites think that Negro housing is worse than white housing (Brink and Harris. Black and White, op. cit., p. 136). This latter finding is not quite the same thing as saying that two-thirds of all whites attribute the disparity in housing to racial discrimination.

³⁷ For research suggesting the existence of a group of "naive non-perceivers," i.e., unprejudiced people who are unaware of anti-Negro discrimination, see Edward R. Tufte, Paul Ekman, and Louis S. Levine, "The Perception of Discrimination Against the Negro and Support for Civil Rights" (Princeton: unpublished paper, 1967). For a journalistic account making the same point see Rodney Stark and Stephen Steinberg, "Jews and Christians in Suburbia," Harper's Magazine (August, 1967).

the California electorate; there is no evidence that California voters are more conservative on civil rights than those of other northern states. Nor can it be attributed to mistakes resulting from the complexities of voting on the proposition. Whatever confusion existed at the early stages of the campaign worked against the measure's passage; and most of the confusion seemed to have disappeared by election day as a result of the intensive campaign conducted by both sides.

The fixed point in the campaign was attitudes toward the Rumford Act. Voters were heavily opposed to the Act from the start and remained so, although no doubt the stable percentages on this point conceal some change in both directions. During the final period of the campaign there was a slight increase in the "yes" vote-probably a result of voters' greater ability to connect their views on the Act to the appropriate vote intention. Sympathy with fair housing legislation and opposition to Proposition 14 were positively associated with education, minority group status, Democratic party identification, and residence in the Bay Area as opposed to Southern California. The greater conservatism of Southern California on this and other electoral issues is particularly evident in high income communities; it may be that these communities are especially responsive to the conservative press in Southern California and the region's wellorganized conservative and radical right groups.

The motivations underlying Californians' consistently negative response to fair housing legislation cannot be fully explored with our data, but aspects of the data and of the broader body of literature on racial attitudes suggest that residential segregation is a particularly sensitive issue to whites and that white resistance to Negro equality is particularly strong where housing is concerned.³⁸ In 1967 only 35 per cent of a national sample favored a national fair housing law, 54 per cent opposed it, and the rest had no opinion.³⁹

The numerous propositions on the California ballot in every general election—many of them quite arcane—are a survival from the ²⁸ Myrdal has pointed out that, in the North, residential segregation has performed in much the same fashion as southern Jim Crow laws as a barrier to interracial contact (op. cit., pp. 618-627).

²⁹ Erskine, "The Polls: Negro Housing," op. cit., p. 491. The figures given in the text are based on the three-fifths of the Gallup sample who could give a satisfactory explanation of the term "open housing."

Progressive era, when the referendum was considered a way to reduce the influence of special interests. 40 Among contemporary political scientists it is more common to assume that asking voters to pass judgment on substantive policy questions strains their information and interest, leading them to decisions that may be inconsistent with their own desires. The consequence is subversion of representative government and the exercise of undue influence by groups that can afford to gather the signatures to qualify a measure for the referendum ballot and then wage a publicity campaign that will have an impact on voters. 41

Most of these criticisms are not too relevant to the present case, however. Few referendum items are voted on with the same amount of publicity, debate, and voter information as Proposition 14, where the issue was both immediate and easily understood. But there are other elements in the situation that must be considered in assessing the referendum as a device for making policy. The most obvious point of departure is a comparison of how the Rumford Act has fared in the legislature—the alternative to the referendum as a law-making arena. The remarkable thing about this comparison is the disparity in outcomes between the two processes, for the legislature has persistently failed to reflect the wishes of the state's voters. In 1964 there were no signs that either the governor or the legislature was giving serious consideration to repealing the Rumford Act, even as its widespread unpopularity became clear. But two years later, in the aftermath of the Watts riots, black power, and the white backlash, Governor Brown lost by a million votes to a candidate who made capital out of these developments.

⁴⁰ While the initiative and referendum are employed in some other states, these devices are most frequently used in California, where there has been an average of 22 propositions on the ballot in every general election since their inauguration in 1911. See Joseph P. Harris, California Politics, 4th edition (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Company, 1967), pp. 112–113.

41 A measure is qualified for a place on the ballot by submission of petitions bearing the valid signatures of eight per cent of the vote in the preceding gubernatorial election (currently about 500,000 signatures). This task almost always is done by a signature-collecting firm, which currently charges about $250,000 to qualify a single measure (ibid., p. 115). Proposition 14, however, was put on the ballot by signatures that were collected almost exclusively by volunteers (Casstevens, op. cit., p. 50). In 1964 more than half a million dollars was spent on each proposition on the ballot. See Thomas W. Casstevens, "Reflections on the Initiative Process," in Eugene C. Lee (ed.), The California Governmental Process (Boston: Little, Brown, 1966), p. 89. While the anti-referendum viewpoint is the current conventional wisdom among political scientists, the California system does have its academic defenders: see, e.g., Henry A. Turner and John A. Vieg, The Government and Politics of California, 2nd edition (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964), pp. 77-87.

Does this mean that those politicians responsible for the passage of the Rumford Act (notably Brown and the Democratic legislators) behaved irrationally? From the standpoint of electoral advantage, it appears that the answer is negative. The state legislators running for re-election in 1964 did not appear to have suffered because of their votes on the Act, despite the electorate's overwhelming repudiation of it. Moreover, in 1967, after Brown's defeat, a bill to repeal the Act passed the state senate but was handily defeated in the assembly. The assembly's bill to modify 42 Our data provide no indications that there was any significant backlash in the 1964 senatorial and presidential voting in California. The state legislators running in the 1964 election undoubtedly were somewhat insulated by a general lack of public awareness of their activities, if not of their identities. Even at the congressional level public awareness of individual legislators and their activities is slight; see Donald E. Stokes and Warren E. Miller. "Party Government and the Saliency of Congress," Public Opinion Quarterly, 26 (Winter, 1932), 531-546. Nationwide, President Johnson probably gained some votes on the civil rights issue, for while he suffered a small net loss of support from Democrats, this was more than balanced by the Republicans and Independents with positive Civil Rights attitudes who voted for him, (See Campbell, "Civil Rights and the Vote for President," op. cit., p. 31).

⁴² Ironically, the Rumford Act was passed in 1963 by a notoriously malapportioned state senate and rejected four years later by a senate that had been reapportioned on a one-man-one-vote basis. Between the 1961 and 1965 apportionments the 21 northernmost counties had four per cent of California's population but elected ten of the 40 members of the state senate. Seven of these senators voted for the Rumford Act, two voted against it, and the tenth abstained. (The ten largest counties, with 70 per cent of the state's population, also had ten senators, five of whom voted "yes," four "no", and one abstained.) These seven "cow county" legislators provided the Act (supported by Governor Ronald Reagan and bitterly denounced by the California Real Estate Association) was rejected by the senate and the session ended with the Rumford Act intact, still the law of the state. In 1968 Governor Reagan became more favorably inclined toward the Rumford Act and the likelihood that it would be repealed dwindled close to zero.

We have no way of knowing if the Act would have passed in the first place if the state's politicians had known how unpopular it was, but other considerations than the quantitative distribution of attitudes seem to have been highly relevant in the calculations made by the politicians who brought about its passage. The Rumford Act was passed on Governor Brown's insistence, after a long and difficult struggle. In the course of the battle a group of young civil rights workers chained themselves to a stairway in the capitol building as part of a four-week sit-in that ended only when the bill passed. This episode embarrassed the bill's sponsors, who felt that it would alienate moderate white opinion and offend undecided legislators. But it also must have been to some politicians a sign of the depth of Negro feeling. Some Democratic legislators must have been more worried about losing Negro votes than about the real estate and apartment interests.

We noted earlier one cf the advantages of the legislative over the plebiscitory decisionmaking process: the former not only permits but is characterized by compromises between the initial demands of groups of varying size and intensity. In referenda, of course, compromise is impossible once the issue has been formally posed. A second, closely related advantage of legislatures is that they typically take account of the intensity of demands as well as their numerical support, while in referenda every voter's preference, no matter how casual, is equally weighted. The legislative process is responsive to intensity because legislators (consciously or unconsciously) ask themselves how much the interested parties care about the issue since they want to find out what the cost in votes and other forms of campaign support will be of disappointing one side or the other.

Calculations about intensity are relevant to the Act's margin of victory. It appears that, unconstrained by constituent opinion, they were free to indulge their own liberal beliefs (in some cases) or accede to the claims of party loyalty (all were Democrats) and the Governor's insistence on passing a fair housing bill.

considerations other than electoral advantage. First, a politician may feel on principle that, all things being equal, he would rather respond to an intense minority than a more or less lukewarm majority, particularly if he thinks the minority's claim is legitimate. It appears that Governor Brown's strong support of the Rumford Act was based on such a view, along with a belief that fair housing was essential to any strategy of coping with the Negro problem. Second, as the history of California race relations since Watts reminds us, judgments about intensity are crucial data for the enterprise of making policies designed to minimize civil strife. A key consideration in assessing civil rights proposals is whether their passage or failure will increase or reduce the likelihood of racial disturbances.44

⁴⁴ We think that similar calculations by national politicians were the basis of the federal Fair Housing Act of 1968. We know of no survey data on white attitudes to such legislation which were collected in the spring of 1968, when the bill was passed by both houses of Congress. The most recent findings seem to be those of a year earlier, which showed whites opposed to the proposal by a ratio of three to two (see note 39). We think it un-

While politicians inevitably are imperfect in their calculations about intensity, voters are unlikely to make such judgments at all, particularly when their views are channeled through the referendum process. Nor are they likely to be disposed or able to make calculations about the possible ways in which a policy which they desire might detract from other of their preferences—such as for civil peace. If, as seems likely, the next several years of civil rights politics in the North are characterized by confrontations between angry, demanding Negroes and intransigent whites, with violence a common recourse of disappointed Negroes, then the referendum will become an increasingly inappropriate political tool and processes leaving room for calculation and compromise will be more necessary than ever. But we have no doubt also that the referendum will continue to be a tempting opportunity.

likely that white opinion on this issue changed very much, but the intensity of Negro protest increased considerably. This discussion is, of course, strongly influenced by Robert A. Dahl, A Preface to Democratic Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1955).

FACTIONS AND COALITIONS IN ONE-PARTY JAPAN: AN INTERPRETATION BASED ON THE THEORY OF GAMES

MICHAEL LEISERSON University of California, Berkeley

I. "COALITION GOVERNMENT" IN JAPAN1

In constitutional form and in practice, the Japanese national government is parliamentary. Authority is centered in the Diet,² and power is held by the parties in the Diet. Unlike the pre-war system, for example, the Diet parties really do choose the Prime Ministers.

The post-war party system changed fundamentally in 1955, when the non-socialist parties combined and formed the mammoth Liberal-Democratic Party (LDP). Since its formation in 1955, the LDP has always had a safe majority in both Houses of the Diet. But, from its beginning as a union of several political streams to the present, the LDP has been made up of several rather stable factions. These factions are the key actors in the biennial election of the party president, who naturally becomes the Prime Minister. As a general rule, votes in a party presidential election are on straight lines. So a Prime Minister is chosen by a coalition of LDP factions which controls a majority of votes at the party convention. Furthermore, the factions present nominees for Cabinet posts, and Ministers are chosen from among these nominees. Cabinet posts become rewards for the factions which voted for the Prime Minister, inducements to opposing factions to enter the Prime Minister's coalition, and buffers to soften or weaken the opposition of hostile factions. In short, the struggle over top political leadership in Japan—the president and the top officials of the ruling party, the Prime Minister, and other Cabinet membersis waged by the LDP factions. (The struggle over policy, on the other hand, is waged by other actors, within the framework established by the outcome of the factions' struggle over leadership.)³ And because of the wide range of opinion within the LDP, the outcomes of the factions' struggle over top political leadership are very important for Japan. A switch from an Ishibashi to a Kishi, or from a Kishi to an Ikeda, is certainly as significant as, say, the replacement of a Laniel by a Mendès-France.

¹ The research reported on in this article was conducted under the auspices of a Fulbright Fellowship, 1965-67. The material gathered in the course of this research has also been used in "Coalition Government in Japan," Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan (forthcoming), "Jiminto to wa, Renritsu Seiken to Mitsuketari," Chuo Koron (August, 1967), and "Coalition Politics in One-Party Japan," The Study of Coalition Behavior, S. Groennings, W. E. Kelley, and M. Leiserson (eds.) (Holt-Rinehart-Winston, forthcoming).

2 "National Assembly" would be a better translation, but "Diet" is official.

A brief digression is necessary in order to make clear the peculiar nature of the LDP factions, because these factions are not typical of factions in Japan or elsewhere.4 The year after its formation, the LDP decided that its president would be chosen by vote, with LDP Diet members holding practically all the votes. Up until this radical innovation, and for a little while after it, factions in the LDP were more or less what factions in Japan-or anywherehad always been: a nucleus of a few key lieutenants around a leader, with a rather unreliable following. But after this innovation was put into operation, in the election of Ishibashi Tanzan as LDP president in 1956, the nature of the factions changed. In Ishibashi's election, Kishi Nobusuke, who was the "obvious" winner, the strong man who certainly would have won if the old method of hanashiai or "talks" had been used, did not win. Parliamentary arithmetic—that is, the skillful coordination of factions into a coalition which was numerically a majority—defeated Kishi and proved just how significant the innovation had been. Thereafter, within two years, the factions became like army "divisions," headed by a "general" who was advised by his "General Staff." There were "line officers," fixed and known memberships, offices, publications, regular sources of funds, and so forth. In a word, the factions became institutionalized, and, because of that change, became able to perform some of the functions of parties in a coalition cabinet system of government.

³ The LDP is at the center of policy-making, and has developed an elaborate organizational structure within the party paralleling the organs of the Diet and the Ministries. But the factions are not unified actors in policy-making. There is some evidence of policy agreement within the "extreme" factions—the Kishi-Fukuda and Nakasone factions, for instance—but it is clear that most factions contain serious internal divisions on policy, and that the factions do not usually attempt to set a policy "line" for their members. All this does not deny, of course, that faction leaders may play an important part in policy making.

⁴ But for a different view, see for example, R. Scalapino and J. Masumi, Farties and Politics in Contemporary Japan (Berkeley: Univ. of Calif. Press, 1962), passim.

⁵ On earlier methods of choosing Japanese political party leaders, see Watanabe Tsuneo, Toshu to Seito (Party and Party Leader), (Tokyo: Kobundo, 1961), Chap. 7, and the same author's Seiji no Misshitsu (The "Snoke-filled Room" of Politics) (Tokyo: Sekkasha, 1966).

There have been five LDP Prime Ministers. four of whom gained power after the election system was inaugurated.8 Ishibashi Tanzan was elected in 1956 by a coalition of five factions, led by Ishii Mitsujiro, Ikeda Hayato, Ono Bamboku, Miki Takeo, and Ishibashi himself. Prime Minister Ishibashi began his term with great personal popularity and amid widespread hopes for improvement of relations with Mainland China. But he was stricken with a severe illness less than two months after taking office, and was replaced by Kishi Nobusuke, who had opposed him in the December election. In that election Kishi had been supported by his brother Sato Eisaku and by Kono Ichiro, and later the Ono faction joined this coalition. This main-stream of Kishi-Sato-

⁶ The terms are those used by Japanese newspaper reporters. The present and following historical remarks in the text are based on the vernacular press of the time.

⁷ This does not touch at all upon the fascinating question of what maintains the factions. See G. O. Totten and T. Kawakami, "The Functions of Factionalism in Japanese Politics," Pacific Affairs (1966); 109–122; Watanabe Tsuneo, Habatsu: Nihon Hoshuto no Bunseki (Factions: An Analysis of Japan's Conservative Party), (Tokyo: Kobundo, rev. ed., 1964), Chap. 10; and Kawakami Tamio, "Habatsu Rikigaku ni tsuite no Ichi Kosatsu" (A Study of the Dynamics of Factions"), in Kodo Kagaku Kenkyu (Behavioral Science Research) 2 (1966), 29–36.

⁸ The most informative and perceptive research on the LDP factions in English has been done by Hans H. Baerwald. See his "Factional Politics in Japan," Current History 46 (April, 1964), 223–229, and his yearly summaries of developments in the January issue of Asian Survey, 1964, 1965, 1967. The best description of the history of LDP presidential elections is in Watanabe, Habatsu, op. cit., Chap. 9.

Kono-Ono ruled Japan from 1957 until mid-1959 when, shaken by the controversy caused by the unpopular Police Duties Law revision bill, the Prime Minister changed his coalition. The powerful Ikeda faction, which had been leading the anti-Kishi forces, entered the ruling coalition, and the weaker Kono faction was expelled.

This new ruling coalition or main-stream of Kishi-Sato-Ikeda-Ono governed Japan until the end of 1960, through the great storm which arose over the Security Treaty revision in 1959-60. The same coalition, minus the Ono faction, elected Ikeda to follow Kishi as Prime Minister, over the opposition of all the other factions. But the Kishi-Sato-Ikeda coalition did not last much longer. In 1960-61 the Kishi faction split and the Kishi-Fukuda group went into opposition. Prime Minister Ikeda countered this development by bringing the Kono and Ono factions into his coalition, but this only antagonized the Sato faction, which saw Sato's position as Ikeda's successor to the Prime Ministership in danger. The Prime Minister countered this further loss of support by drawing the Miki faction into the ruling coalition. Thus, when Ikeda, riding the wave of prosperity generated by his "double the national income" plan, was re-elected for a third term in 1964, the ruling coalition was composed of Ikeda-Kono-Ono-Miki-Kawashima. The anti-main-stream was Kishi-Fukuda-Sato-Ishii-Fujiyama. Nevertheless, when Prime Minister Ikeda was stricken by cancer later that year, he nominated Mr. Sato to succeed him as Prime Minister. As his brother had done seven years before, Prime Minister Sato quickly turned his minority coalition into a winning coalition, by the addition of the Miki and Kawashima factions. The ruling coalition of Sato-Kishi-Fukuda-Miki-Kawashima (plus some others: see Section V) has continued to govern Japan to the present, restoring relations with South Korea, surviving the kuroi kiri scandals of 1966, and re-electing Prime Minister Sato to a second term of office last December.9

⁹ Mr. Ishii is presently Speaker of the Lower House. Mr. One held various posts in his long career, including the LDP vice presidency under Prime Ministers Kishi and Ikeda, but died in 1964. Miki Takeo is presently Foreign Minister. Mr. Kone was a perennial strong-man in many Cabinets, and a leading contender for the Prime Ministership, until his death in 1965. Fukuda Takeo later served as Minister of Finance, and is presently the Secretary-General of the LDP. Kawashima Shojiro is a pre-war party veteran

TABLE 1. LDP PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, PRIME MINISTERS, AND COALITIONS

Date of LDP Presidential Election	Victor, i.e., Prime Minister	Main-stream (besides P.M.'s faction)	Neutrals, Opposition
Before 12/56	Hatoyama	Kono, Kishi, Ono, Ishii	Miki, Ikeda, Sato
12/56	Ishibashi	Ikeda, Ishii, Miki, Ono	Kishi, Sato, Kono
2/57	Kishi	Sato, Kono, Ono	Miki, Ikeda, Ishii, Ishibashi
		general election
1/59	Kishi	Sato, Kono, Ono	Miki, Ikeda, Ishii, Ishibashi
7/60	Ikeda	Kishi (Fujiyama, Kawashima,	Kono, Ono, Miki,
		Fukuda), Sato	Ishii, Ishibashi
7/62	Ikeda	(ran unopposed; an "era of good	faelings")
	IRCUI	general election
7/64	Ikeda	Kono, Ono, Miki, Kawashima	Kishi-Fukuda, Sato, Fujiyama, Ishii
11/64	Sato	Kishi-Fukuda, Miki, Kawashima, Ishii, Murakami	Kono, Fujiyama, Funada
12/66	Sato	Kishi-Fukuda, Miki, Kawashima, Ishii, Murakami, Mori-Shigemasa	Nakasone, Fujiyama, Funada, Maeo

Notes: For a similar list, see Watanabe's Seiji no Misshitsu, pp. 152, 156. In 1960-61 the Kishi faction split into the Fujiyama, Kawashima, and Kishi-Fukuda factions. After the deaths of Ono and Kono in 1964-65, their factions split into the Funada and Murakami, and Nakasone and Mori-Shigemasa factions, respectively. The Ikeda faction continued after its leader's death; the new leader was Mr. Maeo. The "Miki" faction was once the "Miki-Matsumura" faction. Before 12/56 several factions' leaders were different.

This brief history, which is summarized in Table 1, suggests four questions. First, why did the winner win in each election for party president? That is, why Ishibashi in 1956, Kishi in 1959, Ikeda in 1960 and 1964, and Sato in 1966? Second, when the Prime Minister resigned because of illness and his successor was who has held various Cabinet and party posts; currently he is the LDP vice president. His faction emerged from the Kishi faction when the latter split in 1961. Fujiyama Aiichiro, for many years president of the Japan Chamber of Commerce, entered full-time politics to become Prime Minister Kishi's Foreign Minister in 1957. His faction was also built up largely out of the old Kishi faction. He was the opposition candidate versus Mr. Sato in Dec., 1966.

¹⁰ Prime Ministers Kishi, Ikeda, and Sato won in uncontested elections in 1957, 1962, and 1964, respectively.

chosen through "talks," why was the particular successor chosen? Why did Kishi follow Ishibashi in 1957, and why did Sato follow Ikeda in 1964? Third, why did the Prime Minister change his ruling coalition? Why did Kishi drop Kono for Ikeda?" Fourth, what is happening now? Is the ruling coalition changing again, and if so why? Who will follow Prime Minister Sato? These are the questions I will try to answer in what follows.

II. A THEORY OF COALITION BEHAVIOR

To answer these questions in a systematic and consistent way requires a theory of coalition behavior. Such a theory was presented over twenty years ago by von Neumann and ¹¹ The question of why Prime Minister Ikeda changed his coalition is answered, in a narrow sense at least, by the observation that the break-up of the old Kishi faction created a new situation.

Morgenstern in *The Theory of Games and Eco*nomic Behavior. The N-M theory is the basis of the propositions developed in this section.¹²

First, three assumptions and some definitions. (1) Actors know what they want. That is, they know what the possible outcomes are (for example, what the winning coalitions are, what a winning coalition wins), and can rank these outcomes as more or less cesired. They know what each other wants, in the same sense. Definition: a "payoff" to an actor is the worth of an outcome to him. Tautologically, an actor tries to get more payoff rather than less payoff. Definition: a "payoff vector" is a list of the payoffs received by each actor. Payoff vector $X = (x_1, x_2, \ldots, x_n)$, where the entry x_i shows the payoff to actor i.

- (2) A coalition controls its member actors' payoffs in the sense that these actors cannot receive the controlled payoffs without entering the coalition. For example, only the members of the Government coalition receive Cabinet posts. Definition: the "value of a coalition" is all the various payoffs which all a coalition's members may individually receive, if the coalition forms. That is, $v(S) = (X, Y, \ldots)$, where X, Y, etc., are the payoff vectors which the members of coalition S control.
- (3) Coalitions are worth forming. For example, if two distinct losing coalitions combine together and become a winning coalition then the payoff vectors in v(S) for the larger, winning coalition certainly include all the payoff vectors in both v(S)s for the smaller, losing coalitions.

Given only these assumptions it is possible to define an N-M "solution." Some payoff vectors are dominated by other payoff vectors. This happens when all the members of a coalition prefer one payoff vector to another (that is, for all these actors the individual payoffs to them listed in the one vector are more valuable than the individual payoffs to them listed in the other vector), and when at the same time the preferred payoff vector is controlled by that coalition (that is, the preferred payoff vector is one of the vectors in v(S)). In symbols, 12 The N-M volume is now available in a Wiley Science Editions paper back(1964). The following relies on the formulation of L. S. Shapley and M. Shubik, "Solutions of n-person Games with Ordinal Utilities," Econometrica 21 (1953), 348-349, with one important modification (avoiding the notion of an "effective set") which was suggested by R. J. Aumann and B. Peleg, "Von Neumann-Morgenstern Solutions to Cooperative Games without Side-Payments," Bull. Amer. Math. Soc. 66 (1960), 173ff.

a payoff vector Y is dominated by a payoff vector X if X is in v(S) and if x_i is greater than y_i for each member i of S. (Intuitively, in open negotiations, Y would be rejected in favor of X). Call the set of all payoff vectors which are dominated by payoff vector X as D(X) = (Y:Y) is dominated by X.

Finally, label the set of all payoff vectors in which each actor receives no less than what he could achieve by himself alone, not in a coalition with anyone else, as C. Intuitively, C is the set of all possible payoff vectors.

Then a solution is defined as a set of payoff vectors $V = (X, Z, \ldots)$, which has two properties. (1) Every payoff vector in the set (C-V) is in D(X) for some X in V. That is, a possible payoff vector which is not in the solution set is dominated by some payoff vector which is in the solution set. (2) No payoff vector in V is in D(X) for any X in V. That is, no payoff vector in the solution set dominates another payoff vector in the solution set. These conditions may be combined: V = C-D(V). That is, the solution is a set of possible payoff vectors which do not dominate each other.

Obviously it is not easy to discover V, since the definition is circular (but not tautological). However, the problem is greatly simplified when the actual situation one is studying has the two properties: "constant-sum" and "simple." A simple coalition situation is defined as one in which every coalition is either losing or winning. A constant-sum simple coalition situation is defined as a simple situation in which every winning coalition controls exactly the same payoffs. If W is any winning coalition, then in a constant-sum simple coalition situation, $v(W_i) = v(W_i)$, for any W_i and W_i .

In a constant-sum simple coalition situation,

¹³ This is the N-M definition. Shapley has refined the concept; according to his classification the definition in the text is of a "strong simple game." See L. S. Shapley, "Simple Games," Behav. Sci. 7 (Jan., 1962), 59-66.

14 Until this point, interval scale measurement has not been assumed, but strictly speaking this statement is meaningless without such an assumption. However, in a situation where the actual physical quantities which underlie the payoffs are in fact constant (as when there are simply 17 Cabinet posts, for example), then I feel that it may be permissible to speak of "constant-sum" without actually demonstrating that interval scale measurement is possible. (And, of course, one can certainly speak of constant-sum without implying that utility is linear with money or some medium of exchange; i.e., there is no assumption here that utility is "transferable.") the "minimal winning coalitions" are very important. A minimal winning coalition, W^m , is defined as a W which would become losing if any member left the coalition. (There are usually several W^m , and the number of actors in each W^m , and the total resources of each W^m , are not necessarily the same). The reason why the W^m are so important in a constant-sum simple coalition situation is that only the W^m are relevant when considering dominance relations among payoff vectors. 15

In order to apply the N-M solution theory to constant-sum simple coalition situations (which are the type of situation the LDP factions are in), it is helpful to give a concrete interpretation of what defines a W. This can be done by the use of "weights." If one knows which coalitions are winning, then usually he can assign weights to the actors so that a coalition with a majority of the weights is always winning. For example, consider the LDP after the 1958 general elections, the time when Prime Minister Kishi had to form a coalition which would pass the Security Treaty.

where the percentages show how many LDP Dietmen were in each faction. In this situation (considering "intangible" factors as well as these percentages), I think that the W^m were: The Kishi-Sato bloc plus Ikeda, the Kishi-Sato bloc plus any two of Kono, Ono, Miki, or Ishii, and Ikeda plus any three of Kono, Ono, Miki or Ishii. So the weights that should be assigned to these actors in this situation are:

Kishi-Sato Ikeda Kono Ono Miki Ishii
$$w_i = 3$$
 2 1 1 1 1

¹⁵ This was proven by N-M, but the idea is intuitively clear also. If there is a W^n and an actor j not in the W^m , then by the constant-sum condition, $v(W^m) = v(W^m + j)$. So j is unnecessary, from W^m 's viewpoint. Any payoff which the members of W^m can get, they can get without j's help. Thus only W^m needs to be considered when calculating dominance relations among payoff vectors.

¹⁶ Actually the problem of assigning weights is more complex than this hurried treatment shows. Two key questions are: do the weights make blocking coalitions impossible, and is the sum of the weights in any W^m always the same? The N-M theory, as they formulated it and as used here, only applies if both of these questions can be answered positively.

Clearly the same W^m still exist; shifting from resources and "intangibles" to these particular weights has not changed the strategic possibilities for forming coalitions.¹⁷

When winning coalitions are defined with the aid of weights such as these, the N-M solution theory becomes strikingly simple. It states that in a constant-sum simple coalition situation, when an actor is in the actually-formed coalition, his payoff—if it is in the N-M solution—will be directly proportional to his weight. In the example, the N-M solution payoffs, if expressed on an interval scale, are:

or some multiple of these numbers. (Here, clearly, the constant-sum=1; i.e., v(W)=1; for any W). Note that N-M define a solution as a set of payoff vectors, any of which may happen. The whole solution Set is:¹⁹

¹⁷ See the Sources to Table 2 for an explanation of the meaning and the use made here of "intangible" factors. Briefly, the intangible factors I considered in assigning the factions' weights were (1) the financial backing of each faction, and (2) the likelihood that the "others" (not-factionally-aligned LDP members) would support each faction. These factors had to be considered, in assigning weights, since the percentages based upon memberships do not have the properties which N-M theory requires for weights. (See footnote 16.)

However, in the analyses of Sections III, IV, and V, I have used only the memberships of the factions, and a definition of "majority" as 51% of LDP Dietmen, when dealing with coalitions. The weights given in Table 2 were used only for making predictions on payoffs, as in Table 4. (Using the weights would not change any results for N-M theory, but using memberships makes it possible to contrast N-M theory with Riker's and Gamson's theories, as in Section IV.)

¹⁸ This is not how N-M put it; see Section 50.8.1 in N-M. The reason for this phrasing is given in footnote 22.

19 The reader can verify by inspection that none of these vectors dominates another. That one of these vectors dominates any other which is not in the solution will become clear simply by imagining some other vector and comparing it with these. For example, take (0, 1/3, 1/4, 1/4, 1/4, 0), for Kishi-Sato, Ikeda, Kono, Ono, Miki, and Ishii, respectively. Incidentally, it is known that N-M solution payoffs in situations like the present have

Kishi-Sato	Ikeda	Kono	Ono	Miki	Ishii	Coalition
(3/5,	2/5,	0,	0,	0,	0)	K-S+Ikeda
(3/5,	0,	1/5,	1/5,	0,	0)	K-S+K+On
(3/5,	0,	1/5,	0,	1/5,	0)	K-S+K+M
(3/5,	0,	1/5,	0,	0,	1/5)	K-S+K+Is
(3/5,	0,	0,	1/5,	1/5,	0)	K-S+On+M
(3/5,	0,	0,	1/5,	0,	1/5)	K-S+On+Is
(3/5,	0,	0,	0,	1/5,	1/5)	K-S+M+Is
(0,	2/5,	1/5,	1/5,	1/5,	0)	Ik+K+On+M
(0,	2/5,	1/5,	1/5,	0,	1/5)	Ik+K+On+Is
(0,	2/5,	1/5,	0,	1/5,	1/5)	Ik+K+M+Is
(0,	2/5,	0,	1/5,	1/5,	1/5)	Ik+On+M+Is

This N-M theory can be modified in order to make its basic proposition more applicable to on-going coalition situations. The modification takes the form of two supplementary propositions, which concern uncertainty in bargaining and dynamics (passage of time). The effect of the former proposition is to identify which of the several coalitions in the N-M solution set is likely to occur. The effect of the latter proposition is to identify certain contexts in which the N-M proposition should not be expected to hold. In time it may be possible to integrate these propositions into the N-M theory, but at present they are merely qualifications of the basic theory.²⁰

The proposition regarding bargaining is that as the number of actors increases there is a tendency for each actor to prefer to form a W^m with as few members as possible. If there are, say, ten actors, and the size of the W^m ranges from three to seven actors, then there will be a very strong tendency for the W^m with three members to form. The reasons for this tendency, briefly, are (a) that the members of the smaller W^m will prefer to form them, since negotiations and bargaining are easier to complete, and a coalition is easier to hold together, ceteris paribus, with fewer parties, and (b) that the bargaining advantage objectively held by the members of the smaller W^m vis-a-vis the actors who are not in the smaller W^m (which is reflected in the higher weights and higher payoffs) can only be guaranteed by using the threat which causes the advantage—i.e., by forming the smaller W^m . Because these reasons involve bargaining considerations, I will call this proposition—that W^m with fewest members form—the bargaining proposition.

The proposition regarding dynamics is that when a coalition situation requires only "periodic decisions" (e.g., an election every two years, and the winner is certain to remain the winner all during the entire inter-election period, as in elections for the LDP president). then the N-M solution theory must be modified so as to allow for inter-decision "maintenance" of the winning coalition. More than merely perpetuating the last W^m , by maintenance is meant: ensuring that the ruling coalition (or some part of it) is still (in) a winning coalition at the next time of decision. Over time many features of the situation may change: actors' weights may change (e.g., a general election results in different possibilities for W^m), an actor may even cease to exist (e.g., a faction splits), and so on. An attempt merely to perpetuate the last winning coalition would possibly produce a losing coalition at the next time of decision. Therefore, the N-M theory should be expected to account for the observed coalitions only at the times of decision. The coalitions during the inter-decision period should be easily explained as required by the "maintenance" process. For example, if at one decision-time the W^m ABCD forms, and at the next decision-time the W^m CDE forms, but during the interim there is a coalition of ABCDE, then it seems clear that ABCDE is a result of the "maintenance" process.21

²¹ In the following section a model of coalition maintenance is described, and a proposition (by a very desirable property: any deviation from a payoff vector in the solution set guarantees that the actor who benefited from the deviation will be absolutely worse off when a solution vector is reimposed (as "must" happen, since the solution vectors dominate all others). See W. Vickrey, "Self-Policing Properties of Certain Imputation Sets," in A. W. Tucker and R. D. Luce (eds.), Contributions to the Theory of Games IV (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1959), pp. 213ff.

²⁰ In honesty, it must be admitted that these two propositions contradict an essential feature of the N-M concept of a solution, namely, that it is possible for any outcome in the solution set to occur. This contradiction points to a serious weakness in my theory. (Cf. footnote 25.)

To sum up. (1) In a constant-sum simple coalition situation the observed result (coalition formed, payoffs received) will be one of the vectors in the N-M solution. Therefore, (2) a W^m will form, and its members' payoffs will be directly proportional to their weights.22 (3) However, when the number of actors is large, as in the LDP, the observed coalition will not be any coalition predicted under (1) but the W^m , or one of them, with the fewest member actors. (4) These propositons will not hold during the inter-decision period when decisions are made only periodically (at fixed and known intervals), as in the LDP; instead the phenomenon of "maintenance" will be observed.

III. EXPLAINING "COALITION GOVERNMENT" IN JAPAN

In this section, the propositions developed in the previous section are applied to the situation described in the first section, in order to answer the questions listed at the end of the latter.

The actors are the conventionally recognized factions within the LDP. Independents (very few) and prefectural delegates to the party conventions are not actors, and do not figure in any way in determining outcomes; they are ignored. Thus a winning coalition is a coalition of factions whose Lower and Upper House Diet members combined make up over one-half of the total number of LDP Dietman.²³ The strengths of all factions over time, and the weights derived from those strengths are given which maintenance is "easily explained" in the sense used above) concerning inter-decision period payoffs is derived from the model. However, that model was discovered ad hoc (which is the reason why it is discussed in the following section).

²² Thus, even if the N-M solution is not known, and even if payoffs are not measured on an interval scale, this proposition—derived from N-M theory as a logical consequence—can be applied!

²³ This definition of a winning coalition clarifies the meaning of the assumption that the prefectural delegates do not affect the party presidential election. That is, a winning coalition must be able to win in the LDP Diet factions' struggle, without the aid of the prefectural delegates. While the former wording may seem unjustified, the latter certainly reflects the real situation, in my opinion.

in Table 2; data sources and method are explained in footnote 24.24

²⁴ Figures on factions' memberships have been drawn from the vernacular press, plus the books of Watanabe cited in footnotes 5 and 7, the Asahi Nenkan, the Kokkai Binran, the Asahi Journal (weekly), and the Gendai no Me (monthly). The newspapers contain about 40 independent estimates of the strength of each faction in the Lower House at 12 different times since 1955, usually just before and after a general election or LDP presidential election, and the other sources contain about another 10 estimates. (A dotted line indicates a general election.) Of the total of roughly 50 independent estimates, 22 list the names of all the members of each faction as well. Thus I obtained 12 reliable estimates of the strength of each Lower House faction, by taking the average of the 3, 4, or 5 estimates available for each point in time. The same sources and procedure were used for the Upper House. However, since until 1963-64 most of the LDP Upper House members were not tied to a particular faction but rather to one of three clubs, it was necessary to estimate the proportion of a club which belonged to one of the factions in that club. (This was done on the basis of reported voting in Upper House elections, such as for LDP caucus chairman, and in the LDP presidential elections.) But the Kishi and Sato factions in the Upper House have always made up one club by themselves; those figures are precise, based on the names in the official membership list.

Insofar as the "weights" differ from the memberships, this is due to information on the financial strengths of the factions, and on the ties between various of the "others" and the factions. Data on finances was obtained from the Kampo, the Official Report (of the Government), all months since 1956. This data was not used precisely, because reporters, politicians, and factions' staffers assured me that the data is not reliable: instead, relying on my data, which agrees with the widespread rumor that Kishi, Sato, and Ikeda (and Ishii, slightly) have the strongest financial backing, I gave these factions a slight edge when memberships were not clearly decisive. Similarly, depending on newspaper reports of the ties and attitudes of the "independents," I gave the appropriate factions a slight advantage in figuring the proper weights.

For example, in January, 1959, the Kampo data show that the factions with the strongest financial backing (in 1958) were Kishi-Sato, Ikeda, and Ishii, while contemporary newspapers said that the small Ishibashi faction was thoroughly hostile to Kishi, although unable to

TABLE 2. FACTION ME	MRERSHIPS AND	WRIGHTS
---------------------	---------------	---------

Date	Item ^b	Kishi- Sato•	Ikeda	Kono	Ono	Miki	Ishii		Hato- yama	neutral	total
12/56	%Diet	30	7	8	9	10	11	2	2	3  d	100g
1957	$\%\mathrm{LH}$	24 + 9	9	13	10	14	8	6	t	7 —	98
12/56-5/58	w_i	2	1	1	1	1	1	0	0	0	7
6/58	%LH	23+12	15	11	12	11	8	5		3	100
1/59	%Diet	36	15	9	11	9	9	4		7	100
7/60	$\% \mathrm{Diet}$	$42^{\rm e}$	16	9	9	8	8	3		5	100
6/58-11/60	w_i	3	2	1	1	1	1	0	0	0	9
			 					Kawa- shima	 Fuji- yama
1962-63	$\%\mathrm{LH}$	9 + 17	17	11	10	11	5	9	8	3	100
12/60-11/63	w_i	3	2	1	1	1	1	1	1	0	11
12/63	%LH	8+16	16	16	10	12	 4	7	7	 5	101
7/64	%Diet	27	13	15	10	10	7	5	7	6	100
12/63-?*	w_i	4	2	2	1	1	1	1	1	0	13
12/66	$\% \mathrm{LH}$	9 + 16	16	9 - 6	5 - 4	11	5	6	6	5	98
	%Diet	29	14	6 - 3 - 4	3-2-3	10	6	4	7	8	99
		Kishi-		Naka-				Kawa-
		Sato	Maeo	sone	Funada	Miki		shima
1967-68	w_i	4	2	1	1	2	0	1	0	0	11

^a On the use of these data, see footnotes 17 and 24.

agree upon a leader among themselves to succeed the ailing Ishibashi. Moreover, the neutrals were said to include a group who were close to or indebted to Prime Minister Kishi, although unable to admit this publicly by joining his faction. Finally, the rest of the neutrals included a group of ex-Liberal Party members who were said to be willing to support either Kishi-Sato or Ikeda, whichever was more expedient, but did not want them to fight each other. On the basis of this information, I reasoned as follows.

a. Kishi+Ikeda are already winning (51%), and in reality they are even stronger than their memberships indicate;

- Kishi+any two of Kono, Ono, Miki, and Ishii are already winning (54% or 56%), and in reality may be slightly stronger than their memberships indicate;
- c. neither Ikeda+any three of Kono, Ono, Miki, and Ishii, nor Kishi+any one of the same four, is winning on the basis of the memberships; considering the Ishibashi faction's hostility to Kishi, its 4% can always be counted in with the anti-Kishi coalition; financially, an Ikeda vs. Kishi fight would rather evenly split the big

^b %Diet=percentage of all LDP Dietmen in a faction; %LH refers to the to the Lower House. w_i indicates "weight" as discussed in the text; note that the total of the weights is not constant over the years.

[•] The Kishi and Sato factions (after 1960, the Kishi-Fukuda and Sato factions) are inseparable because in the Upper House they form one Club. Also, Kishi and Sato are brothers; they have never opposed one another in an LDP election.

d The small Hatoyama faction no longer acted as a unit after its leader resigned.

Includes Fujiyama and Kawashima; neither was independent yet.

^t The Kono and Ono factions split gradually. The double and triple entries in the following rows show the splinter groups' members. The weights in this row do not satisfy the second condition of footnote 16.

⁵ Because of the numbers of neutrals, a majority is defined here as (100-23+1)/2=39.

What does such a winning coalition win? It wins what it can control of what the LDP factions want. Specifically, a winning coalition controls such valued things as Cabinet posts, the Prime Ministership, the probability that a certain faction leader will become Prime Minister at a later time, a position of influence within the party for a faction or its leader, party endorsement of a faction's nominees in a general election, party funds, and so on. Further, it seems to me, all these aspects of winning are roughly equivalent to, or are reflected in the acquisition of Cabinet and high party posts. For example, an incumbent Prime Minister might promise the leader of a faction to support the latter in the next party presidential election. But if the Prime Minister does not give the man's faction valuable Cabinet and party posts, the promise will not be believed.25 money; the neutrals would also divide rather evenly. Hence these calculations seem reasonable:

Ikeda + Kono + Ono + Miki • = 44 + Ishibashi's $4 + 3\frac{1}{2}$ neutrals = $51\frac{1}{2}$ Ikeda + Kono + Ono + Ishii = ditto Ikeda + Ono + Miki + Ishii = ditto Ikeda + Kono + Miki + Ishii =42+Ishibashi's $4+3\frac{1}{2}$ neutrals $=49\frac{1}{2}$ But still, this last coalition too would be winning if it should form, even versus Kishi-Sato+Ono+ $3\frac{1}{2}$ neutrals $=50\frac{1}{2}$, since Ikeda and Ishii—with their money and their influence in the ex-Liberal Party-dominated Ono faction—could break the unity of the Ono faction (especially in the Upper House, where Ono's extra strength lay).

In short, in this typical example of the calculations behind Table 2's weights, the memberships determined which were the W^m for seven coalitions, the memberships plus the factors of money and unofficial ties determined three other minimal winning coalitions, and those factors plus an arbitrary judgment based upon knowledge of probable defections decided the last W^m.

²⁵ The assumption that the posts are or reflect all the winnings to be won seems valid except for one serious problem. It is not correct to say that a faction leader's calculations regarding his future chances of succeding to the Prime Ministership depend solely upon the posts his faction wins. Moreover, such calculations about future potentialities seem to be very important in determining the strategies and tactics chosen by faction leaders. The failure to include in the operational

There are many reasons why these posts are valuable to a faction—to further the faction's members' careers, to control policy, to strengthen the faction, to get funds, and so forth—which are not important here. But what is important is that these posts can be evaluated, can be ranked according to their value to a faction. On the basis of research and interviews, I believe that the following ranking accurately measures how the faction leaders themselves evaluate the various posts.²⁶

- A: Prime Minister:
- B: Finance Minister, party Secretary-General;
- C: Trade and Industry Minister, Agriculture-Forestry Minister, Transportation Minister, Construction Minister, party Executive Board chairman, party Policy Board chairman;
- D: Foreign Minister and Economic Planning Agency chief—when held by a faction leader; Deputy Prime Minister, Cabinet Minister Without Portfolio, party Vice President;
- E: Foreign Minister and Economic Planning Agency chief—when not held by a faction leader; Education Minister, Welfare Minister, Labor Minister, Defence Agency chief, Justice Minister, Postal Minister, Interior Agency chief, 1958–1960, Interior Minister, 1960-present.
- F: Administrative Management Agency chief, Hokkaido Development Agency chief, Science and Technology Agency chief, Prime Minister's Office chief, 1965-present, Interior Agency chief, beginning-1957.

In brief, what a winning coalition wins is con-definition of payoff anything corresponding to these calculations about the future is a second serious weakness in my research. (Cf. footnote 20.)

26 Of course, any list such as this can be criticized. There is not space here to raise and answer all of the possible questions which should be asked Three omissions must be explained, however. The Chief Cabinet Secretary (kanbochokan) I have lumped together with the Prime Ministership, since the former is always a "right-hand man" of the P. M. The political under-secretaries (seimujikan) I have omitted on the advice of several newspapermen who insisted that these posts are not part of the same "game." Diet posts-committee chairmanships, speakerships, etc.-are omitted for the same cause: they are given to individuals, and for reasons which are different from the reasons governing the distribution of Cabinet and top party posts.

trol over all these posts, whose value is crudely measured by the A-F ranking.²⁷

At first blush, it might seem likely that a winning coalition would give these posts only to itself, that is, only to members of the factions in the winning coalition. This would be possible, but it has never happened, and the reason is not hard to find. A winning coalition does not exist merely at one point in time. It exists over time, and is vitally concerned with prolonging its period of rule. Posts are given not simply as rewards for supporting a Prime Minister in the past, but also as encouragement to support him in the future. Indeed, posts may be given to factions simply to keep them from stirring up trouble, to silence them, or to weaken them internally. For these reasons, a Prime Minister's basic support coalition does not monopolize all the rewards, the posts. Therefore, the members of a Prime Minister's support coalition are not the only members of the Cabinet. And for this reason, the relations between the support coalition and the Cabinet coalition can become quite complex.

Nevertheless, it is possible to sketch out in a general way how this system works, showing the relationship between the support coalition and the Cabinet coalition. At some point, a party presidential election is held, and a winning coalition—the new support coalition elects the party president. This victor, acting as Prime Minister, then forms a Cabinet and makes appointments to the top party posts. The individuals who receive these posts are members of the factions which supported the Prime Minister in the election, plus some other factions' members. It may even be that all factions will be represented in the Cabinet, but the valuable posts (i.e., the B- and C-level posts) will be given only to the members of the support coalition plus one or two other factions. In a sense, the Prime Minister uses the posts in two ways: as payments on debts he incurred in the election, and as capital investment. Thus a Cabinet is born, and continues for about a year. Then the Prime Minister makes some changes. Now he has fewer "fixed costs" to meet, and so he can "invest" larger amounts than before. This does not mean, of course, that he can ignore the members of his support coalition. If he is to keep their allegiance, he must invest with them as well as with newcomers. The factions are now looking to the future. If a faction's rewards decline (for example, if a faction receives only two E-level posts and one F-level post now, whereas immediately after the election it received two C-level posts and an F-level post), then that faction will start feeling and behaving more like an opposition or neutral faction than like a main-stream faction. But, on the other hand, an increase in the value of a faction's rewards will not necessarily buy its support for the Prime Minister. Memories are long, and no one likes to be had cheaply. Thus the Prime Minister is faced with a problem. The supply of rewards is limited. If he starts giving more valuable rewards to opposing factions, in hopes of luring them into supporting them, then he will have less to give to the old support coalition. And it is probable that his "return on investment" will be less if he invests with opposition factions than if he invests with his old support coalition. But, on the other hand, if he does not diversify his investments he will become completely dependent upon his old support coalition. Such dependence would make the Prime Minister vulnerable to threats of desertion by his erstwhile supporters, and thus put him in a weak bargaining position. The Prime Minister must resolve this dilemma by distributing rewards (the posts) skillfully enough to guarantee that he will be supported by a winning coalition in the next election, at which time the whole process begins again.

²⁷ Thus, while the measurement of the payoffs is only ordinal scale level, because the physical "goods" which underlie the payoffs are a constant amount for any winning coalition, and because all the factions do in fact want these posts roughly equally badly, it seems defensible to claim that the situation is constant-sum. (See footnote 14, above.)

If this is the way that the "coalition cabinet" system within the LDP works-and I think it is—then a proposition follows immediately. A Prime Minister will have a winning coalition in support of him if, by his distribution of rewards to the factions, he has kept the allegiance of enough of his old support coalition and earned the allegiance of enough of his old opposition that the two groups together constitute a majority of the electors in the party presidential election. To keep the allegiance of one of his old supporters, I think, a Prime Minister must continue to give him, in every Cabinet, rewards valued at not less than one C-level post. To have a chance of gaining the allegiance of a new supporter, a Prime Minister must give him rewards valued at least as much as one C-level post in at least the Cabinet preceding a party presidential

To sum up: if the payoffs of inter-election Cabinet coalitions obey the above proposition on coalition maintenance, then it seems fair to

TABLE 3, PAYOFFS^a

Prime Minister, date	Kishi ^b	Sato	Ikeda ^c	Kono	Ono	Miki	Ishii	Ishibashi		Remarks
Ishibashi*	2e		b	c	c	b, c	e	8		a classic balancing
12/56	d, f			d	d	2d, s	d, e	8		act
Kishi	a, 2c		ь	c	c	b, c	c	е		Kishi kept the same
2/57	d, f			d	ď	2d, e	2d, e,			Cabinet
Kishi		· +c	c	2e-c	d	2c	d	d		Miki, Ikeda down;
7/57	2d, e	d		2d, f	f		2e, f			Kono, Sato up
Kishi	a, b, 3c	b	d	2c	3d	ď	d			clearly the Main-
6/58	ď	2d	f	2e	f	e, f	,			stream cleans up
Kishi*	a, b, 2c	b	c	2c	. 3d		d	đ		Ikeda coming back
1/59	d	2d		3e	f	,				717 2 77
Kishi	a, b, 2c	b	G	d	2c	ď	c			Ikeda in, Kono out.
6/59	2d	2d	d, e	e	d, e. f		_			One being courted
Ikeda* 7/60	2e 2d	3c	a, b 5d, e		d d	-	С			the Main-stream cleans up; some insurance
								Fujiyama
Ikeda	2c	c	a, b, c	c	b	d	-	2e		Kono up, Sato down
12/60	6	2d	4d	·	D .	u.		20		itono up, bato down
								1	Kawashima
Ikeda	d	2c	a, b	2c	ь	e	đ	d	e	Kishi down
7/61			3d		d, f			f	d, 2e
Ikeda	e	b	a, b	2c	e	d	d	c	c	no one opposed Ikeda
7/62		d	3d		d, f				d, 2e	in the election, are these the rewards?
Ikeda	d	b	a, b	С	c	c	d	2e	e	Kishi out; a bid to
7/63		2e	2d		2d, i	d		٠	8	get Miki and Fuji- yama.
Ikeda*		b	a, 2c	2c	2d	b, c		d	c	Miki was loyal in
7/64		d, e	2d	d, f	2G	D, V		u	2d, f	vote; Fujiyama double-crossed.
Sato	-	a, b	2e	2e	2d	b, c		d	c	Sato kept the same
11/64		d, e	2d	ď		,			2d, f	Cabinet
Sato	ь	a, b, 2c	c	d d	2e	2e	d	ď	e	the new Mainstream;
6/65	d	d	2d					f	2c, f	Ikeda down
					Funada
Sato	b	a, b, 2c	C .	e	c	C	d	d	c	Ikeda hanging on;
8/66	d, e	d	d, e			d		f	2d, f	Funada up.
Sato* 12/66	b, c d	a, 3c d, 3e	đ		b	e 2d, f	ď		e d	Ikeda out, Kawa- shima down; Funada up.

^{*} Cabinet formed just after a party presidential election.

conclude that those interim Cabinets are "easily explained" by the requirements of the maintenance process, as demanded in the previous section.

Table 3 presents the data on payoffs in all Cabinets since the first election of an LDP president. An examination of this historical record shows that the maintenance proposition is consistent with the victories of Kishi in 1959. Ikeda in 1960 (with Kishi's coalition), and Ikeda in 1964. In each case the Prime Minister held together some of his previous a To Lower House members. By custom, the Upper House receives three posts, one for each LDP club there. (But in the 13 different Cabinets since 7/57, one Upper House club got no post or seven occasions!) These three posts are almost always of low value. Of the 40 posts given in the 13 Cabinets (four were given in 7/64), four were C, 26 were D, and 10 were E. The 4C went to the Seishin club, the Kishi-Sato faction in the Upper House, in 6/58, 1/59, 12/60, and 7/61. (Including these 4C in Table 4's analysis would not change any results.) The Upper House post-holders in 12/56-2/57 were not club-affiliated.

b In a few instances, there is confusion over which of the Kishi-Sato brothers was closer to the post-holder; in 7/61-7/63, I have called Kaya Okinori and his associate Ueki Koshiro as Kishi-Fukuda.

[°] The dotted lines indicate the faction leaders' deaths. For Kono, the man who received D in 6/65 was later in Nakasone; the E in 8/66 went to Mori. For Ono, the 2D in 7/64-11/64 went to a man later in Murakami; the 2E in 6/65 went to a "neutral" between Funada and Murakami. Sources; Faction affiliations of post-holders were obtained from the sources cited to Table 2. Names of post-holders are from yearbooks, like Asahi Nenkan, and the newspapers.

support coalition, by not decreasing the value of the rewards too much, and earned the support of previous opponents, by increasing the value of their rewards, and so he (or his nominee), was re-elected (or elected) successfully. (See also the "Remarks" in Table 3.)

If Table 3 allows the conclusion that interelection coalitions were being maintained in an obvious manner, it does not answer the earlier questions about, Why the particular winner? Why his particular allies? To answer these questions the bargaining proposition—that the observed election support coalition will be one of the W^m with the smallest number of members—is needed. (Plus the data in Table 2).

To return to the historical situation, in 1958 the ruling coalition of Kishi-Sato-Kono-Ono was backing Prime Minister Kishi strongly. Prior to the 1958 general elections this 4-member coalition was stable in the sense that no smaller winning coalition was possible. However, after the 1958 elections, the situation changed significantly. The results of those elections changed the membership of the factions in such a way that a winning coalition composed of just three members was possible. There was only one such winning coalition with only three members. Its members? Kishi, Sato, and Ikeda! And, just as the prediction derived from the bargaining proposition asserts will happen, and as mentioned in Section I, the old coalition of Kishi-Sato-Kono-Ono was broken and a new coalition of Kishi-Sato-Ikeda took its place.

A little bit earlier, when Prime Minister Ishibashi resigned, each of the smallest winning coalitions had to contain one faction. The faction which was in every possible smallest winning coalition was the Kishi faction. Again, as the bargaining proposition predicts, and as Table 1 shows, someone joined the Kishi coalition; Kishi, because of his unique position of power, became Prime Minister.

Again, when Prime Minister Ikeda had to resign in 1964, there were several possible winning coalitions with the fewest member actors. But each of these possible smallest winning coalitions had to contain the Kishi-Sato alliance. It was impossible for a smallest winning coalition to form without the Kishi-Sato alliance. Therefore, as the bargaining proposition predicts, a winning coalition centered upon the Kishi-Sato alliance did form, and Sato became Prime Minister.

The 1964 situation is especially interesting, because for that situation the coalition maintenance proposition and the bargaining proposition give different predictions. Prime Minister Ikeda was maintaining a coalition satisfactorily according to the coalition maintenance proposition. Ikeda's coalition was maintained by Ikeda's distribution of rewards to his supporters, but it was not viable except insofar as those rewards made his supporters loyal to him. As a winning coalition, it was unstable for the reasons summed up in the bargaining proposition, namely, that some of its members could hope to receive more valuable rewards from a different coalition. Thus, Ikeda could win with this coalition, and did in July, but at the time of Ikeda's resignation in the fall of the same year it was impossible for Kono (the heir-apparent) to hold the old Ikeda coalition together. Some of its members deserted, to support Sato.²⁸

The last remaining question concerns the election of Ishibashi Tanzan. At that time the Prime Minister's coalition was in effect irrelevant, since Prime Minister Hatoyama was retiring from politics without naming a successor, and the new method of electing the party leader was just being inaugurated. So the coalition maintenance proposition is irrelevant. There were three alliances at that time, none of which was winning: the Kishi-Sato-Kono alliance, the Ishii-Ikeda alliance (the former Liberal Party), and the Ono-Miki-Ishibashi alliance. In this situation, then, there were two possible winning coalitions with five members and one with six members. The bargaining proposition asserts, clearly, that one of the smallest, that is the 5-member, winning coalitions will form, but it cannot say which one. As Table 1 shows, the coalition which formed in this case was the 5-member coalition of Ishii-Ikeda-Ono-Miki-Ishibashi, as predicted.29

28 Many observers would dispute this interpretation, arguing that Ikeda himself actually double-crossed Kono, under the influence of one of his close aids, Ohira Masayoshi, who was very friendly with Mr. Sato's top advisor, Tanaka Kakuei. See, e.g., Hans Baerwald, "Japan: The Politics of Transition," Asian Survey 5 (Jan., 1965), especially pp. 34-38. Others would simply assert that it was fore-ordained that Sato follow Ikeda, by ex-Prime Ministers Yoshida and Kishi and the business community. Both of these explanations would have Mr. Miki merely realizing which way the wind was blowing, and trimming his sails to fit it. But I have talked with some political insiders who feel that Mr. Miki's switch to support of Mr. Sato came first, and was the main cause of Prime Minister Ikeda's decision to nominate Mr. Sato.

²⁹ At this time, just after the formation of the LDP, there were three major streams within the party: former Liberals, former Progressives, and people who bolted from the Liberal Party during

TABLE 4. WEIGHTS AND PAYOFFS FOR MEMBERS OF RULING COALITIONS

Ishibashi (12/56)	Predict:	Miki ≧Ishii = Ono ≧Ikeda > Ishibashi actual:	b, c c c b e
	·	2d, e d, e d
Kishi (7/57)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Kono ≧ Ono
•	actual:	2b, c+e $2c-c$ d
		3d, e 2d, f f
Kishi (6/58)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Kono = Ono
	actual:	2b, 3e 2e 3d
		3d 2e f
Kishi (6/59)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Ikeda
` , ,	actual:	2b, 2c c
,		4d . d.e
Ikeda (7/60)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Ikeda actual:	5e b, 5d
		2d e
Ikeda (12/60)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Ikeda
. , ,	actual:	3c, 2d b, c
		3e 4d
Ikeda (7/63)	Predict:	Ikeda>Kono=Ono=Miki≥Kawashima actual:	b c c c c
		2d $2d$, f d e
Ikeda (7/64)	Predict:	Ikada = Kono > Miki ≥ Ono ≥ Kawashima
. ,	actual:	2e 2e b, e 2d e
	•	2d d, f 2d, f
Sato (6/65)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Miki ≧ Kawashima
• • •	actual:	2b, 2e 2c c, 2d, f
		2d
Sato (8/66)	Predict:	Kishi-Sato > Miki ≥ Kawashima
	actual:	2b, 2c c c
		2d, e d 2d, f

Finally, here is a summary of this application of N-M theory and the two modifying proposition to coalition politics within the LDP. In the elections of 1956, 1959, 1960, and 1964, the winning coalition was a W^m . In three of these elections (all but 1960) this W^m was unstable according to the bargaining proposition, i.e., the observed W^m did not have a minimal number of member actors. In all three of these cases, within a year the unstable W^m was replaced by a predicted W^m , i.e., by a W^m 1953-54. Tabulating each faction's members' ties with these three streams shows marked differences. (Using data in the Seito-kai-ha Hen of the Gikai Seito 70 Nenshi.) An analysis of the composition of the three factional alliances which existed in 12/66, in terms of these ties, assuming that an alliance is more likely to join with another alliance if their members share the same historical ties, leads to the conclusion that, of the two possible 5-member winning coalitions, the Ishii-Ikeda-Ono-Miki-Ishibashi coalition was much more likely to form!

with the minimal number of member actors at the time. (The reasons why the unstable W^m formed were explained above; briefly, they are: pre-election alliance (1956), maintenance (1964) and a change in the situation due to general election results (1959).) Payoffs to actors who were not in the winning coalition can plausibly be construed as required by the "maintenance" process. (However, it must be admitted, in the absence of a theory of coalition maintenance, the model of maintenance used here is ad hoc, and for that reason not fully satisfactory.) The post-1964 period is discussed in Section V.

The foregoing has dealt entirely with the question of who are the coalition members, ignoring the payoffs received by those actors. But the heart of the N-M theory is its argument about payoffs. Table 4 presents the relevant data (taken from Table 3) for a consideration of whether the payoffs to the members of the winning coalitions were in proportion to their weights (in Table 2), as is predicted by N-M theory.

Several points about Table 4 should be clarified, since it is the most important part of the application of N-M theory. First, the Prime Ministership itself is not included, since the decision about that office is made "for good" at the party convention. Also, since that office cannot be divided up and is so valuable, inevitably the faction which gets its leader in will get "too much" payoff—even if, as in Ishikashi's case, the faction takes nothing else. So to allow any test of the basic N-M proposition at all, the Prime Ministership must be excluded. Second, Cabinets are not in the table if they were merely hold-over Cabinets (when a Prime Minister suddenly resigned due to illness), nor if the Main-stream was changing. The latter omissions are indicated by a dotted line. Third, for the Sato Cabinets, factions which I regard as "satellites" of the Kishi-Sato bloc are not listed in the prediction. These satellites are discussed in Section V. Their inclusion in the table would improve the performance of the theory.

The predictions of payoffs can be interpreted in various ways. First, most strictly, one may demand that equal weights produce precisely equal payoffs, and of course that unequal weights produce corresponding unequal payoffs. Then of the 45 pairs in Table 4, 37 can be unambiguously compared, 30 and of these 22 are correct and 15 are wrong. Since the a priori probability of two things being precisely equal approaches infinity, a fair statistical significance test is hard to construct. But even making the most stringent assumption—that any predictions would be correct by chance alone one-half of the time—this 22 out of 37 result is significant at p<.13, using the binomial test. However, since all of the 15 errors involve equalities, and since strict equality must be as strange as a straight line to nature, this test is not very meaningful.

³⁰ Ambiguity occurs because the payoffs are only ranked; distances between two ranks are unknown. E.g., it is not clear whether a payoff of 2c+2z is greater or less than a payoff of 3d+f. The ambiguous cases are identified below. Two cases which are strictly speaking ambiguous I have classified as clear because they seem unquestionable: K-S vs. Ikeda in 7/60, and Ikeda vs. Ono in 7/63. (I.e., I assert that 5c>b+d+e; and that b>c+f.) Of course, to call these two cases ambiguous would not make N-M's correct predictions on them into failures; it would just remove them from the analysis.

Second, one may simply look at the strict inequalities in Table 4, to see whether the basic relationships of power expressed in the weights have been preserved in the observed payoffs. There are 25 such pairs involving strict inequality. Of these three are ambiguous (Ikeda-Miki and Kono-Miki in 7/64, and Kishi-Sato-Ikeda in 12/60), and 22 allow a comparison. Of these 22, all are correct.

Finally, desiring to make some sort of evaluation of the fit between weight and payoff in the 20 cases where weights are equal, one may relax the requirement that payoffs in these cases be precisely equal. For example, when two actors' weights are equal but their memberships in the Lower House are markedly different, it seems to be in keeping with the spirit of the N-M proposition to predict that their payoffs will diverge from equality just as their memberships do. Thus, if two factions each have the same weight, but one has a membership which is larger by eight or more Lower House Dietmen, one may expect that the payoff to the larger faction will be greater than, if it is not equal to, the smaller faction's payoff. (Of course, the strict inequalities must still hold.) If one does reason in this way, then of the 15 pairs in question which are not ambiguous, 10 become weak inequalities; these are written "≥" in Table 4. (The ambiguous cases are Ishii-Ikeda and Ono-Ikeda in 12/56, Kono-Ono in 6/58, Miki-Kawashima in 7/64, and Miki-Kawashima in 6/65.) Of these 10 cases, seven are correct.

Of the remaining five cases of strict equality,

TABLE 5. SUMMARY OF N-M PREDICTIONS

Duadiation on Danaga	Clear (Comparisons	Comparisons	Total
Prediction on Payoffs:	Correct Wrong		are Ambiguous	TOTAL
Predictions are:		A CONTRACTOR OF THE CONTRACTOR	***************************************
Strict inequalities	22	0	3	25
Weak inequalities	7	3	4	14
Equalities	0 .	correct on major posts, small dif- ference on minor posts: 4; other: 1	1	6

all payoffs are equal insofar as major—i.e., C-level or above—posts are concerned. They differ only on the minor posts. These differences from equality are small (e, d, d+f, d-f, and 2d+f), with one exception (the last).

This analysis of Table 4 is summarized in Table 5.

IV. EVALUATION OF THE THEORY

A final judgment on whether the N-M proposition is correct for the data in question is difficult. But a temporary judgment is possible. by comparing the performance of N-M theory with the performance of other theories: Riker's theory of coalition fermation (the "minimum size" hypothesis), Gamson's theory of coalition formation and payoffs (payoffs will be proportional to resources), the Shapley-Harsanvi theory of "value" (in a constant-sum situation payoffs are proportionate to power in the "pivot" sense), and the Japanese newspapers' theory that Cabinet appointments are made in two ways: either to balance all factions, or to benefit primarily the Mainstream.31 (Another "null model" could be the proposition that coalitions form at random. and that payoffs are distributed without rhyme or reason. Another could be that "traditionalistic" factors—personal loyalties, family connections, etc.—determine all the outcomes. Another could be that the zaikai, the top business and financial world, pulls the strings on the politican-puppets. But the first is clearly so wrong that there is no point in using it, and the latter two are not disconfirmable.32)

31 See W. Riker, The Theory of Political Coalitions (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1962), and W. A. Gamson, "A Theory of Coalition Formation," Amer. Sociol. Rev. 26 (June, 1961), 373-382. The Shapley theory of value, which John C. Harsanyi and others have developed further, is best known to political scientists in the guise of the Shapley-Shubik a priori power index; see L. S. Shapley and M. Shubik, "A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System," this Review, 48 (1954), 787-792. What I call the newspapers' theory is one of several common sense explanations of "the game of politics in Japan." Two others are mentioned in the parenthesis.

²² The "traditionalistic factors proposition" is not disconfirmable because there are so many such factors; after the fact it is always possible to find some such explanation. The "zaikai proposition" is not disconfirmable because the zaikai is not, usually, unified; some part of the zaikai "wins," even when an Ishibashi defeats a Kishi. Of course, to be not disconfirmable is not to be incorrect, just useless for present purposes.

Rather than to present a full application of each of these theories, it is sufficient, and instructive, to show how they differ from the N-M theory, and how these different predictions compare with the data.

First, the difference between a W^m, a W^m with fewest member actors, and a W of minimum size must be clear. N-M theory predicts the first, the bargaining proposition of this paper predicts the second and Riker's and Gamson's theories predict the third. The first two have already been explained; the third refers to the resources controlled by the members of a coalition.³³ For example, consider the illustration used earlier, of the LDP after the 1958 general election, with the "others" members distributed among the actors so as to make the percentages reflect the intangible features of the situation. (This tampering with the data is only for purposes of illustration).

The W^m here are still the Kishi-Sato bloc plus Ikeda, Kishi-Sato plus any two of the four weak factions, and Ikeda plus any three of the four weak factions. The W^m with fewest member actors is still Kishi-Kato plus Ikeda. But the W of minimum size is Ikeda plus Kono, Miki, and Ishii, with 51% of the LDP Dietmen

Second, the type of predictions about payoffs made by these different theories must be clear. Riker's theory does not make predictions about payoffs, except in special cases. Gamson's theory predicts that the actors' payoffs will be proportional to their resources, for those actors who succeed in forming a coalition. (Thus in a constant-sum situation you get more from one coalition than from another if and only if your resources are a larger proportion of the coalition's total resources, so you prefer the coalition with smaller total resources.) The Shapley-Harsanyi theory of value predicts that in a constant-sum simple coalition situation each actor will receive a payoff which is proportionate to his pivotpower, i.e., to how often his addition to a losing coalition makes it into a winning coalition. The payoffs predicted by these theories in the above example are:

²³ Gamson explicitly states that his theory's predictions depend on resources. Riker says "weights," but in his own applications uses memberships. (If Riker's weights are the same as N-M's weights, then his theory is no different from theirs.)

	Kishi- Sato	Ikeda	Kono	Ono	Miki	Ishii
Riker:	0	?	?	0	?	?
Gamson:	0	.35	.22	0	.22	.22
Shapley:	.4	.2	.1	.1	.1	.1

(If the difference in size between Ono and the other weak factions is considered insignificant, then Riker and Gamson predict any coalition of Ikeda plus any three weak actors. The size of Gamson's payoff predictions will still be the same, and both Riker and Gamson still predict that Kishi-Sato get zero.)

This example, when contrasted with Section II's exposition of the N-M predictions for the same situation, illustrates the following points of comparison. These points are also true in general.

- 1. In constant-sum simple coalition situations, Riker's and Gamson's theories predict the same coalition, but only Gamson's predicts payoffs.
- 2. Riker-Gamson theory predicts a unique coalition, while N-M theory predicts a set of coalitions.
- 3. The Riker-Gamson predicted coalition does not always contain the strongest actor(s), but rather tends to be a large group of weak actors. The bargaining proposition, on the other hand, predicts a small coalition which always contains the strongest actor(s). The N-M solution set contains both of these predictions, necessarily.

- 4. Riker-Gamson theory, like N-M theory, predicts zero payoffs to actors who are not in the coalition which forms.
- 5. Gamson's predictions on payoff are not the same as N-M's, but they preserve roughly the same rank order (of larger and smaller predicted payoffs) as do N-M's predictions.
- 6. Shapley-Harsanyi value theory, in sharp contrast to all of these other theories, asserts that all actors receive some payoff. Thus it makes no predictions, even implicitly, about coalition formation; there is a "consensual" or "fair play" spirit in the theory.
- 7. The size of value theory's predictions preserves the same rank order as do N-M and Gamson's theories. But the predictions are more extreme than in the latter two theories, since the same constant pie has to be split up among everybody.

Since the payoffs to the LDP factions are only rank-ordered, point 5 shows that it is not possible to contrast Gamson's theory with N-M theory on payoffs. So Riker-Gamson theory can only be compared with N-M theory on coalition formation. Referring to the resources of Table 2 (not to the weights), the comparison is given in Table 6.

TABLE 6. COMPARISON OF ALTERNATIVE THEORIES^a

Date	Riker-Gamson	N-M	Bargaining Proposition	Actual
12/56	(Ikeda+Ishii)+(Ono +Miki+Ishibashi)	any Wm	same as R-G, or (Kishi-Sato+Kono) +(Ikeda+Ishii)	(Ikeda+Ishii)+(Ono +Miki+Ishibashi)
2/575	K-S+Ikeda+Ishii; Ikeda+Kono+Miki +Ishii+Ishibashi	any W ^m	K-S and any two (except Ishibashi)	K-S+Kono+Ono
1/59	K-S+Ikeda; K-S+Ono+Ishibashi	any W ^m	K-S+Ikeda	K-S+Kono+Ono, quickly became K-S+Ikeda
7/60	K-S+Kono; K-S+Ono	any W ^m	K-S+Ikeda; K-S+Kono; K-S+Ono	K-S+Ikeda
7/64	five coalitions with 52%, all contain K-S	any W ^m	three coalitions with 3 members, all contain K-S+Kono.	Ikeda+Kono+Ono ÷Miki+Kawashima, quickly became K-S plus several a Based upon the percentages (not weights) in Table 2.

^b Using Lower House percentages for 1957, and a winning coalition defined as holding 50% (since the total is 98%).

[°] Of course this coalition did not occur, since Kono and Sato were fighting to succeed Ikeda. But the bargaining proposition in this situation necessarily includes Kishi-Sato in its prediction (after the predictions listed, its next prediction would be K-S plus any three), while Riker-Gamson only "accidentally" includes K-S (its next prediction after the 52%-level coalitions is Ikeda+Kono+Ono+Miki+Kawashima, at 53%).

Clearly, N-M was always right. The bargaining proposition and Riker-Gamson were both right in 12/56, and both became right quickly in 1/59. Both were wrong in 7/64, but became right in that Kishi-Sato did dominate the new coalition which formed in the fall after Prime Minister Ikeda's resignation. But the bargaining proposition was right, and Riker-Gamson wrong, in 2/57 and 7/60.

To compare N-M and Shapley-Harsanyi theory, points 6 and 7 above show that the key contrast involves the payoffs to the actors who are not in a coalition. For those actors, N-M theory predicts no payoff, while value theory predicts the same payoffs that they would receive if they were in a coalition. Both predictions are wrong, as Table 3 has already shown. However, the discussion of "maintanance" earlier showed that there is a plausible explanation for N-M theory's failure, an explanation which does not contradict the assertion that the winning coalition controls all the payoffs. Whether there is a comparable modification for value theory is not clear; at any rate, I have found one. Changes in payoff which correspond to entry into, or exit from the ruling coalition, without any change in resources, seem to contradict the basic assertion of value theory (that it is the over-all strategic possibilities, and not the temporal coalition, which determines payoff). Note in Table 3, for example, the change in payoffs to Kishi from 7/64 to 6/65, and to Kono from 1/59 to 7/61. Moreover, changes in payoffs to actors who were not in the ruling coalition, without any change in resources, also seem to contradict the basic assertion of value theory. For example, the payoffs to Fujiyama from 12/60 through 7/64 look much more like an attempt to buy at least neutrality from him in the 1964 election, than like an attempt to reward him in accord with his strategic position.

Finally, what of the common sense proposition that Cabinets will be either balanced or dominated by the Main-stream? This may be adequate as a rough description of Table 3, but closer examination shows that the proposition is incorrect unless it is taken as describing two "ideal types" of Cabinet. (Except for Ishibashi in 12/56, there has been no Cabinet in which posts have been even approximately equally distributed. On the other hand, as noted earlier, the Main-stream has never completely dominated the Cabinet.) But even as a description of two "ideal types," this proposition is not really very helpful, since the cally sort of payoff distribution which it excludes is a Cabinet where the Main-stream does not get payoffs and the outsiders do.

The foregoing evaluation of the performance of N-M theory can be summed up briefly. N-M theory performed well, in predicting both coalitions and payoffs in the LDP during 1956-66. It was more successful than alternative theories. However, its predictions on payoffs must be modified as was done by constructing a "coalition maintenance" model. If one tries to narrow down the number of predicted coalitions within the N-M solution set, the bargaining proposition should be used rather than Riker-Gamson theory.

V. PROSPECTS

In conclusion, a brief picture of the present, and some predictions.

There is not space to describe in detail the shifting situation within the LDP since the deaths of Ono, Kono, and Ikeda in 1964-65. The percentages in the last lines of Table 2 show at least that the situation has become more complex. The bottom line of Table 2 gives my guess, on the basis of field research and interviews, about how the situation is shaping up (assuming that there is no general election before 12/68). The weights given there are based on the following judgments. The Ishii and Fujiyama factions, and the Mori and Murakami splinters of the old Kono and Ono factions, are no longer actors. The Ishii faction is split. One of its leading members ran and won 11 votes against Prime Minister Sato in 12/66, although Mr. Ishii himself was backing Prime Minister Sato. The two splinter groups are satellites of the Kishi-Sato-Fukuda bloc. They back Sato even though they don't receive rewards, which no faction has ever done before. The Fujiyama faction, while able to unite around the candidacy of their leader (many say that the reason Mr. Fujiyama has run so many times for LDP president is precisely to hold his faction together), is too divided to act as a unit in any other context. Since it is likely that Fujiyama himself will not be a serious candidate in 1968, it appears that some of his faction will follow the Kishi-Sato lead and others will oppose it. On the other hand, the remaining factions all appear to be cohesive and capable of acting autonomously. But with all these satellites and fringe members, the Kishi-Sato bloc is far stronger than its official membership figures indicate. It can only be defeated if both of the mediumsized factions (the old Ikeda faction and Miki) join with at least two of the weak factions.

The maintenance model, applied to the payoffs in Table 3, says that Maeo (old Ikeda) and Nakasone are bound to be in opposition to Sato in the next election in 12/68. If the trend begun for Kawashima in 12/66 continues, he will be in opposition, too. Miki and Funada are Sato's probable partners, but the maintenance model allows that they may double-cross him, as Sato and Fujiyama did Ikeda in 7/64.

The W^m, considering that Maeo, Nakasone, and Kawashima will not be in a coalition with Kishi-Sato, are: Kishi-Sato+Miki, and Maeo+Nakasone+Miki+Kawashima. (Because of the weights, whether Funada joins or not makes no difference.) Of course, if Prime Minister Sato changes his coalition by making a radically new distribution of payoffs before 12/68, other W^m would be possible. But as

34 This manuscript was completed in June, 1967. In December, 1967, Prime Minister Sato reshuffled his Cabinet and changed most of the top LDP executives. Messrs. Nakasone, Kawashima, Miki, Ishii, and Fukuda are now all in some top position in the Government or party, as is the number two leader of the former Ikeda faction (Ohira Masayoshi). The total distribution of rewards is as follows (with the December, 1966, payoffs from Table 3 included for comparison). The single post (an "e") given to the satellites of the Sato faction is included in the rewards for the latter. Also, incidentally, the allotment of Parliamentary Vice Ministerships (seimujikan) did not follow the same pattern as this distribution of major rewards. Rather, the Maeo and Nakasone factions received three and four, respectively, while the Sato and Kishi-Fukuda factions received five and two, respectively. The Miki and Ishii factions received one each, and the Fujithings look now, these two coalitions are likely; Miki holds the key. Which of these two coalitions will occur depends on factors outside the present theory, namely, whether Mr. Sato himself runs again—in which case Mr. Miki is more likely to back him—or withdraws, in which case Fukuda Takeo will be the Kishi-Sato bloc's candidate, and Mr. Miki is more likely to join the opposition coalition. If the coalition is Kishi-Sato+Miki, the former will receive the larger payoff. If the coalition is Maeo+Nakasone+Miki+Kawashima, Miki and Maeo will receive roughly equal payoffs, both larger than Nakasone's and Kawashima's payoffs, which will also be roughly equal.³⁴ yama, Funada, and Kawashima factions received none.

This change in the distribution of rewards from 12/66 to 11/67 is an excellent example of the maintenance proposition at work. Prime Minister Sato is attempting to hold together his old support coalition (asterisked factions), while making overtures toward the major opposition factions, Maeo and Nakasone. The effect of Mr. Sato's skillful reshuffle is to have made it possible for the Maeo and Nakasone factions to consider supporting Mr. Sato in the coming LDP presidential election this fall. Therefore the conclusion above, that the Miki faction will determine the outcome of the forthcoming election by choosing between Kishi-Sato+Miki and Maeo+Nakasone+Miki +Kawashima, is no longer valid. Rather, the Kishi-Sato bloc would appear to have the option of coalescing with a variety of partners in different winning coalitions.

	Kishi- Fukuda*	Sato*	Ikeda (Maeo)	Naka- sone	Funada	Miki*	Ishii*	Fuji- yama	Kawa- shima*
12/66	ь, с d	a, 3c d, 3e	d		b	e 2d, f	d		c, d
11/67	b, e f	a, 2c 2e, 2f	c 2e	c	b	d, e	e		c d

^{*} Voted for Mr. Sato in the 12/66 LDP presidential election.

A COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF STATE AND FEDERAL JUDICIAL BEHAVIOR: THE REAPPORTIONMENT CASES*

EDWARD N. BEISER Brown University

The literature discussing the responses of lower court judges to decisions of the United States Supreme Court is limited, and the few comparative analyses of state and federal judicial behavior have tended to be speculative rather than empirical. It has been suggested that a controversial Supreme Court decision is likely to be supported more strongly by federal judges than by state judges, that state courts will probably construe a Supreme Court mandate more narrowly than will federal courts, and that federal courts can be expected to move in a direction hinted at by the Court more aggressively than state courts. Since all federal judges are appointed for life, it is only logical that they should be more independent of local pressures than state judges, many of whom are elected, or appointed for limited periods. The fact that state and federal judges owe their appointments to different levels of the political party hierarchy, and the historical fact that federal judges are less likely

* I would like to thank Professor George Marcus, Director of the Social Science Quantitative Laboratory at Williams College, for his generous assistance.

¹ The leading work in this field is that of Walter F. Murphy. See especially "Lower Court Checks on Supreme Court Power," this REVIEW, 53 (December, 1959), 1017, 1018, 1022; and Elements of Judicial Strategy (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1964), pp. 95-97, 107. A similar conclusion is suggested by John R. Schmidhauser. The Supreme Court: Its Politics, Personalities, and Procedures (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1963), pp. 82-33; and by Frank Sorauf, Political Parties in the American System (Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1964), pp. 123, 124. Monrad G. Paulson has demonstrated that some state supreme court judges continued to employ the doctrine of substantive due process to implement their economic theories despite the United States Supreme Court's abandonment of this practice in 1937: "The Persistence of Substantive Due Process in the States," 34 Minnesota Law Review 91 (1950). The only published work which compares state and federal judicial behavior on the basis of empirical research is Kenneth Vines' "Southern State Supreme Courts and Race Relations," Western Political Quarterly 18 (1965), 5.

to seek future political office than are state judges, suggest a similar conclusion. Finally, the very fact of being a federal judge may produce a sense of identification with the Supreme Court which state judges would not share.²

The purpose of this paper is to subject these theoretical assertions to empirical examination. Unfortunately, the American legal system impedes the construction of a research design for this purpose. Ideally, one would want to compare the responses of state and federal judges to the same case—thereby holding "inputs" constant. Thus Professor Stuart Nagel's study of the relationship of party affiliation to judicial behavior compares the responses of Republican and Democratic judges to cases in which they had all participated.3 Obviously, this procedure cannot be followed in the present situation; state and federal judges do not hear the same cases. One is forced to resort to a less desirable basis of comparison-judicial behavior in "similar" cases.4 The value of the results will depend on the observer's ability to select a universe of cases which present truly comparable situations to state and federal judges. Of even

- ² Murphy, "Lower Court Checks...," pp. 1017, 1022.
- ³ "Political Party Affiliation and Judges' Decisions," this Review, 55 (December, 1961), 843–850.
- 4 This problem could be avoided by means of a simulation technique, such as that employed by Theodore Becker in a different context. If differences in the behavior of state and federal judges result from the pressures of their political environments, it is likely that they would not be revealed by such a procedure. If, however, the significant differences between state and federal judges are a function of the judge rather than his situation (if state and federal judicial systems recruit differentially, or if state and federal judges have internalized different role perceptions, for example) then such a technique should produce positive results. Theodore L. Becker. Political Behavioralism and Modern Jurisprudence (Chicago: Rand Mc-Nally, 1964); "A Survey Study of Hawaiian Judges: The Effect on Decisions of Judicial Role Variations," this REVIEW, 60 (September, 1966), 677-680.

greater importance will be his ability to limit his comparisons to those aspects of "similar" cases in which the stimuli to which the two categories of judges are subjected are truly comparable. The significance of this point will be developed with respect to the specific hypotheses tested below.

I. THE DATA

This study is based on the decisions dealing with legislative apportionment which federal district courts and state courts of last resort announced after the Supreme Court's 1962 decision in Baker v. Carr, but before its "one man, one vote" ruling in Reynolds v. Sims (1964). The reapportionment cases provide a particularly useful basis for a comparative analysis of the state and federal judicial bureaucracies for several reasons. As a result of the Supreme Court's decision in Colegrove v. Green, both federal and state courts (with some exceptions) had declined to intervene in apportionment cases.6 Thus neither federal nor state judges were especially familiar with such cases, nor had they developed local precedents or specialized methods of dealing with them. Suddenly in 1962, as the consequence of a Supreme Court opinion which was generally understood to apply equally to state and federal courts, both sets of judges were faced with a large number of cases dealing with the same subject. Since the state and federal cases were decided during the same period of time, the political and judicial climates are held constant. Finally, the geographic distribution of the relevant state and federal courts does not appear to differ significantly.8

- ⁵ Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964). Note that we are comparing state appeals courts of last resort and federal trial courts.
 - ⁶ Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946).
- 7 Strictly speaking, this is not correct. Since a ruling in a legislative reapportionment case occurs within the context of all previous decisions in that subject area, by necessity, this context must differ for each subsequent decision. However, this study does exclude the impact of additional stimuli by the United States Supreme Court, or of major national political events related to the subject matter of the cases. Also, the distribution of the state and federal cases throughout the time period under study is shown to be comparable, in a statistical sense, by means of the Mann-Whitney U Test.
- ⁸ The federal cases occurred in Alabama, California, Colorado (two cases), Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia (three cases), Idaho,

The subject matter of these cases is eespcially well suited to accentuate anticipated differences between the state and federal judiciaries. As Alexander Bickel put it, "[A]pportionment is a very high percentage of politics with a small admixture of definable principle."9 Legislative apportionment is a major concern of those political interests generally regarded as being able to influence state judges to a greater extent than federal judges. Since, as the law review commentators hastened to point out, the Supreme Court's mandate in Baker v. Carr was anything but precise. lower court judges had room in which to maneuver.10 This was, then, a situation in which differences between state and federal judges should readily have appeared.

One major weakness in the data must be noted. Since all of the apportionment cases were brought by litigants seeking to benefit from the Supreme Court's decision in Baker, attorneys could be expected to avoid those courts in which they anticipated resistance to the Court's decision. Presumably this would Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New York, North Dakota, Oklahoma (two cases), Pennsylvania, Tennessee (two cases), Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin.

The state cases occurred in Alabama, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan (two cases), Mississippi, New Hampshire (two cases), New York, Oklahoma, Rhode Island (two cases), Wisconsin, Wyoming, and Vermont.

The obvious sectional bias to consider is an overproportion of southern states in either group. Following V. O. Key's usage of treating the 11 states of the Confederacy as southern, we find that 10 of the 29 federal cases were decided in southern courts, as were 4 of the nineteen state cases. This difference is not statistically significant. Fisher's Exact Probability Test for this distribution produces a p of .16.

- Alexander Bickel, "The Durability of Colegrove v. Green," 72 Yale Law Journal 39, 42 (1962).
- 10 The following are illustrative of the extensive literature which can be cited to document the lack of precision in Baker: Neal, "Baker v. Carr, Politics in Search of Law," 1962 Supreme Court Review 252: McClosky, "The Reapportionment Case," 76 Harvard Law Review 54 (1962); Lucas, "The Meaning of Baker v. Carr," 61 Michigan Law Review 711 (1963) Friedelbaum, "Baker v. Carr: New Doctrine of Judicial Intervention and Its Implications for American Federalism," 29 University of Chicago Law Review 673 (1962).

minimize the chance that state and federal judges would differ.

A total of twenty-nine federal and nineteen state apportionment cases decided during the period between Baker and Reynolds are germane to this study.¹¹

11 Federal cases: Baker v. Carr. 206 F. Supp. 341 (1962); Baker v. Carr. 222 F. Supp. 648 (1963); Butterworth v. Dempsey, 229 F. Supp. 754 (1964); Daniel v. Davis, 220 F. Supp. 601 (1963); Davis v. Synhorst, 217 F. Supp. 492 (1963), 225 F. Supp. 689 (1964); Dorsey v. Fortson, 228 F. Supp. 259 (1964); Drew v. Scranton, 229 F. Supp. 308 (1963); Germano v. Kerner, 220 F. Supp. 230 (1963); Hearne v. Smylie, 225 F. Supp. 645 (1964); Hedlund v. Hanson, 213 F. Supp. 172 (1962); League of Nebraska Municipalities v. Marsh, 209 F. Supp. 189 (1962): Lein v. Sathre, 205 F. Supp. 536 (1962); Lisco v. McNichols, 208 F. Supp. 471 (1962); Lisco v. Love, 219 F. Supp. 922 (1963); Mann v. Davis, 213 F. Supp. 577 (1962); Marshall v. Hare, 227 F. Supp. 989 (1964); Moss v. Burkhart, 207 F. Supp. 885 (1962), 200 F. Supp. 149 (1963); Nolan v. Rhodes, 218 F. Supp. 953 (1963); Sanders v. Gray, 203 F. Supp. 158 (1962); Silver v. Jordan, unpublished, Federal District Court, Southern District, California, Civil No. 62-953-NC (1962); Sims v. Frink, 205 F, Supp. 245 (1962), 208 F. Supp. 431 (1962); Sincock v. Terry, 207 F. Supp. 205 (1962), 210 F. Supp. 396 (1962), 215 F. Supp. 169 (1963); Sobel v. Adams, 208 F. Supp. 316 (1962), 214 F. Supp. 811 (1963); Stout v. Hendricks, 228 F. Supp. 568 (1964); Thigpen v. Meyers, 211 F. Supp. 826 (1962); Toombs v. Fortson, 205 F. Supp. 248 (1962); Valenti v. Dempsey, 211 F. Supp. 911 (1962); WMCA Inc. v. Simon, 208 F. Supp. 368 (1962); Wisconsin v. Zimmerman, 205 F. Supp. 673 (1962), 209 F. Supp. 183 (1962).

State Cases:

In re Apportionment of the Michigan State Legislature, 126 N.W. 2d 731 (1964), 127 N.W. 2d 862 (1964), 128 N.W. 2d 350 (1964); Blaikie v. Power, 193 N.E. 2d 55 (1963); Caesar v. Williams, 371 P. 2d 241 (1962); Davis v. McCarty, 388 P. 2d 480 (1964); Glass v. Hancock County Election Committee, 156 So. 2d 825 (1963); Griffin v. Board of Supervisors, 384 P. 2d 421 (1963), 388 P. 2d 888 (1964); Le Doux v, Parish Democratic Executive Committee, 156 So. 2d 48 (1963); Harris v. Shanahan, 390 P. 2d 722 (1964); In re Legislative Reapportionment, 374 P. 2d 66 (1962); Levitt v. Attorney General, 180 A. 2d 827 (1962); Levitt v. Maynard, 182 A. 2d 897 (1962); Maryland Committee For Fair Representation v. Tawes, 180 A. 2d 656 (1962), 184 A. 2d 715 (1962); Mikell v. Rousseau, 183 A. 2d 817 (1962); Opinion to the Gover-

II, HYPOTHESES TO BE TREATED

On the basis of the existing literature comparing state and federal judicial behavior, the following five hypotheses seemed appropriate:

- State courts will be more critical of the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr than will federal courts.
- State and federal courts will differ in their interpretations of the Supreme Court's instructions in Baker v. Carr in three respects;
 - a) Federal courts are more likely than state courts to understand the Supreme Court to have reached the merits of the Tennessee apportionment case, and to have provided substantive guidelines for lower court action.
 - b) Federal courts are more likely to see a "one man, one vote" standard required by the Supreme Court than are state courts.
 - c) State Courts are more likely to read the Supreme Court's instructions as accepting factors other than population as legitimate bases for legislative apportionment than are federal courts.
- 3. State courts will be more likely than federal courts to "duck" apportionment cases by failing to reach the merits of the claim, despite the ruling in Baker v. Carr. This difference will appear in three ways:
 - a) State courts are more likely to deny jurisdiction than are federal courts.
 - State courts are more likely to decline to exercise equity jurisdiction.
 - c) State courts are more likely to show deference to state legislatures, and to delay nor, 183 A. 2d 806 (1962); Rice v. Frink, 143 So. 2d 848 (1962); Scholle v. Hare, 116 N.W. 2d 350 (1962); Sweeney v. Notte, 183 A. 2d 296 (1962); Wisconsin v. Zimmerman, 126 N.W. 2d 551 (1964); Wyoming v. Gage, 377 P. 2d 299 (1963).

While five of these cases did not deal with the apportionment of state legislatures, they are immediately relevant to several of the hypotheses. Sanders v. Gray involved the Georgia county unit system. Blaikie v. Power dealt with the selection of members of the New York City Council. Heldund v. Hanson, Glass v. Hancock County Election Committee and Griffin v. Board of Supervisors dealt with the apportionment of county governments.

Since many of the cases were handled in several stages, it is possible for a given case to appear in what would seem to be contradictory categories if a court significantly modified its position or its strategy between opinions.

judicial action in order to allow the legislature to act first.

- In their rulings on constitutionality, state judges will permit a greater degree of population inequality than will federal judges.
- 5. State and federal judges will differ in the application of judicial remedies in cases in which state legislative apportionments are found to violate the Constitution. This will be made evident by two related indicators:
 - a) State judges are more likely to defer to the legislature and to decline to provide a judicial remedy while awaiting legislative action—despite the finding of unconstitutionality.
 - b) Federal courts are more likely than state courts to act to provide positive relief once the unconstitutionality of a state's apportionment is established.

This formulation of hypotheses helps to compensate for the basic problem in research design noted above: the comparison of state and federal judicial responses to "similar" rather than identical stimuli. As formulated, the hypotheses differ in the extent to which this is a problem. Hypotheses 1 and 2 require a comparison of the verbal responses of state and federal courts to the identical stimulus-the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr. The lower court apportionment case is the occasion for the response, rather than the stimulus. We need not assume that the judge's discussion of Baker is tied to the specifics of the case before him. To test Hypotheses 3 and 5. one compares judicial action (or lack thereof). But here too, the action reflects a response to Baker: may a judge still avoid apportionment cases? Must a judge grant positive relief once he has found a violation of the Constitution? Presumably the ramifications of the particular case would have more influence on the judge's action in response to Baker than on his verbal response.

Only Hypothesis 4—which posits that when deciding cases state judges will permit a greater degree of population inequality than federal judges—calls for a comparison of the responses of judges to different but "similar" stimuli. And as will be seen, this is a fatal weakness.

III. FINDINGS

Hypothesis 1. A test of the first hypothesis—that state courts are more critical of the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr than are federal courts—requires a detailed textual analysis of all the cases involved. I have presented such an analysis elsewhere. 12 It demonstrates strates considerable similarity in the opinions of state and federal judges. For the most part, the lower courts did not explicitly question the Supreme Court's policy decision to intervene in apportionment cases. However, many judges criticized the procedure the high court had followed; they were particularly upset by the lack of guidance provided for them in Baker. In their references to the Supreme Court's craftsmanship, the remonstrances of many federal judges were at least as strong—if not stronger—than those of state judges. The following comments by federal judges are illustrative:

12 Edward N. Beiser, "The Treatment of Legis-

Until some direction is given with respect to the application of invidious discrimination to the reapportionment cases, the lower courts will continue to have difficulty in determining the standard to be applied....¹³

We are unable to premise an invalidity of the provisions of the State of New York upon the Baker v. Carr determination by reason of the absence of applicable indicia.¹⁴

No guidelines or criteria are laid down for determining the extent or level of disproportion to constitute infringement of the Equal Protection Clause. . . . ¹⁵

[W]e must confess lack of both omnicompetence and prescience, which it appears to us would be necessary to make a judicial appraisal and declaration that the State's time-old method of apportionment is irrational. . . . ¹⁰

It is indeed difficult for judges and attorneys to fully understand the impact of Baker v. Carr... to say nothing of legislators upon whom the primary responsibility of reapportionment rests.¹⁷

The conclusion which emerges from a close reading of the lower court apportionment cases is that, with respect to their assessments of Baker v. Carr, federal judges differed among themselves; state supreme court judges differed among themselves; and the two patterns of lative Apportionment by the State and Federal Courts: A Comparative Analysis of the Judicial Process" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Princeton University, 1967).

- ¹³ Davis v. Synhorst, 217 F. Supp. 492, 497 (1963).
- ¹⁴ WMCA Inc. v. Simon, 208 F. Supp. 368, 372 (1962).
- ¹⁵ Lisco v. McNichols, 208 F. Supp. 471, 376 (1962).
- ¹⁶ Hearne v. Smylie, 225 F. Supp. 645, 651 (1964).
- ¹⁷ Mann v. Davis, 213 F. Supp. 577, 586 (1962). Dissenting opinion.

opinion are similar. It does not appear possible to conclude—as we had hypothesized—that as a group, state judges were more critical of the Supreme Court's opinion in Baker than federal judges.¹⁸

Hypothesis 2. It is possible to be more precise when testing the hypothesis that state and federal courts would differ in their interpretations of the Supreme Court's instructions in Baker. It was anticipated that the two groups of courts would give different answers to three related questions: had the Supreme Court reached the merits of the Tennessee apportionment case, and provided substantive guidelines for lower court action? Was a one man, one vote standard required in either or both chambers of a state legislature? Could a state legitimately consider factors other than population when apportioning its legislature?

Nine of the twenty-nine federal cases held that the Supreme Court had not dealt with the merits of legislative apportionment, or provided concrete guidelines to enable lower courts to do so. Four of the nineteen state cases reached the same conclusion. While the difference between the state and federal courts is not statistically significant, onte that it is not in the anticipated direction.

- ¹⁸ It is important to remember that the choice between a state or federal court by a litigant was not randomly made.
- 1º Daniel v. Davis, Davis v. Synhorst (first opinion), Germano v. Kerner, Hearne v. Smylie, Lisco v. Love, Lisco v. McNichols, Sobel v. Adams, Wisconsin v. Zimmerman, and WMCA Inc. v. Simon. Citations are in note 11. The state cases were: Caeser V. Williams, Davis v. McCarty, In re Apportionment of the Michigan Legislature, and Mikel v. Rousseau. Citations in note 11.
- ²⁰ Fisher's p=.20. The negative cells in the calculation include only those courts which explicitly stated that the Supreme Court had not reached the merits of Baker, or indicated specific guidelines for the lower courts.

The particular results of this study allowed me the luxury of avoiding an important methodological point which may be significant in future research. While I employed Fisher's Exact Probability Test to consider whether the observed results could have occurred as a matter of chance, I am not prepared to defend this as the exclusive decision-rule for determining the validity of the hypotheses tested. Consider this example: If ten of fourteen federal judges refused to apply Baker v. Carr to Congressional apportionment, while only one of five state judges acted in this manner, these results would not be statistically significant. Yet I would be inclined to say that the Four of the twenty-nine federal courts stated that Baker required that at least one chamber of a bicameral state legislature be apportioned strictly on the basis of population.²¹ Only one of the nineteen state courts held that a population-based apportionment was required in at least one legislative chamber.²² While this difference corresponds with our hypothesis, it is not statistically significant.²³

Twelve of the twenty-nine federal courts explicitly stated that factors other than population are legitimate bases for legislative apportionment, at least to some extent. Seven of the nineteen state decisions expressed a similar position.²⁴ Note that again the difference between state and federal courts in this respect, while not statistically significant, is not in the anticipated direction.²⁵

The language of those federal courts which rejected the one man, one vote standard the difference between these two groups of judges ought not be rejected. The problem is that, with small N's, when one uses the question "could this result have occurred as a matter of chance more than five times in one hundred" to decide whether observed differences are meaningful, he may be requiring results which are more extreme than he would expect on the basis of his theory and experience.

- ²¹ Baker v. Carr, Davis v. Synhorst (later opinion), Moss v. Burkhart, and Toombs v. Fortson, citations in note 11. Moss v. Burkhart was the only decision—state or federal—which understood the Supreme Court to require equally populated districts in both houses of a state legislature.
- ²² Maryland Committee v. Tawes. Citation in note 11. This applies only to interpretations of Baker v. Carr. Other courts reached such conclusions after the Supreme Court's decisions in Gray v. Sanders and Wesberry v. Sanders.
- ²³ Fisher's p = .26. The regative cells in the calculation include those courts which failed to reach the merits, as well as those courts which expressed a negative view.
- ²⁴ The twelve federal cases were: Baker v. Carr, Daniel v. Davis, Germano v. Kerner, Lisco v. Love, Lisco v. McNichols, Mann v. Davis, Marshall v. Harz, Sanders v. Gray, Sobel v. Adams, Thigpen v. Meyers, Toombs v. Fortson, and WMCA Inc. v. Simon. The seven state cases were: Caeser v. Williams, Davis v. McCarty, Griffin v. Board of Supervisors, Levitt v. Attorney General, Levitt v. Maynard, Maryland Committee v. Tawes, and Sweeney v. Notte. Citations in note 11.
- ²⁵ Fisher's p=.23. The negative cells include both courts stating that non-population factors could not be considered, and those expressing no opinion.

Supreme Court was ultimately to adopt was at least as vigorous as that of the state courts. Many relied upon an analogy with the national legislature. To a federal judge in Connecticut, "it would be revolutionary indeed for the [Supreme Court] to hold that it violates the Federal Constitution for a legislature to have one house based on population and another on the unit system."²⁶ An Illinois federal district court opinion rose to rhetorical heights:

Should that which is deemed proper when observed in the presence of the federal government be suddenly deemed improper when associated with a sovereign state? Must the subject be more royal than the king? Must the State be more democratic than the United States?²⁷

These data do not confirm the second hypothesis; it appears that the state and federal courts did not differ significantly in their interpretations of the Supreme Court's mandate in Baker.

Hypothesis 3. It was generally understood that Baker v. Carr required lower courts to deal with apportionment cases. Yet some lower courts employed a variety of techniques to avoid judicial involvement in this area. Ten of the twenty-nine federal courts and six of the nineteen state supreme courts "ducked" apportionment questions by failing to reach the merits of cases before them for resolution.²⁸ Thus contrary to our hypothesis, federal courts were slightly more likely to avoid apportionment cases than state courts; however, this result is not statistically significant.²⁹

The Supreme Court of Alabama was the only court—state or federal—which denied that it had jurisdiction in an apportionment case.³⁰

Two state courts and two federal courts declined to exercise equity jurisdiction.³¹ In seven of the twenty-nine federal cases, judges stayed their hands in order to allow state legislatures to act first;³² two of the nineteen state cases exhibited such deference to the legislative branch.³³ This apparent difference—which is contrary to our expectation—is not statistically significant.³⁴ The data do not confirm Hypothesis 3.

Hypothesis 4. It turns out that Hypothesis 4-the expectation that federal and state judges will react differently to a given degree of malapportionment—cannot be tested in the real world. Two procedures for the verification of this hypothesis present themselves. One might apply a measurement of malapportionment to each of the states in which a court ruled on the constitutionality of the legislature's apportionment.35 Having ranked the states in terms of malapportionment, it would be simple to compare the responses of state and federal judges to approximately equivalent cases. Unfortunately, this procedure would not test the hypothesis. The objective measurement of malapportionment is not necessarily an indicator of the stimulus to which the judge was exposed. The difficulty with this procedure is that we cannot know whether cases based on equivalent factual situations constitute equivalent stimuli in the context of litigation.

In order to overcome this problem, one might compare cases on the basis of the judges' articulated assessments of the degree of malapportionment involved. That is, one might order the cases in terms of the indices of population-inequality which the judges invoke in their opinions. Two statistical measures predominate in the cases under study: the ratio of the most populous district to the least populous district, and the smallest percentage of the population which could conceivably elect a majority of the legislature (The Dauer-Kelsay

²⁶ Anderson, dissenting in Butterworth v. Dempsey, 229 F. Supp. 754, 774 (1964).

²⁷ Germano v. Kerner, 220 F Supp. 230, 233 (1963).

²⁸ The ten federal cases were: Daniel v. Davis, Hearne v. Smylie, Hedlund v. Hanson, League of Nebraska Municipalities v. Marsh, Lein v. Sathre, Silver v. Jordan, Sims v. Frink, Sincock v. Terry, Stout v. Hendricks, and Wisconsin v. Zimmerman. The six state cases were: Glass v. Hancock, In re Apportionment of the Michigan Legislature, In re Legislative Reapportionment, Maryland Committee v. Tawes, Rice v. Frink, and Wyoming v. Gage. Citations are in note 11.

²⁹ Fisher's p = .24.

³⁰ Rice v. Frink. Citation in note 11.

²¹ The state cases were Glass v. Hancock and In re Apportionment of the Michigan State Legislature. The federal cases were Hearne v. Smylie and Wisconsin v. Zimmerman. Citations in note 11.

³² Daniel v. Davis, League of Nebraska Municipalities v. Marsh, Lein v. Sathre, Sims v. Frink, Sincock v. Terry, Stout v. Hendricks, and Wisconsin v. Zimmerman. Citations in note 11.

²⁵ Maryland Committee v. Tawes, Wyoming v. Gage. Citations in note 11.

³⁴ Fisher's p = .16.

²⁵ The problem of measuring malapportionment in a way which will permit comparative analysis has been discussed recently in Glendon Schubert and Charles Press, "Measuring Malapportionment," this Review, 58 (June, 1964), 302–327; 302 (1964), and Henry F. Kaiser, "A Measure of the Population Quality of Legislative Apportionment," this Review, 62 (March, 1968), 208–215.

index). But Schubert and Press have demonstrated that these indices are not adequate for comparative analysis.²⁶

Thus both procedures fail. When we employ an independent, precise measurement of malapportionment, we cannot demonstrate that the cases as presented to the judges accurately reflect the degree of malapportionment. When we utilize the judicial descriptions of the extent of malapportionment, we find that the indices of malapportionment employed are so imprecise that we cannot determine which cases are equivalent. This difficulty appears to be an unavoidable consequence of the fact that this comparison of state and federal judicial behavior is based on the responses of different political actors to "ecuivalent" rather than identical stimuli. ³⁷

Hypothesis 5. A finding of unconstitutionality did not necessarily induce a court to take affirmative remedial action. In nine of the fourteen federal cases which ruled that a state's legislative apportionment was unconstitutional, the court declined to remedy the situation, in order to allow the legislature to act.³⁸ Similar delays were granted in all five of the state apportionment cases in which violations of either the state or federal constitutions were found.³⁹ The apparent small difference between 36 Op. cit.

37 In only one instance did federal and state judges comment on the constitutionality of the same apportionment. The eight-judge Michigan Supreme Court was forced to decide which of a group of apportionment plans most closely corresponded to the requirements of the state constitution. In the course of their opinions, five of the eight applied the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution to the apportionment legislation: three held that it was constitutional, two that it was not. Shortly thereafter, a threejudge federal district court ruled-two to onethat the apportionment did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. It is interesting that the three state judges and two federal judges who upheld the constitutionality of the Republicanauthored Michigan apportionment were all Republicans. The two state judges and the dissenting federal judge who held it unconstitutional were Democrats. In re Apportionment of the Michigan State Legislcture, 126 N.W. 2d 731 (1964). Marshall v. Hare, 227 F. Supp. 989 (1964). 38 Baker v. Carr, Devis v. Synhorst, Drew v.

38 Baker v. Carr, Devis v. Synhorst, Drew v. Scranton, Mann v. Eavis, Moss v. Burkhart Sincock v. Duffy, Sobel v. Adams, Thigpen v. Meyers, Toombs v. Fortson. Citations in note 11.

³⁹ Harris v. Shanahan, Mikell v. Rousseau, Scholle v. Hare, Sweery v. Notte, Wisconsin v. Zimmerman. Citations in note 11. the behavior of the two sets of judges is in the direction hypothesized, but is not statistically significant.⁴⁰

Several of the decisions granting delays threatened court action if the legislature failed to meet judicial standards; as a group, the federal opinions tended to employ stronger language in this respect than did the state courts. Specific time limitations were imposed in five of the nine federal cases in which delays were granted, and in three of the five state cases.

Of the fourteen cases in which federal district courts found that legislative apportionments violated the Federal Constitution. positive relief was granted in four: an injunction was issued to prevent the use of Washington's apportionment statutes; aspects of two different legislative proposals were imposed by court order in Alabama; a plan submitted by plaintiffs was adopted by the Tennessee court with minor modifications; and in only one state (Oklahoma) did a federal court provide a specific apportionment plan of its own.41 It is clear that at least two additional federal courts were prepared to act when the United States Supreme Court intervened. 42 State courts granted relief in only one of the five cases in which they they held apportionment legislation to be unconstitutional: the Wisconsin Supreme Court reapportioned the state.43 This difference is not statistically significant.44

These differences in the proclivity of state and federal judges to remedy malapportionment seem far too minor to confirm our hypothesis.

IV. IMPLICATIONS

The differences in the behavior of state and federal judges which we predicted do not appear. Of course, it may be that careful selection by litigants of the courts in which they sought to benefit from Baker v. Carr prevented such differences from occurring. It is also possible that by comparing state courts of last resort and federal district courts we looked in the wrong place.⁴⁵

- 40 Fisher's p = .17.
- ⁴¹ Thigpen v. Meyers, Sims v. Frink, Baker v. Carr (later opinion), and Moss v. Burkhart. Citations in note 11.
- ⁴² Butterworth v. Dempsey; Drew v. Scranton. Citations in note 11.
 - 43 Wisconsin v. Zimmerman. Citation in note 11.
 - 44 Fisher's p = .43.
- ⁴⁵ Indeed, with respect to race relations cases, Kenneth Vines suggests that "[t]he role of the southern state supreme court has parallelled that of the national Supreme Court. In both cases, the Nonetheless, it is interesting that these results are in accord with the only published empirical comparison of federal and state judicial behavior. Professor Vines concluded that differences in the treatment of Negroes by southern state and federal courts were less than might have been expected. While Negroes "have a better chance for favorable decisions in the federal courts than in the state courts, . . . the difference is not one of very great magnitude." Vines found that "in some states, Negroes fared better in the state court than in the federal courts."

Two explanations for the failure of the predicted differences to appear seem plausible. It may be that state supreme court judges are as well (or nearly as well) insulated from political influence as are lower federal judges. Formallegal factors governing judicial selection, tenure of office, and so on may be less significant than higher court has tended to protect minority groups by reversing decisions made against them in lower courts." Vines, op. cit. (note 1) p. 16.

judicial reformers would imagine. It is also possible that the demands of one's role as a "lower court judge" are of greater significance than either differences in recruitment pattern or institutionalized position. The "bureaucratic phenomenon" may suppress the appearance of differences between state and federal judges.

One virtue of the methodology employed in this paper is that it can be applied extensively to existing data. State and federal judicial responses to virtually every past Supreme Court decision which is viewed as innovative in significant respects can be studied. It would seem desirable that such analyses be based on the comparison of responses to specific stimuli which confronted both state and federal judges. For example, rather than categorizing opinions as "pro-Negro," one might ask: were federal judges more likely than state judges to apply Brown v. Board to non-educational facilities?

Clearly, the present study will not support generalizations about the behavior of state and federal judges. But it appears in order to ask that the received wisdom be reconsidered, and that judgment be suspended until further empirical research is carried out.

⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 10

⁴⁷ Ibid.

VOTING TURNOUT IN AMERICAN CITIES*

ROBERT R. ALFORD University of Wisconsin

EUGENE C. LEE University of California, Berkeley

Writing about local elections in 1968, Charles R. Adrian and Charles Press report that, "It is not known whether . . . state and national voting-population characteristics fit municipal voting, too." Although a number of important studies of politics and elections in individual communities have emerged in recent years, the data are far from sufficient to permit more than the most speculative generalizations about the nature of the local electorate.2 This study draws back the curtain, albeit only a bit, on one aspect of local political participation-voting turnout. The data presented constitute, so far as we know, the first attempt at a comprehensive comparison among American cities with respect to turnout. As will be suggested and become obvious, the breadth of the data is not matched by their depth; data were received from only 80 percent of the 729 cities above 25,000 population in 1952, and we were able to utilize comparative turnout figures from only 282 of these. While relationships are suggested between turnout, political and governmental structure, and characteristics of the population, these relationships must be regarded more as leads to future research, than as clear and unambiguous findings.

- * The authors are indebted to Michael T. Aiken, Ruth B. Dixon, Daniel N. Gordon, Willis D. Hawley, Robert L. Lineberry, Donald B. Rosenthal, Peter W. Sperlich, Frederick M. Wirt, and Raymond E. Wolfinger for comments and suggestions above and beyond the normal call of collegial duty. Their willingness to be of assistance in no way renders them responsible for the results. The senior author wishes to thank the Institute for Research or Poverty, University of Wisconsin, for research assistance.
- ¹ Charles R. Adrian and Charles Press, Governing Urban America, 3rd ed. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1968), p. 95.
- ² Alvin Boskoff and Earmon Ziegler's study, Voting Patterns in a Local Election, provides a brief review of the state of the literature: (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company, 1964), Chapter 1. See also Lester W. Milbrath, Political Participation (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1965); but note that references to city elections are infrequent.

Previous work by the present authors has pointed to the importance of the political and social variables included in this analysis of American cities. Lee suggested in a study of nonpartisan elections and politics in California cities that nonpartisanship might tend to reduce voter participation.3 In a study of American cities, this hypothesis was confirmed in a preliminary analysis of the same data used in this article.4 The median turnout in partisan elections was 50 percent, compared to 30 percent in nonpartisan cities; in addition, the related characteristics of council-manager government and the appointed mayor were also seen to have a negative relationship to voter participation. It was not possible, however, to determine whether these relationships were independently associated or, rather, merely reflected underlying characteristics of the cities themselves.

Parallel work on form of government by Alford and others posited the existence of a relationship between form of government and socioeconomic characteristics. For example, "white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant, growing, and mobile cities are highly likely to be manager cities; ethnically and religiously diverse but nonmobile industrial cities are highly likely to be mayor-council cities." Other features of so-called "reform" type local government—non-partisan elections, at-large elections, small city councils, local elections which are not concurrent with state or national elections—have a similar social base. In this paper, the data and

- ² Eugene C. Lee, The Politics of Nonpartisan-ship (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1960), Chapters 9 and 11.
- ⁴ Eugene C. Lee, "City Elections: A Statistical Profile," in Municipal Year Book (Chicago: International City Managers' Association, 1963), 74-84.
- ⁵ Robert R. Alford and Harry M. Scoble, "Political and Socioeconomic Characteristics of American Cities," in Municipal Year Book (Chicago: International City Managers' Association, 1965), p. 95. See also Leo F. Schnore and Robert R. Alford, "Forms of Government and Socioeconomic Characteristics of Suburbs," Administrative Science Quarterly, 8 (June, 1963), 1–17; theoretical notions derived from these previous works are combined. The paper also draws upon two as yet unpublished studies, one of which included a factor analysis and multiple regression of these data.⁶

I. CONCEPTS AND DATA

The Meaning of Voting Turnout. Voting turnout in local elections is the most direct measure of participation in the electoral process, and possibly an indicator of other forms of political participation. We assume that a high level of voting turnout implies several things about the characteristics of the local electorate, although we do not have the data directly to test these assumptions.

For example, where there is a high level of voting turnout, one might assume there has been communication of political information to voters both about the particular election and about the political system of which elections form a part. This political information might be conveyed through a variety of reference groups-neighborhood groups, ethnic groups, political parties, voluntary associations-or through mass media such as television, radio and the press. Whether such political communication exists or not, either the community as a whole or particular groups within it possess norms which define voting as appropriate and proper behavior. Voting turnout is defined thus as the dependent variable, although it would be just as legitimate to turn the question around and attempt to determine the consequences of and John Kessel, "Governmental Structure and Political Environment: A Statistical Note about American Cities," this REVIEW, 66 (September, 1962), 615-620. Robert L. Lineberry and Edmund P. Fowler present data at some variance with the above and suggest that there are not significant class differences between reformed and unreformed cities, although there is "some support for the argument that reformed cities are more homogeneous." However, as they suggest, varying samples may produce varying conclusions. In any event, the differences between these studies are not central to this analysis of voting participation. See their "Reformism and Public Policies in American Cities," this REVIEW, 61 (September, 1967), p. 706.

⁶ Ruth B. Dixon, "Predicting Voter Turnout in City Elections," unpublished M.A. thesis in Sociology, University of California, Berkeley, 1966; Ruth B. Dixon, "The Reform Movement in American City Government: Has Democracy Been Sacrificed to Efficiency?", unpublished paper, Department of Sociology, University of California, Berkeley, 1965.

higher versus lower levels of voting turnout. A few studies have dealt with this question, particularly with reference to referenda, finding that higher turnout is associated with negative voting. There is no necessary connection between the causes and the consequences of different levels of voting turnout, however.

Varying levels of voting turnout in American cities may also be a consequence of political organization at the local level. For example, the more activity there is of groups interested in electoral outcomes, the more activity of party or other organizations seeking to get out the vote or to mobilize support behind slates of candidates, the higher voting turnout may be. On the other hand, high turnout may occur because of norms encouraging vote turnout held by members of other groups in the community with very little activity of political organizations per se.

As the above assumptions indicate, we see voting turnout as linked to the political and social structure of the local community. It seems possible, however, that relationships of characteristics of a community with voting turnout may be cancelled out by idiosyncracies of a particular election: the personality of the mayor, the issues which happen to be salient at the moment, the accident of having a controversial referendum or bond issue on the ballot, whether or not the local election happens to be held at the same time as a particularly important state or national election. Unfortunately, comparative data are not available to test such "situational" factors influencing voting turnout, and we shall assume that the correlations that we discuss are only reduced by the operations of these situational factors, and not reversed.8 It seems plausible to infer ⁷ Maurice Pinard, "Structural Attachments and Political Support in Urban Politics: The Case of Fluoridation Referendums," American Journal of Sociology, 68 (March, 1963), p. 518. A similar study reported that in cities with high levels of citizen participation, associated with a well-educated population, the local government was frequently immobilized from making decisions on such issues as bond referenda and fluoridation controversies. Robert L. Crain and Donald B. Rosenthal, "Community Status as a Dimension of Local Decision-Making," American Sociological Review, 32 (December, 1967), 970-984.

s See Robert R. Alford, "The Comparative Study of Urban Politics," in Leo F. Schnore and Henry Fagin (eds.), Urban Research and Policy Planning (Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, 1967), 263-302, for an analytic scheme which distinguishes "situational" from "cultural" and that if unique electoral issues and personalities account for most of the variation between cities in voting turnout, there should not be consistent associations between turnout and structural features of the local government and community. As indicated below, however, this is not the case, and relationships do exist. Given the nature of the data in the study, particularly the fact that they relate to only one election for each city, the fact that even modest relationships can be discovered on a national basis is significant.

Our perspective here is one which looks at a "population of elections," not a "population of individual voters," as V. O. Key put it. Correlatively, electorates are not merely "arithmetic sums of individuals," but rather "units playing special and significant roles in the political process and therefore worthy of analysis in their own right," in Austin Ranney's words.9 We are thus not inferring from our data on voting turnout anything about the characteristics of individual voters, nor do we invoke any social-psychological properties of individuals to explain our ecological correlations between characteristics of cities and the level of voting turnout. It would certainly be possible to develop propositions about the intervening processes of communication, definition of the political situation, and the formation of political identities in individuals and groups which connect structural features of American cities to the probability of high or low voting turnout, but these tasks are beyond our scope. We attempt, therefore, to avoid the pitfalls of "the ecological fallacy" (the generalization from group data to individuals) and "the "structural" factors in explaining decisions, policies and roles of government in urban politics. Situational factors themselves have causes and may be patterned, of course, but, by definition, are not predictable from structural or cultural factors. Voting turnout figures for four Wisconsin cities in April and November elections from 1950 to 1964 ranged from 14 percent to 91 percent, which is partly explainable by situational factors. See Robert R. Alford, with the collaboration of Harry M. Scoble, Bureaucracy and Participation: Political Cultures in Four Wisconsin Cities (Chicago: Rand McNally, forthcoming), Chapter VII.

⁹ V. O. Key, Jr., "The Politically Relevant in Surveys," Public Opinion Quarterly, 24 (1960), 54-61; and Austin Ranney, "The Utility and Limitations of Aggregate Data in the Study of Electoral Behavior," in Ranney (ed.), Essays in the Behavioral Study of Politics (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1962), p. 99. contextual fallacy" (the prediction of group action from the characteristics of individuals). 10

The Data. It is essential to an understanding of the data reported below that the nature of the criginal turnout figures and the ambiguity of certain of the variables be clearly understood.

- (1) No national source either collects or reports local voting statistics; few states do so. The data utilized here were collected by the International City Managers' Association in late 1962 from approximately 80 percent of the nation's 729 cities above 25,000 population. The missing cities tended disproportionately to be partisan, mayor-council and Eastern, all characteristics noted below as being associated with high voting turnout.
- (2) For the bulk of the report, data are utilized only for those cities whose local election was not held concurrently with a state or national election, for we do not know for concurrent elections whether the turnout figures represent only the local increment—for example, the vote for mayor—or the vote in the larger race—for example, a vote for governor in 1962. Thus, a valid comparison of concurrent and nonconcurrent elections is impossible, and it is essential to use the narrower base, even though it reduces the number of cities to be analyzed by one-third.
- (5) An understatement of the mayor-council vote may result from the fact that in an undetermined (but quite small) number of such cities, only ward elections were held in 1961–62, which—in an unspecified (but even smaller) number of cities—involved only a portion of the city.
- (4) The data do not distinguish, either in mayor-council or manager cities, those elections in which a mayor appeared separately on the ballot from those in which he did not. The presence of the mayor on the ballot tends to increase voter turnout,¹² and the separately elected mayor is more likely to be found in mayor-council cities than in council-manager cities. Thus, the fact that in a small number of the mayor-council cities the mayor was not on the ballot in the election here reported tends to understate voter turnout in mayor-council cities, insofar as the impact of the mayor is concerned.
- (5) The data do not indicate whether the election reported was a run-off or a primary.

¹⁰ Crain and Rosenthal, op. cit., p. 984.

¹² The following table compares characteristics of American cities above 25,000 population in 1960 and the cities used in this study.

¹² Lee, "City Elections . . . ," op. cit., p. 81.

Characteristics	=	ties 1960		ties g Turnout	Nonconcurr	s with ent Elections
	No.	Percent	No.	Percent	No.	his Study Percent
Form of Government:					***************************************
Mayor-Council	259	38%	130	30%	73	26%
Commission	77	11	37	9	30	11
Council-Manager	330	50	261 .	61	179	63
		100%		100%		100%
Form of Election:
Partisan	193	29%	99	23%	50	18%
Nonpartisan	479	71	329	77	232	82
		${100\%}$		100%		100%
Region:		-
East	164	24%	84	20%	43	15%
Midwest	190	28	122	29	67	24
South	191	28	118	28	95	34
Far West	131	19	104	24	77	27
		100%		100%		100%
Total	(676)	100%	(428)	100%	(282)	100%

See Table 1 for the states comprising each region. By 1962, when the voting data were obtained, there were 729 cities over 25,000 population.

(Approximately 20 percent of the nation's cities employ a run-off if no candidate receives a majority in the initial general election.) The consequences of this fact for turnout are not known. The local elections reported were held in 1961 and 1962, while the demographic data derive from the 1960 Census. Thus, as much as two years may have elapsed from the census to the election, so that changes in population characteristics in the intervening period are not reflected. Inasmuch as the voter-registration ratio is used as a measure of turnout, rather than the voter-adult population ratio, the impact of such changes is minimized insofar as the turnout percentages themselves are concerned. However, similar flaws exist with reference to the registration figures. States employ different laws, and cities and counties often administer the laws quite independently. Thus, the registration base in one city may be full of deadwood, another up-to-date, and the resulting percentage turnout figures be incomparable.

(6) Finally, the use of "partisan" and "non-partisan" as terms to describe the form of elections is a measure, not of the reality of political party activity, but merely of the form of ballot. While we assume that the existence of the party label on the ballot—the definition of a partisan election generally employed—is associated with a higher degree of party activity than is the case in which the nonpartisan ballot is employed, we have no evidence to support the assumption. "As some formally partisan cities are nonpartisan in fact, so some formally nonpartisan cities are de facto partisan in varying degrees."13 Party activity may have a closer relationship to voter participation than the ballot form, but we have no way of assessing this on a comparative basis. Thus, we are forced to utilize a legal definition of partisan and nonpartisan elections, rather than an actual measure of partisan involvement. Similarly, the mayor-council form of government, associated with a separately elected mayor, includes mayors with widely varying powers and, theoretically, a wide range of impact upon the electorate and, indirectly, upon voter turnout. Again, however, we must employ a legal definition rather than a test of actual mayoral influence which might, in fact be more signifi-

¹³ Charles E. Gilbert and Christopher Clague, "Electoral Competition and Electoral Systems in Large Cities," The Journal of Politics, 24 (May, 1962), p. 330.

While none of these shortcomings appears crucial to us, they do suggest the tentative nature of both the data and the findings themselves, as well as the need for additional controls in subsequent studies.

Correlates of Voting Turnout. We shall consider three general categories of factors which may be related to the level of voting turnout in American cities: political structure, social structure, and community continuity. In addition, we shall include region as a separate category, although one of a totally different theoretical nature. The first two categories encompass a variety of possible specific factors related either to the institutions of government, party. and elections or to the demographic and group composition of the community. The third category is of a different order, referring to the development over time of interrelationships. contacts, or communications between different elements of political or social structure.

First, political structure. Institutions which allow greater access to political leaders and. theoretically, greater responsiveness to political demands should encourage higher levels of voting turnout. So, too, should the existence of institutions explicitly designed to mobilize the electorate. We shall follow the assumptions of the recent literature in taking the existence of mayor-council form of government14 and partisan elections as indicating a greater probability of responsiveness "to class, racial, and religious cleavages . . . the enduring conflicts of political life."15 We have already noted that earlier analysis of some of the data presented in this paper showed that the presence of the "reformist" institutions—council-manager government and nonpartisan elections—was associated with lower voting turnout.16 The causal direction of the relationship is difficult to infer, however, since the activity of groups which favor certain political forms may influence both political structures themselves and also the level of ¹⁴ We use "mayor-council" and "nonmanager" interchangeably, although the category includes some 30 commission cities, 10.6 percent of the total of nonmanager communities with nonconcurrent elections.

¹⁵ Lineberry and Fowler, op. cit., p. 715. This article provides a succinct summary of these hypotheses.

Lee, "City Elections...," op. cit., 74-84. Ecological data from Des Moines, Iowa, show a similar pattern; see Robert H. Salisbury and Gordon Blake, "Class and Party in Partisan and Non-Partisan Elections: The Case of Des Moines," this Review, 57 (September, 1963), 589-590.

turnout, or, on the other hand, once in existence, a political structure may be sufficiently inaccessible and unresponsive to discourage electoral participation.

Second, social structure. The existence in a community of groups which provide a social base for political organization would seem to be an important element of social structure which might be associated with voting turnout. Which elements or characteristics of population heterogeneity have an impact on turnout is an important theoretical question: we can only suggest a few possibilities, not all of which are testable with the data available. Religion, ethnicity, education, occupation, neighborhood, and race are obvious and standard bases of social differentiation in American communities. Yet it is not self-evident that variations in any or all of them should be systematically related to levels of voting turnout. at least as measured by aggregate and crude indicators such as those available for comparative studies. It may be, too, that variations in religious or ethnic composition expressed as a percentage of the total population are inadequate measures to relate to voting turnout. Very low or very high ethnicity, for example. may suggest little social cleavage and low turnout: figures between these two extremes, however, might reveal a divided community, high cleavage and high turnout. Only limited data exist on the numbers and social organization of religious or ethnic groups, or on the voluntary associations based on persons with similar occupation or education vis-a-vis aggregate data on their proportion in the electorate. We must, therefore, infer something about social structure from census data on the socioeconomic and ethnic composition of the commu-

We shall use the ethnic composition of a city, as measured by the proportion of foreign-born persons and persons of foreign or mixed parentage, and the educational composition of the city as our two indicators of social structure.

Arguments and some data on the persistence of ethnic voting are provided in several recent articles; the point is made that the political system is not merely a dependent variable, but that parties and candidates may continue to serve as a "mediator and mobilizer of minority symbols and interests." Although admittedly a very inadequate measure, the proportion of persons of foreign stock is closely related (r = .62) to the only indicator of religious composition of a city which is available from the census (the proportion of children in private schools), and we shall use the former as a more direct measure of the religious-ethnic characteristics of a city.

¹⁷ Michael Parenti, "Ethnic Politics and the Persistence of Ethnic Identification," this Review, 61 (September, 1967), p. 717. An earlier statement of this thesis is found in Raymond E. Wolfinger, "Some Consequences of Ethnic Politics," in M. Kent Jennings and Harmon Ziegler

Education would seem to be associated with voting turnout, if the logic of the oft-reported individual correlation of education with political participation can be extended to the ecological or aggregate level.18 We might expect higher voting turnout in cities with a higher proportion of better-educated persons. Yet, such persons are often in a minority in a city, and therefore their behavior alone may not be able markedly to determine the absolute level of voting turnout. The opposite hypothesis also seems plausible: the higher the proportion of less well-educated persons and workers in a community, the higher the voting turnout, for these groups could form the social base for political movements likely to have a stake in influencing local leaders through elections. Here is a case which provides a direct test of alternative hypotheses suggested by an analytical framework which includes both individual level data and ecological level data.

Third, community continuity. The longer a community has existed, the more likely it is that there are groups, institutions and individuals with a stake in the city's political and governmental structures. Similarly, regardless of the age of the community, the more stable the population within the city, the greater the likelihood that such political attachments will exist. Thus, both the age of a city and the stability of its population would seem to have a probable relationship to voting turnout. We shall use two indicators to measure the continuity of the local social and political systems of American communities: the age of the city and the geographic mobility of its population. The age of the city, as measured by the decade in which the city reached 25,000 population, is a direct measure of the length of time that a social and political organization has existed on a given territorial site. City age does not measure, however, the age of either form of government or form of elections, both of which may have been altered one or more times during the life of the city. Thus, only indirect statements may be made about the continuity of particular political institutions. Geographic mobility—as measured by the proportion of the population who moved to their present home from a different county between 1955 and 1960-is an indirect indication of the continuity of a given set of families and households in a community. Where such mobility is low, a high level of out-migration may or may not have taken place, and thus geographic mobility may not be a good measure of population change. However, for that very reason it is appropriate for our purposes. The "residue" of families left behind is the appropriate population which is attached or unattached to the electoral system. Conversely, a city which has experienced a high level of movement of its population from one county to another probably contains many residents who have lost their ties to social groups and political networks which have been their channels of communication of political stimuli.

Finally, region. It is difficult both conceptually and analytically to suggest or to test the notion that "region" has an independent relationship to voting turnout. As Lineberry and Fowler suggest, "region as a variable is an undifferentiated potpourri of socioeconomic, attitudinal, historical and cultural variations."19 Nevertheless, while not capable of adequate analysis in this study, the possibility remains that such factors as political tradition or culture—the previous existence of particular institutions, the impact of previous events, or the existence of particular value systems-may have a relationship to the character of the community and, thus, to voter participation.20 For example, our data do not permit us to measure the existence—past or present—of leaders or bosses, of citizen organizations and community controversies that may have an enduring impact upon patterns of community politics, including voting turnout, Such characteristics may not be randomly distributed throughout the country and may not be adcquately "explained" by normal demographic ⁽eds.), The Electoral Process (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1966). See also Raymond E. Wolfinger, "The Development and Persistence of Ethnic Voting," this Review, 59 (December, 1965), 896-908. Robert Lane has suggested that "the seat of ethnic politics is the local community, not the national capitol." See his Political Life (New York: The Free Press, 1959), p. 239.

¹⁸ See, for example, Lane, op. cit., p. 222; Boskoff and Ziegler, op. cit., p. 16: Milbrath, op. cit., p. 122.

¹⁹ Lineberry and Fowler, op. cit., p. 707.

²⁰ For an example of the use of "political culture" as a variable in categorizing American states, see Daniel J. Elazar, American Federalism: A View from the States (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 1966).

data. Thus, the oft-asserted likelihood that working-class Eastern and Midwestern cities are more likely to have political machines with a stake in controlling local elections and getting out the vote is not revealed by the data available in this broad national survey.21 Similarly, we cannot assess the possible impact, suggested by David Rogers, that many southern communities have an authoritarian and conservative value system, reflected in a rigid class structure and one-party politics, all of which would be likely to have an effect on voter participation.22 Nor are our data adequate for us to have confidence that the "independent effect" of region can be isolated. Nevertheless, the regional differences suggested below may well hide more important variables than those which are available from census data.

II. FINDINGS

Table 1 displays the correlations of the various indicators of social and political structure and community continuity with four different measures of voting turnout in American cities. In order to avoid the problem of variations in registration from city to city, both the proportion of registrants voting and of adults voting are shown. Also, because cities with elections which are concurrent with state or nation elections have higher turnout than those with nonconcurrent elections, cities are divided into those two categories. Thus, we have two independent replications based on two populations of cities.

All four general factors are associated with the level of voting turnout, regardless of whether the proportion of adults or registrants voting is considered, and regardless of whether the local election was concurrent or nonconcurrent. With regard to political structure, cities without the council-manager form and with partisan elections have higher voting turnout than cities with other forms. With respect to social structure, cities with highly ethnic populations and less well educated populations have higher voting turnout With respect to community continuity and region, cities with stable populations, which are older, and which are located in the East have higher voting turnout than cities with a high level of in-migration, which are younger, and which are located in the Far West or South.

²¹ We are indebted to Raymond Wolfinger for bringing this point to our attention.

²² David Rogers, "Community Political Systems: A Framework and Hypothesis for Comparative Studies," in Bert E. Swanson (ed.), Current Trends in Comparative Community Studies (Kansas City, Mo.: Community Studies, Inc., 1962), p. 39.

The same general patterns are found if other related indicators are used, such as the percent of foreign born, the percent of persons with five years of education or less, the percent of college graduates, the percent of children in private school, or the decade in which the city reached 10,000 population. Nor do other dividing lines for regions alter the general relationships.

We shall present only the proportion of registrants voting in subsequent tables, because we are concerned with the factors which bring eligible voters to the polls, not with the factors which influence the possibility of registration. Analytically, the two bases are distinct in terms of their relevance for political processes, since it is possible for a city to have an extremely high proportion of registrants voting but a very low proportion of adults voting (particularly in the South), although not vice versa. The act of registration is of course, an important aspect of political participation.²³ In any event, the correlation between adults and registrants voting in this study is high (.81), and separate analysis of the data shows that the relationships described here would not be altered by the use of the "adult" base.

As noted above, we shall report further data only for those cities whose local election was not held concurrently with a state or national election. The correlation of concurrence with the proportions of registrants voting was .30, with adults voting .35. The mean voting turnout of adults in cities with concurrent elections was 43.5 percent, for nonconcurrent elections 31.2 percent, and the "advantage" of concurrent elections is maintained in every sub-group we examined. Concurrent elections are slightly more likely in the East, in cities with partisan elections and a mayor-council form of government, and in older cities, all characteristics themselves linked to higher voter turnout. But, as Table 1 shows, the association does not account for the correlations of these other characteristics with voter turnout. While not included here, all subsequent tables shown were also separately computed for cities with concurrent elections, and the same patterns of relationships hold.

Political Structures and Voting Turnout. Table 2 attempts to assess the independent influence of political structural characteristics upon the level of voting turnout. The table ²³ Stanley Kelley, Jr., Richard E. Ayres and William G. Bowen, "Registration and Voting: Putting First Things First," this Review, 61 (June, 1967), 359-379.

TABLE 1. CORRELATES OF LOCAL VOTING TURNOUT IN AMERICAN CITIES, 1961-62*
(Cities over 25,000 population in 1960)

`,		Correlat	ions with:
	Registran	ts Voting	Adults V	Voting
Cities Characteristic With:	Nonconcurrent Elections	Concurrent Elections	Nonconcurrent Elections	Concurrent Elections
Political Structure
${\it Non-council-manager}$ vs.	•
council-manager	.43	.34	.50	.35
Partisan vs. nonpartisan elections	.28	.43	.29	.38
Social Structure
Ethnicity: Percent of the pop	u-	•
lation native of foreign or mixe	ed		•
parentage, 1960	.32	.36	.51	.49
Education: Percent of person	n s
25 years old and over who com pleted four years of high school or more, 1960	28	16	15	22
Community
Mobility: Percent migrant t	50
a different county, 1955-60	32	32	40	49
Age of City: Decade in which	h
the city reached 25,000 popular		.27	.28	.23
tion	·	•
Regional Location
East	.39	.58	.45	.51
Midwest	.04	13	.21	.02
South	15	29	44	45
Far West	19	25	10	20
Mean Registrants Voting	46.9%	59.0%
Mean Adults Voting		, ,	31.2%	43.5%
N =	(282)	(142)	(294)	(146)

^{*} Entries are product-moment correlations of the actual percentages of registrants voting or adults voting in the last local election held in the given city. Cities in which the local election was held concurrently with a state or national election are separated from those in which it was not concurrent. The N's shown are approximate for a few correlations, since not all data were available on political structure. The direction of the correlation is indicated by the italicized word. The two political structure variables and regional location were treated as dummy variables (presence or absence of the attribute named) for the correlations. All other correlations were computed from the actual percentages. Data on political structure were obtained from the Municipal Year Book, 1963, and all other data are from the 1960 U. S. Census of Population. The correlations are not significantly altered if commission cities are grouped with manager cities for the purpose of constructing a mayor-council/nonmayor-council dummy variable.

States comprising the indicated regions are as follows:

East: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, District of Columbia.

Midwest: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska.

Far West: California, Oregon, Washington, Nevada, Alaska, Hawaii, Montana, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, New Mexico.

South (and Border): Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee.

TABLE 2. CORRELATES OF REGISTRANTS VOTING WITH POLITICAL STRUCTURES CONTROLLING FOR SOCIAL STRUCTURE, COMMUNITY CONTINUITY, AND REGION*

(Cities with Nonconcurrent Local Elections)

Characteristic			Controlling and Comm				Correlation within Region
			Education	Mobility	Age of City	East	Midwest	South	Far West	Cities
Nonmanager v manager for government		.38	.37	.34	.38	.40	.38	.28	.30	.43
Partisan vs. no elections	on-partisan N =	.27 (279)	.25 (279)	.23 (279)	.25 (279)	.14 (43)	.40 (67)	. 27 (95)	01 (77)	.28

^{*} See Table 1 for the states comprising each region and the measures of each variable. Entries are product-moment correlates of the percentage of registrants voting with the two characteristics of political structure indicated. Entries under "Social Structure and Community Continuity" are partial correlations, controlling for each of the variables indicated. The direction of the correlation is indicated by the italicized word.

shows that the overall correlations of political structure and voting turnout remain while controlling for each demographic characteristic and the four regions, although the magnitudes change. (The single disappearance of the association occurs for form of election in the Far West; in that region only 6 or the 77 cities with nonconcurrent elections also had partisan elections.) We may summarize Table 2 simply by noting that both aspects of political structure—the form of government and the form of elections—are related to the proportions of registrants voting, even when important characteristics of social structure and region are held constant.

The correlations suggest that form of government has a stronger relationship to turnout than form of elections. In an attempt to assess this more adequately, Table 3 examines each structural variable, holding the other constant. Form of government does have a more significant relationship to turnout than form of election. The election of a mayor (which occurred in 77 percent of the mayor-council cities in the nonconcurrent elections covered by this study) may be a stronger motivating force in relation to turnout than the existence of the partisan ballot. The latter is much more ambiguous in terms of its practical meaning; a partisan ballot, as we have noted, may mask a wide range of party activity, ranging from the total absence of political party organization to total mobilization. Thus, it is not surprising that the more clear-cut variable demonstrates a clearer relationship.

These findings are consistent with those reported by Ruth Dixon, utilizing the same base data as in this study. Analyzing all cities, regardless of the concurrency of the election, she reported a correlation of —.48 between councilmanager form of government and percent of adults voting and —.38 between adult turnout

TABLE 3. THE CORRELATION OF REGISTRANTS VOTING WITH EACH ELEMENT OF POLITICAL STRUCTURE*

(Cities with Nonconcurrent Elections)

Characteristic	0012	ion within f Election	Correlation within Form of Government
	Partisan	Nonpartisan	Nonmanager	Manager
Nonmanager vs. manager form of government Partisan vs. nonpartisan	.45	.36		-
elections N =	 	(232)	.24 (103)	.11 (179)

^{*} Entries are product-moment correlates of the percentage of registrants voting with each aspect of political structure, controlling for the other. The direction of the correlation is indicated by the italicized word.

TABLE 4. CORRELATES OF REGISTRANTS VOTING AND SOCIAL STRUCTURE, CONTROLLING FOR POLITICAL STRUCTURE AND REGION*

(Cities with Nonconcurrent Local Elections)

		Correlati	on within
Charac-		m of nment		m of	Con	rrelation w	ithin R	egion	All
teristic	Non- man- ager	Man- ager	Par- tisan	Non- par- tisan	East	Midwest	South	Far West	Cities
Ethnicity Education N =	.38 23 (103)	.15 15 (179)	.26 43 (50)	.33 20 (232)	.29 32 (43)	.09 33 (67)	.21 19 (95)	06 03 (77)	.32 28 (282)

^{*} Entries are product-moment correlations of the actual percentages for each city. States comprising the regions are given in Table 1 with the measures of ethnicity and education.

and the nonpartisan ballot. Furthermore, in a multiple-correlation regression including eight political variables, form of government accounted for 22 percent of the variance in turnout, concurrency of election for an additional 11 percent, type of election for 3 percent and form of registration for 2 percent. The author notes Lord Bryce's suggestion that "the most important single factor in affecting turnout is the color and appeal of the candidates," and goes on to state that "the predictive power of these governmental variables is considerable in view of the multitude of factors that are brought into play in influencing citizens to vote." ²²⁴

Social Structures and Voting Turnout. Table 4 shows the correlates of measures of ethnicity and of educational level with the voting turnout of registered persons in cities with non-concurrent elections. Although several of the correlations are very weak, cities with more highly ethnic or less well-educated populations generally have higher levels of voting turnout, regardless of form of government and elections and in each of the four regions. (Again, the Far West does not have many cities with a highly "ethnic" population.)

In noting the relationship between ethnic populations and the existence of mayor-council form of government, Kessel had suggested that the foreign-born "would be especially dependent on political activity because of its exclusion from alternative agencies of community integration." Although our data are not strictly comparable, the parallel existence of a relationship between ethnicity and turnout would seem to support Kessel's assumptions.

However, the findings relating education to turnout appear to fly in the face of accepted conventional wisdom. If voting turnout reflects an "adding up" of the predispositions of individuals in cities to participate in politics, then we would expect that education would be closely correlated with voting turnout. This is not the case. Although not high, the ecological or aggregate correlation of registrants voting with education is the opposite of the well-known individual correlation.²⁶ (Use of other measures of education does not alter this generalization.)

Voting turnout (registrants voting) is thus inversely correlated with the educational level of a city. We conclude that high educational level of the city as a whole either has no effect or reduces the level of voting turnout. Although better-educated individuals may indeed vote more frequently than less-educated individuals, less well-educated communities vote more (or at least not less) than well-educated communities. We leave for further study the question of whether the relationship between education and voter turnout is curvilinear, a question ²⁶ It should be noted that while these correlations are based upon measures of education as a continuous variable, the measure itself is not continuous for a given city, but rather a single proportion of persons who have achieved a given level of education. See Robert R. Alford and Harry M. Scoble, "Sources of Local Political Involvement," this Review (forthcoming) for an analysis of the relative importance of a variety of factors, including education, for political involvement.

²⁴ Dixon, "The Reform Movement...," op. cit.

²⁵ Kessel, op. cit., p. 617.

TABLE 5. CORRELATES OF REGISTRANTS VOTING AND INDICATORS OF COMMUNITY CONTINUITY, CONTROLLING FOR POLITICAL STRUCTURE AND REGIONS*

		Correlation within Political Structure				Correlation within Region
Characteristic		Fori Govern		Form of Elections		East	Mid- west	South	Far West	All Cities
		Non- manager	Man- ager	Par- tisan	Nonpar- tisan
Mobility Age of City		23 .11	16 .24	41 .22	26 .24	49 .15	47 .18	03 .03	06 .34	32 .27
6	N =		(179)	(50)	(232)	(43)	(67)	(95)	(77)	(282)

^{*} Entries are product-moment correlations of the actual percentages for each city. States comprising the regions are given in Table 1 with the measures of mobility and city age. The direction of the correlation is in terms of the cge of the city; thus, the earlier the city reached 25,000 population, the higher the turnout.

unanswered by the existence of the single correlation. It may well be that turnout is lowest at either end of the aggregate educational scale but proportionally higher in communities falling between these two extremes.

Community Continuity and Voting Turnout. Table 5 shows the correlates of the age of the city and the geographic mobility of its population with voting turnout, holding form of political structure and region constant. The older the city and the less mobile its population, the lower the voting turncut, regardless of either form of government or form of election.

Mobility remains highly correlated with voting turnout in the East and Midwest, but drops to nothing in the South and Far West. The age of the city, however, is not correlated with voting turnout in any region except the Far West.

Such findings do not necessarily mean that these factors have no influence in those regions, but rather that we must reconceptualize their relationships to each other and to voting turnout. Community continuity does not appear to be a "factor" influencing voting turnout in the same way as contemporary features of the social and political structure of the city, but rather—we suggest—indicates a greater probability that stable communication networks linking social and political groups to political leaders in a community may have developed. Also, sets of norms encouraging political participation may have developed as a consequence of the existence of networks of access to and influence upon political leaders. These, in turn, may bear some relationship to voting turnout, but a relationship too complex to be revealed by the gross data here employed.

The above findings concerning the positive relationship of mobility and ethnicity and the negative relationship of education to voter turnout are corroborated in a separate study by Dixon. Using multiple-correlation regression involving clusters of related demographic factors, she concluded that "the single most important factor to be considered in predicting the voter turnout of a city is the residential mobility pattern of its inhabitants, which alone can account for 31 percent of the variability in turnout. Knowing the ethnic composition of the city increases the power of prediction an additional 19 percent . . . [while] the factors 'age composition,' 'social status' [which included education as a variable, 'employment stability' and 'city size' contribute little or no information about whether a city has high or low turnout in local election."27

Region. The regional location of a city is associated with a wide variety of political and social characteristics, as Table 6 shows, and many of these characteristics are also associated with voting turnout. Eastern cities are older, have more out-migration and little inmigration, and have more persons native of foreign-born parentage. In addition, they are more likely to have partisan elections and less likely to have the council-manager form of government. Western cities are at the other extreme in all of these characteristics. Thus, it is no surprise to find that important differences exist among regions with respect to voter turnout, as has been suggested in tables presented above. The distinction is most apparent in a ²⁷ Dixon, "Predicting Voter Turnout . . . ," op. cit., 50-52.

TABLE 6. CORRELATIONS OF REGIONAL LOCATION OF A CITY AND SELECTED CHARACTERISTICS RELATED TO VOTING TURNOUT*

		Reg	ion
Characteristic	East	Midwest	South	Far West
Political Structure			article consideration of the second consideration of the s Council-manager form vs. non-council-manager form	29	33	.23	.32
Nonpartisan vs. partisan	13	20	.13	.18
Social Structure
Ethnicity	. 56	.14	60	.06
Education	23	.03	21	.41
Community Continuity
Mobility	34	22	.17	.32
Age of City	.29	.12	10	26
Mean registrants voting	64%	48%	43%	41%
Mean adults voting	49%	37%	23%	30%
N ==	(43)	(67)	(95)	(77)

^{*} Note that the table does not present correlates relating the characteristics to turnout, but shows the relationship of the characteristics to region. Entries are product-moment correlations of each variable listed with the regional location of a city, treated for computation purposes as four different dummy variables. Thus, "East"-"Not East" is a "variable" for purposes of computation of the correlations. See Table 1 for the states comprising the regions and the measures. The total number of cases is 282 comparison of Eastern and Far Western cities. Eastern location is positively correlated with all the variables associated with high turnout. Eastern cities have a mean turnout figure of 64.0 percent, compared to but 41.2 percent in the Far West. Nevertheless, the table also reveals once again the difficulty of dealing theoretically and analytically with region as an independent variable. Since we are unable to control for other than a very limited number of these variations, we only note the regional characteristics but offer little by way of explanation other than our previous reference to the possible existence of such factors as political tradition and culture.

Socio-Political Structures, Historical Continuity, Region and Voting Turnout. In the pages above, relationships of varying strength have been noted between form of government, form of elections, ethnicity, education, and mobility and voting turnout. Age of city was seen to have little relationship independent of other characteristics, while region did seem associated with turnout but presented both theoretical and analytical problems which could not be resolved by the data here available. In the tables to follow, we review some of the above findings by the use of other data, in this case the mean turnout in various categories and sub-categories of cities. (The substitution of median for mean does not alter the results; the two have a correlation of .97.) The demographic variables previously utilized are dichotomized above and below the median value for all cities in the United States, in order to develop a primitive typology of cities along the dimensions we have distinguished.

In Table 7, the average voting turnout is shown for cities classified simultaneously by form of government, form of elections, and the four demographic variables. In every comparison, the relationships appear as predicted. Holding all other variables constant, both partisan elections and non-manager (typically mayor-council) government show a higher turnout than nonpartisan elections and manager government. Similarly, again paralleling the results indicated above, the average turnout among cities with high ethnicity, low education and low mobility is higher (with one minor exception) than among cities with reverse characteristics. Older cities, regardless of their form of government or election, are more likely to have higher voting turnout than younger cities, although the mean differences are not as great as for the political structural characteristics.

Table 8 presents average turnout data by form of government and form of elections, classified according to region. As indicated

TABLE 7. MEAN PERCENT OF REGISTRANTS VOTING, BY SOCIAL STRUCTURE AND POLITICAL STRUCTURE*

(Cities with Nonconcurrent Local Elections) % and (N) ]	Partisan		No	npartisa n			All Cities	•

Characteristic	Non- manager	Menager	AII	Non- manager	Manager	All	Non- manager	Manager	A11
Ethnicity High	65 (19)	45 (9)	58 (23)	58 (44)	42 (57)	49 (101)	60 (63)	42 (66)	51 (129)
Low	62 (15)	49 (7)	58 (22)	48 (25)	40 (106)	41 (131)	53 (40)	40 (113)	44 (153)
Education High	59 (10)	45 (10)	52 (20)	53 (42)	39 (110)	43 (152)	54 (52)	39 (120)	44 (172)
Low	66 (24)	50 (6)	62 (30)	57 (27)	44 (53)	48 (80)	61 (51)	44 (59)	52 (110)
Mobility High	60 (10)	40 (10)	50 (20)	52 (26)	39 (122)	41 (148)	54 (36)	39 (132)	42 (168)
Low	65 (24)	58 (6)	64 (30)	56 (43)	44 (41)	50 (84)	59 (67)	46 (47)	54 (114)
Age of City Old	66 (21)	47 (10)	60 (31)	57 (41)	43 (63)	49 (104)	60 (62)	44 (73)	51 (135)
Youn	g 60 (13)	45 (6)	55 (19)	51 (28)	38 (100)	41 (128)	54 (41)	39 (106)	43 (147)
All Cities	64 (34)	47 (16)	58 (50)	55 (69)	40 (163)	44 (232)	57 (103)	41 (179)	282

^{* 1. &}quot;Low ethnicity" means that there were less than 15 percent of persons in the city native of foreign-born or mixed parentage in 1960. "High ethnicity" more than 15 percent. This figure is the median for all 676 cities in the United States over 25,000 population in 1960.

above, region is itself related to various demographic characteristics themselves associated with turnout; multivariate analysis is thus handicapped by the small size of the frequencies in many of the sub-categories. Again, partisan non-manager cities tend to command a larger turnout than non-partisan and manager cities. However, the impact of other variables hidden under the "region" label is similarly inindicated. In the East, for example, the average turnout in nonpartisan non-manager cities is higher than in partisan mayor-council cities. Whether this reflects the impact of form of government—for example, the possibility that the office of mayor "means" more in the East than in other parts of the country—or the association of these cities with demographic variables associated with turnout, or a number of other possibilities, cannot be determined with any degree of confidence from these data. Similarly, in the Far West, average turnout in nonpartisan-manager cities is the same as that in the very small number of partisan-manager cities, in contrast to the general pattern. Here, the ambiguous nature of "partisan" as well as "region" is evidenced, as well as the difficulty of generalizing from the very small number of deviant cases. It may well be that partisanship is lacking in those few Western cities, ballot form notwithstanding, that there is a "spill-

TABLE 8. MEAN PERCENT OF REGISTRANTS VOTING, BY REGION AND POLITICAL STRUCTURE*
(Cities with Nonconcurrent Elections) % and (N)

Region		Partisan			Nonpart	isan	All Cities
	Non- manager	Man- ager	All	Non- manager	Man- ager	All	Non- manager	Man- ager	All
East	66 (11)	— (1)	67 (12)	69 (19)	54 (12)	63 (31)	68 (30)	56 (13)	64 (43)
Midwest	61 (16)	53 (5)	59 (21)	49 (28)	35 (18)	43 (46)	53 (44)	39 (23)	48 (67)
Far West	(1)	39 (5)	40 (6)	56 (7)	40 (64)	41 (71)	55 (8)	40 (69)	41 (77)
South	69 (6)	43 (5)	57 (11)	47 (15)	40 (69)	41 (84)	53 (21)	40 (74)	43 (95)
Total	64 (34)	47 (16)	58 (50)	55 (69)	40 (163)	44 (232)	57 (103)	41 (179)	47 (282)

^{*} See Table 1 for states comprising the regions.

^{2.} Educational level was dichotomized, with "Low education" comprising cities which had 43 percent or less persons 25 years or more who had completed high school in 1960.

^{3.} Mobility was dichotomized with "Low mobility" comprising cities which had 15 percent or less persons 5 years and over who were migrant from a different county between 1955 and 1960, "high mobility" those cities with more than 15 percent migration.

^{4.} Cities which reached 25,000 population by the census of 1930 are classified as "Older," those in the censuses of 1940 to 1960 as "Younger."

TABLE 9. MEAN PERCENT OF REGISTRANTS VOTING, BY REGION AND SOCIAL STRUCTURE*

(Cities with Nonconcurrent Elections) % and (N)

Region	Ethn	icity	Educ	ation	Mob	ilit y	Age of	City	All Cities
Region	High	Low	High	Low	High	Low	Old	Young
East	64 (41)	(2)	56 (17)	69 (26)	52 (9)	67 (34)	66 (31)	60 (12)	64 (43)
Midwest	48 (40)	49 (27)	45 (41)	53 (26)	41 (25)	53 (42)	52 (39)	43 (28)	48 (67)
South	53 (10)	42 (85)	41 (45)	45 (50)	43 (70)	43 (25)	42 (45)	43 (50)	43 (95)
West	40 (38)	43 (39)	41 (69)	39 (8)	41 (64)	41 (13)	48 (20)	39 (57)	41 (77)
Total	51 (129)	44 (153)	44 (172)	52 (110)	42 (168)	54 (114)	51 (135)	43 (147)	47 (282)

^{*} See Table 7 for explanation of demographic categories, Table 1 for stages comprising the regions and the other measures.

over" effect from the prevailing nonpartisan policy of the area. Again, the data utilized here do not permit an evaluation of these important distinctions.

In Table 9, demographic and regional variables are examined simultaneously. Again, the mean turnout figures reported for the nation as a whole are consistent with the findings already noted: older cities with high ethnicity, low education, and low mobility show higher turnout than cities with the opposite characteristics. However, the relationships are reduced sharply and sometimes reversed when region is controlled. The tendency of Eastern cities to have a higher turnout, even when demographic characteristics are held constant, suggests again that the history and traditions of a region, its political culture, in short, may be as important variables as those which we have been able to utilize in this exercise. Our gross data do not allow a more extensive exploration of the links between the political and social structure of cities and their origins and development within a particular region.

In sum, the tables utilizing mean turnout data are generally consistent with the findings based on correlations. The fact that these two approaches yield much the same results gives confidence in our conclusion that, regardless of the vulnerability of the data and the generally modest nature of the relationships, there is an association between voter turnout and the variables utilized. Cities with partisan elections. mayor-council (or nonmanager) government, high ethnicity, low education, low mobility, and Eastern location tend to have a higher voting turnout than cities with nonpartisan elections, council-manager government, low ethnicity, high education, high mobility and Far Western location.

III. CONCLUSIONS

Voting turnout is generally higher in cities with either or both "unreformed" political structures and more explicit class or ethnic cleavages. Voting turnout is higher, not lower. in cities with less well educated populations, perhaps because in those cities political cleavages based on economic interests are more explicit and visible than in middle-class suburbs or other communities likely to have high proportions of college-educated persons. Cities with more stable populations also have higher levels of voting turnout, possible because of the greater likelihood of integration of the different elements of social and political structure. Whether or not there are direct links of community continuity—as represented by population stability—and stages of development to accessible and responsive political structures and to the existence and organization of social cleavages is a question we cannot answer from our own data. However, some evidence on the matter of integration can be inferred from a recent study.

Lineberry and Fowler found that cities with "reformed" political structures were less likely to be responsive to cleavages in their population than unreformed cities. Specifically, they found that there were higher correlations of ethnicity and religion (as measured indirectly by private school attendance) with taxation and expenditures in cities with the mayorcouncil form of government and partisan or ward elections. They suggest that reformed cities have "removed" the influence of party as a mechanism for aggregating interests, and therefore they expected that the "effects" of social composition would be seen more clearly in unreformed cities. In brief, they suggest that the political structures of unreformed cities are likely to be more integrated with their social structures than those of reformed cities and that "the electoral institutions of reformed governments make public policy less responsive to the demands arising out of social conflicts in the population."28 The fact that voting turnout tends to relate independently and positively both to "unreformed" political institutions and to characteristics of community clevage is consistent with Lineberry and Fowler's conclusions.

²⁸ Lineberry and Fowler, op. cit., p. 716.

With respect to partisanship, it comes as no surprise to find that in the absence of the political party label on the ballot and the assumed reduced likelihood of party organization and activity, voter turnout is generally less. Although there are many advocates of nonpartisanship who would espouse the thesis that local citizen participation should be just as great without the "artificial" injection of partisan politics, the fact remains that the party remains an agent of political mobilization, both symbolically and practically. To some, this is unfortunate. Richard Childs, perhaps the leading exponent of nonpartisanship and one of its "founding fathers" takes the view that "In partisan local elections, two prominent national party organizations consider it their noble duty to combat the other organization, disparage its achievements, advance rival candidates, and the 'outs' consider it necessary to oust the 'ins,' no matter how good a record the 'ins' may have been making. No matter how meaningless the contest for office may be in a given year, both forces must be marshalled for a fight. But what good is that, even if it does bring out a high percentage of the adult population to the polls?"29

Regardless of the various merits of non-partisan elections, and there are many,³⁰ Childs' view overlooks the fact that elections and participation in the electoral process are not just a means to an end—the election of qualified citizens to public office—but an end in themselves. In fact, one may well ask in 1968 whether a high rate of participation in local elections and the possible reduction of a sense of alienation of many citizens from their community would not more than offset the possible loss of an outstanding candidate.

Insofar as relatively greater turnout in nonmanager cities is concerned, both the theoretical and analytical questions are more elusive. The separate election of the mayor would seem to be the prime factor distinguishing manager and mayor-council cities (although there are some manager cities with a separately elected mayor and some mayor-council cities with an appointed mayor). Yet mayors have a wide range of roles in American cities, ranging from figure-head to strong executive; it would seem that these varying roles and the public's response to them would bear a direct relation to voter interest and turnout, but our data provide no assistance to assess such relationships. Nor do we have data, other than these gross turnout figures, to assess the importance of a separately elected chief executive to the community. Does the existence of an election for mayor serve to increase a citizen's attachment to and interest in the political life of the community? Does the personalization of politics around a contest between two individuals, so familiar at the state and national levels, serve in some sense as a bridge between the citizen and his government? We can only hint at the host of the social-psychological questions which the existence or non-existence of a contest for mayor may suggest.

An alternative, but not mutually exclusive, explanation is that electoral politics is simply regarded as less important in council-manager cities than in nonmanager communities. Council-manager theory notwithstanding, it may well be that the citizen feels that the manager has, in fact, reduced the scope of authority and responsibility of the city's elected officials. The manager hires and fires the department heads; the manager submits the budget and, in so doing, resolves many of the basic resource allocation policies before the council ever sees the document. Such matters may well fall on the administration side of the ancient administration-policy dichotomy, but they represent in many citizens' minds the stuff of city government and politics. Their removal, rightly or wrongly, from the overt political scene may be one explanation of the apparent relationship of the council-manager form to lower voter turnout. In a similar fashion, it could well be that the result of the manager plan and an effective manager is to so "manage" conflict and issues that they do not become political and, eventually, electoral issues. A resulting depressant effect on voter attention and participation would be a likely by-product.

In general, relatively high levels of voting turnout are probably the result of the combined influences of sustained and continuous political organization of parties, wards, neighborhoods, voluntary associations with local political concerns, and simply traditional behavior by social groups which does not require the mobilizing influence of political organization. Where there is high turnout without high activity of parties and interest groups, votes may be "available" for manipulation by political elites, because in such cities individuals vote because of their party identification and not their involvement in political organizations. Where there is a high level of activity of political organizations without high turnout, on the other hand, we might expect that the lack of electoral sanctions would result in a high level of competition and conflict between the relatively better-educated leaders of the active organizations.

²⁹ Letter to one of the authors dated January 29, 1964.

³⁰ Lee, The Politics of Nonpartisanship, op. cit., Chapter 11.

Paradoxically, voting turnout may not necessarily be a good index of the politicization of the electorate. Voting may be a form of traditional behavior produced by membership in ethnic and other groups which have a certain party identification as part of their group identity. In such cases, a high vote turnout need not mean high issue consciousness or a high level of political conflict. Conversely, voting turnout may be low without denying the possibility of a high level of conflict and concern with issues among the minority of voters who have a high level of political interest.

Thus, it is possible that a high level of action on such policies as urban renewal and poverty programs may be found in cities with low conflict and issue-concern but high voting turnout, precisely because votes can be delivered by political leaders, and bargains and negotiations between local leaders and state and national leaders are possible. A highly active community may have so much conflict that activity leads to stalemate, because leaders are not able to mobilize clear majorities or count on the passive acquiescence of majorities. This argument is consistent with that of Crain and Rosenthal concerning the impact of high levels of education upon participation, conflict and stalemate in fluoridation and other decisions. Although they noted exceptions at the highest educational level, they argued that high-status cities, precisely because they have citizens ready and able to participate in politics, will be less likely to be able to innovate new community programs and less able to make decisions because of higher levels of conflict which lead to stalemate.31 The authors examined data on various types of community decisions—urban renewal, fluoridation, school desegregation, and others-which are related to the educational level of the population in the cities, and found that by and large the cities with bettereducated populations have been less likely to undertake such programs.

Unfortunately, they did not have data on the key intervening variable in their theoretical proposition: political participation. Our data indicate that, in fact, cities with higher levels of education among the population are less likely to have high voting turnout than cities with low levels of education. This finding casts doubt upon the plausible assumption that political participation at the level of the city as a whole has the same relationship to education that it does at the individual level. But if, in fact, there is less political participation in cities with high levels of education, this explanation of differences in decision-making processes cannot rest upon a presumed correlation between education and participation.

As suggested, the answer may partly rest on the possibility that voting turnout may be a poor indicator of other forms of the political activity of groups in cities. Groups composed of better-educated persons may have other channels through which to influence policy than mere voting turnout. Effective political participation by such groups might tend to resolve issues before they become relevant to a campaign and election. In any event, our findings about relatively low turnout in bettereducated cities do at least raise questions about the assumption that correlations at the individual level can be casually extended to the level of community social organization. Crain and Rosenthal make the same methodological point in a different substantive context, suggesting that the greater likelihood of better-educated persons to accept innovation may not be true when the same factors are measured at the community "ecological" level.32

An investigation of the individual correlations of education and political participation in cities with different demographic and economic characteristics is clearly called for. It may well be true—and we suspect—that in all cities, the better educated are more likely to vote than the less well-educated, despite the higher overall levels of voting turnout in less well-educated cities. In high turnout cities, for example, the better-educated stratum in those cities may respond to the political mobili ization of the ethnic less-educated majorities by even higher political participation than the majority social groups themselves exhibit. Nor would one expect that in middle-class, bettereducated, Far West cities with low vote turnout, there would necessarily be any counterresponse by the less well-educated elements in those cities to participate at higher levels. The very fact of the recent migration of less well-educated persons to Western cities should serve to break their ties to the local ethnic neighborhood organizations or other community groups which sustained high voting participation in the Eastern cities from which they came. Thus, a plausible case can be made for expecting the "normal" pattern of individual correlation between education and political participation in both types of cities. It would be possible to compute possible ranges of variations of the individual-level correlations, given certain marginal distributions of educational composition and voting turnout levels in cities, but that problem is beyond our present scope.

³¹ Crain and Rosenthal, op. cit., 970-984.

A final word on the implications of our data for the controversy over local political subcultures. The operations and functions of a political "ethos" or political culture at the local level may be best understood through a historical perspective of the continuity of social and political structures and the norms of behavior which they enforce, rather than through the current attitudes of social groups in a community. We have noted the difference in direction of the correlation between education and voting turncut at the city and individual levels. This may indicate that the consequences of structural features of a political system, derived in turn from its history, may be visible in collective patterns of political behavior, such as partisan strength, levels of voting turnout, or referenda outcomes, but not at all visible in correlations of political attitudes with individual characteristics.

Banfield and Wilson's original article33 used ecological data on ethnic and class composition of tracts, in relation to referenda voting, which we would regard as appropriate kinds of data for inferences to collective processes, but their theoretical framework was based upon assumptions about individual behavior, not necessary to and even possibly misleading about the actual causal processes involved. Wolfinger and Field questioned that certain ethnic groups hold "private-regarding" or "public-regarding" values, and therefore favor certain political structures in their community. They noted that when region was controlled, the correlations between ethnicity and various aspects of political structure and governmental functions presumed to be precicted by the "ethos" hypothesis vanished. And they suggested that regional variations in the age of cities may explain more than the "ethos" of groups residing in cities. As they put it, "regional variations may reflect to some extent interaction between cities' natural histories and prevailing political enthusiasms at crucial periods in those histories."34 Our data indicating significant regional differences, particularly the tendency of Eastern cities to have relatively high voting turnout regardless of form of government. method of balloting and social characteristics is consistent with this view. Whereas region may not be a useful analytical tool, as such, the variations among regions suggest the need to introduce into the conceptual framework and research design a recognition of such phenomena as Wolfinger and Field describe.

⁸³ James Q. Wilson and Edward C. Banfield, "Public-Regardingness as a Value Premise in Voting Behavior," this Review, 58 (December, 1964), 876-887.

The regional or even the state location of a city may not be sufficient to identify its political culture accurately. Samuel C. Patterson has recently suggested that while there may be interstate variations in basic political orientations, there are also important variations within states. A few studies have analyzed this topic.³⁵

We have suggested that there is likely to be variation in community political systems linked to the regional location of the city, its age, and the extent of out-migration or inmigration. Sheer length of existence, as well as the proportion of the population which has lived in the city for a long or a short time, would seem to be plausibly related to the degree to which there is historical continuity of leadership patterns and policy-making patterns in a city. Again, these are indirect indicators, because, for example, some cities may have experienced what amounts to a revolution in leadership continuity in certain periods of their history. But we hypothesize that our indicators would correlate with more direct measures of continuity of leadership and policymaking.

³⁴ Raymond E. Wolfinger and John Osgood Field, "Political Ethos and the Structure of City Government," this Review, 60 (June, 1966), p. 326. While we take full note of the Wolfinger-Field vs. Banfield-Wilson controversy as to the use and abuse of "ethos," we make no attempt here to enter into their discussion as to what the latter pair said or implied in City Politics. The issue is discussed in letters to the editor of each pair in the December, 1966, issue of this Review. See "Communications," 998–1000.

³⁵ Samuel C. Patterson, "The Political Cultures of the American States," The Journal of Politics, 30 (February, 1968), 204–207; Alford, with the collaboration of Harry M. Scoble, op. cit., and Oliver P. Williams and Charles R. Adrian, Four Cities (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 1963).

Over a period of years, we suggest, communication networks between social groups and political leaders develop which have some continuity, although incumbents may change.

Political roles and institutionalized locations for those roles develop which are linked to the historical success of certain groups in winning electoral victories or exerting informal influence over policy-making processes. High voting turnout may be one consequence of the development over time of these links of social groups to political organization.

SOVIET ELECTIONS AS A MEASURE OF DISSENT: THE MISSING ONE PERCENT*

JEROME M. GILISON
The Johns Hopkins University

A few questions are still hotly debated among students of the Soviet political system, but certainly the nature of Soviet elections is not one of them. Everyone agrees that they are more interesting as a psychological curiosity than as a political reality. They are seen by various writers as ritualized affirmations of regime legitimacy, as methods of involving the masses in supportive activity, as a means of publicly honoring model citizens, and as a crushing display of unanimity designed to isolate the potential nonconformist. Both Western and Soviet writers see Soviet elections from the positive side, from the side of the dutiful 99 percent who invariably vote for the single candidate on the ballot.

In fact, Soviet and Western writers are in very close agreement on the major functions of elections in the Soviet Union, although their value judgments tend to differ along the lines one would expect. Taking one typical example from the general Western literature on the Soviet political system, we find the purposes of a Soviet election defined as "a public demonstration of the legitimacy of the regime . . . an invaluable educational and propaganda exercise . . . and perhaps most important of all, ... proof that the system of control is unimpaired." In the more detailed Western works on Soviet elections we find the same approach. Thus, Howard Swearer, in a very insightful and valuable article on Soviet local elections, states that "in the Soviet Union, the formal act of voting is comparable in purpose to such civic rituals as singing the national anthem or saluting a country's flag. It is a public display of personal reaffirmation of the Soviet way of life and the party leadership."2 Swearer further suggests that the function of Soviet elections "is not only to legitimize the leadership in the

* The author would like to express his gratitude to Professors Milton C. Cummings and Howard Egeth of The Johns Hopkins University for their invaluable help during the preparation of this article, and to The Johns Hopkins University for providing a summer research grant.

¹ Leonard Schapirc, The Government and Politics of the Soviet Union, rev. ed. (New York: Vintage Books, 1967), p. 108.

² Howard R. Swearer, "The Functions of Soviet Local Elections," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 5 (May, 1961), p. 149. mass mind and to help identify the people with its policies, but also to reassure the leadership itself of its popularity and infallibility."3 In a similar vein, Richard M. Scammon, after personally observing a Soviet election, reported that Soviet elections reflect "the need felt by every regime (even a one-party regime) for popular endorsement and consent to its program, no matter how unreal the conditions under which that endorsement be produced."4 Max E. Mote, after studying an election in Leningrad at close hand, suggests that the very idea of an election as a choice between alternatives is not comprehended by the average Soviet citizen, who thinks of voting as "both a patriotic and a social activity, invested with the diverse pleasures which most people derive from performing a commendable action."5 Soviet writers agree with the Western analysis of Soviet elections as essentially positive. participatory, legitimizing, demonstrative, educational and patriotic. One of them writes: "Our elections are not simply acts of selecting people's representatives for the organs of state power. They are a most important form of participation of the masses in the implementation of state power, and of their education and organization in the struggle for sociallism and communism."6 Generally, Soviet commentators see elections as expressions of the pervading unity of Soviet society, a condition brought about by the absence of class conflict. The fact that only one candidate is nominated for each elected position is explained in terms of this assumed underlying unanimity of the Soviet "working masses." Michael Kalinin, titular head of state during Stalin's reign, remarked that the single candidate is "a feature of socialism, a sign that

- ³ Ibid., p. 144.
- ⁴ Richard M. Scammon, "Why the Russians Bother With Elections," The New York Times Magazine, April 6, 1958, p. 63.
- ⁵ Max E. Mote, Soviet Local and Republic Elections, Hoover Institution Studies No. 10 (Stanford, Cal.: Hoover Institution, 1965), p. 77. See also George Barr Carson, Electoral Practices in the U.S.S.R. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1955), pp. 99-100.
- ⁶ A. I. Kim, Sovetskoe izbirateľ noe pravo (Moscow, 1965), p. 7.

amongst the working masses there is not and cannot be any internal disagreements such as is found within bourgeois society."

Thus on both sides of the political fence that used to be an iron curtain, observers have fixed their glance firmly on the positive role of Soviet elections as massive demonstrations of ritualized affirmation. Ninety-nine percent support is indeed a dazzling achievement in an age when many governments achieve power without even receiving the votes of a majority of the registered electorate—and some achieve power without even receiving a majority of the votes cast. It would be difficult to quarrel with the prevailing view of Soviet elections in regard to the functions they perform for the ninety-nine percent. But what of the others? Every year in which elections are held (actually three out of every four years), approximately two million votes are cast against the official candidates, under an electoral procedure which, as we shall see, makes this act difficult, at least potentially disadvantageous, and largely ineffectual. All the positive functions described by Soviet and Western observers have no meaning when discussing these nonconformists. These people have apparently taken the word "election" literally, and have made the only choice Soviet procedure allows.8

It is therefore useful to consider whether Soviet elections may be studied as elections are studied in other countries where two or more candidates are usually nominated for each elected position. Such a study could be made if the following conditions do in fact exist:

- 1) If the Soviet electoral procedure, while heavily biased toward achieving affirmative unanimity, does permit the possibility of registering dissent, and the possibility of avoiding consequent sanctions against the dissenter.
- If reasonably detailed and comprehensive data are available.
- 3) If the data are accurately and honestly compiled, or if the falsification and inaccuracy are randomly or evenly distributed.

It is obvious that under present conditions, Soviet electoral results cannot be considered an accurate reflection of the true state of Soviet public opinion. A heavy bias in favor of the regime is introduced by the well-established system of pressures, controls and propaganda, and until this system is dismantled the relationship between Soviet voting and Soviet

- ⁷ As quoted in P. V. Tumanov, Poriadok organizatsii i provedeniia vyborov v Verkhovnyi Sovet SSSR (Moscow, 1958), p. 23.
- ⁸ The Russian word for elections, vybory, literally means choices, selections, alternatives.

public opinion will remain an enigma. This does not mean, however, that there is nothing to be gained by studying Soviet electoral statistics. If the study is restricted to a systematic comparison of groups, areas and periods in the Soviet system, the environment of pressures—which produces the ninety-nine percent—can be considered either-a constant or a random variable, and the variations in results can be analyzed for clues to the location and relative incidence of dissent to be found in the Soviet Union. For comparisons, we require only the three conditions mentioned.

There can be no doubt that the first precondition does exist in the Soviet Union. Curiously enough, Soviet electoral law is written as though the drafters expected contested elections.9 The present statute governing election of deputies to the USSR Supreme Soviet states that "the voter, in the place set aside for filling out the ballot, leaves on each ballot the name of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote, and crosses out the names of the others."10 In actual practice, of course, only one name appears on each ballot, the name of the candidate representing the "people's bloc of Communists and non-party members." The voter can cast his ballot for the "bloc" candidate by simply folding and depositing his ballot in the appropriate receptacle. In order to vote against the candidate, he must repair to a booth or room, provided by law to ensure "secret" balloting, and cross out the name of the candidate. Since this act invites attention, the Soviet voter's reluctance to take the legal guarantee of secret ballot seriously is quite understandable. Nevertheless, the possibility remains that he will take the risk or will mark the ballot surreptitiously. Many Soviet voters, wishing to demonstrate their superpatriotism, take pen in hand and write patriotic slogans on the ballot, and this practice could distract attention from the occasional dissenter who crosses out the approved name while proceeding to the ballot box.11 Regardless

- ⁹ This may have been the case. See Carson, op. cit., p. 52.
- ¹⁰ Polozhenie o vyborax v Verkhovnyi Sovet SSSR, as amended to March 19, 1966 (Moscow, 1966), p. 23. In this and other cited respects, this statute is typical of all statutes regulating elections to the various levels of soviets.
- ¹¹ In this connection Carson remarks: "Considering the character of the soviet election campaign—the voter's opportunity to stand in public and be counted on the right side—secrecy presents curious problems. The voter has an interest in breaking the secrecy so it will be known that he voted correctly.... Many a voter, thereof the technique used, the fact that it is possible both to cast a negative vote and to escape serious sanctions is emply evidenced by Soviet statistics. Since approximately two million negative votes are past year after year, and since many of these votes must be cast by the same people who have become habitual dissenters, it follows that the act of voting "no" does not bring about sufficient sanctions to cow a rather large number of brave Soviet souls. Indeed, the futility of the act, rather than the danger, might very well be the major deterrent for many potential dissenters who follow the crowd without enthusiasm, and are counted in the ninety-nine percent.

The second precondition, the availability of detailed and comprehensive data, places some limitations on any examination of Soviet elections, but does not eliminate the possibility of making such a study. In the Soviet Union, publication of data is a "sometime thing," sometimes remarkably consistent, sometimes exasperatingly incomplete. The best data, including not only percentages but also absolute numbers of voters, are published for the elections to the local soviets, which occur every even-numbered year. These data are the most detailed, and therefore the most useful for the purpose of comparison.

The existence of the third precondition, honesty and accuracy in compiling electoral results by Soviet officials, is not so easily determined. We know that the electoral laws have been amended to provide heavy criminal penalties for "a responsible person or member of the electoral commission who commits a forgery of the electoral documents or deliberately miscounts votes or violates the secrecy of balloting,"14 but we cannot be sure that such strictures are always observed. A further check on possible corruption is provided by the electoral laws in the provision that "certified representatives of public organizations and workers' associations, and representatives of the press have the right to be present during the counting of ballots."15 Lecnard Schapiro's evaluation of these safeguards is that "it is less likely now than in the past that blatant electoral fraud fore, took the precaution . . . of writing in his name and address on his ballot." Op. cit., p. 75.

could be practiced in the presence of so many witnesses,"16 and one would have to agree that the presence of witnesses from outside organizations makes obvious fraud rather unlikely. But if one is disinclined to accept the reality of these formal safeguards from a system notoriously contemptuous of formal rules, there is another argument which seems more convincing: the environment of pressures is so effective that the desired result—a rousing affirmative vote of over 99 percent—could be achieved without recourse to such dirty business as falsifying election returns. Furthermore, in those relatively few cases where the local candidate is very unpopular, it is probably more advantageous for the regime to permit his defeat than to falsify his victory, since it is quite simple to find a more suitable candidate for the required second election in that district. In a system so heavily biased in its favor, the regime can well afford to "let the chips fall where they may," especially since this attitude may provide the leadership with a useful source of information on the location of dissent and the efficiency of local party and government organizations.

It should be emphasized, however, that we don't require a perfect record of honesty and accuracy of the Soviet Electoral Commissions. Our requirements in this regard are reduced by the fact that in dealing with Soviet electoral data we do not have merely a small sample of the voting population, we have in effect the entire population. This means that we can afford to be tolerant of isolated incidents of fudgery and forgery. In addition, since we will deal only with comparisons of data within the system, we can permit uniformly distributed falsification of even major proportions, such as would be produced if every affirmative vote across the country were raised by five percent. Thus our modest requirements, in combination with the Soviet leadership's need for accurate feedback information and the legal safeguards provided by the electoral statutes, permit a certain degree of confidence in asserting that our requirements have been met.

I. THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF SOVIET ELECTIONS

Soviet voters cast ballots for delegates ("deputies") to the soviets (councils) established on all levels of governmental administration. From the spontaneous and often riotous gatherings that the soviets were during the revolutionary year of 1917, they have become docile tools of the party-state leadership, although with increasing administrative re-

¹² It should be kept in mind that each Soviet voter casts several ballots—as many as seven—so that the two million negative votes represents perhaps on the order of 500,000 to 700,000 dissenters.

¹³ So-called local elections are those held for all levels below the level of republic.

¹⁴ Vedomosti Verkhovnogo Soveta SSSR, 1088 (December 27, 1961).

¹⁵ Polozhenie . . . , p. 25.

¹⁶ Schapiro, op, cit., p. 107.

sponsibilities involving limited discretionary powers. Nominations of candidates for the soviets are endorsed by open meetings of various public and work organizations, but it is no secret that these nominations are actually decided by the party nucleus in prior, closed meetings. Nomination for candidature is considered a reward for model behavior and outstanding achievement in work, and these are the criteria apparently used in making the selection. Indeed, in the few cases reported in which the pre-selected nominee was rejected by the open meeting of the collective, the major difficulty seems to have been that the party nucleus had chosen someone who did not possess sufficient Soviet virtue.17 Because the nucleus takes some considerable care in selecting fitting objects for public approbation, the nomination procedure at open meetings tends to be pro forma.18 It would seem that most Soviet citizens have accepted the idea of nomination as reward for virtue rather than as the first step in a competitive selection process. Max E. Mote reports that a typical Soviet response to the question of why only one candidate is advanced would be: "You see, it would indicate a lack of confidence in the candidate if you were to nominate two men for the same post. It would mean you think one of them is not good enough for the office. We don't want to insult our candidates."19

After nominations are completed, a "campaign" of about six weeks ensues, with daily press coverage in the form of biographical sketches of the candidates, reports on the progress of organizing electoral commissions and of establishing agitation centers (agitpunkty). Press coverage is generally more complete and intensive during elections for soviets at the all-union level (USSR Supreme Soviet) and republic level (Supreme Soviets of the republics) than it is for local elections, in which there are thousands upon thousands of candidates. Nevertheless, even during local elections, many a homely, honest and happy face appears under the heading, "Candidates of the People."

The scope of Soviet organization for elections is truly impressive. This is certainly one area where the system demonstrates its great ability to mobilize large numbers of people to accomplish a short-term, and clearly defined task. Before the "campaign" reaches its closing hours, a significant proportion of the electorate becomes involved in one or another of the many electoral organizations. (In 1967, one out of every 16 qualified voters in the U.S.S.R. was involved in the work of the electoral commissions alone.20). The Soviet electorate is divided into precincts (izbiratel'nye uchastki) and constituencies (izbiratel'nye okruga), the former being temporary units for the counting of ballots, and the latter being actual units of representation in the various types of soviets. There is virtually no escape from the all-embracing organization of the precincts. They are established on board ships with 20 or more voters, in hospitals, rest homes and sanatoria. in railroad stations, airports and on board long-distance trains-in fact, wherever human life is to be found within the borders of the U.S.S.R.²¹ The invalid is visited in his home by a representative of the local electoral commission, accompanied by a portable ballot box; the isolated weather-observation team sends its votes from the northern frozen wastelands by radio. The network is so all-inclusive and so carefully articulated that it is virtually impossible to avoid voting-in fact, it is probably easier to vote against the nominated candidate than it is to escape the grasp of the local precinct organization and abstain. In this regard, as in so many others, the system demands active involvement, participation that gives visible evidence of one's loyalty. From this point of view, inaction, purposeful non-involvement, is just as despicable as negative action.

The regime attempts to make each election a plebiscite, in which the sole issue, as George Barr Carson puts it, is "support or non-support on a question which no one publicly dares reject—do you favor the soviet system?"22 The front page of all newspapers on election day is decorated with a standardized drawing of stalwart voters ready to deposit ballots marked "For Communism." Press reports of interviews with voters invariably yield such remarks as: "I voted for the candidates so that our splendid Motherland would develop even further, and the cause of peace would win," or "I voted for peace and the flowering of our great Soviet Motherland."23 Thus the vast array of propaganda media attempts to bend

¹⁷ For example, a milling machine operator in Ivanovo was turned down by the collective of the measuring instruments factory because he "didn't share his experience with other workers," and another worker in another locale was refused nomination because of "an incorrect attitude toward criticism." See M. Tarasov, "K itogam vyborov v mestnye sovety," Partiinaia zhizn', No. 5, 1957.

¹⁸ See Mote, op. cit., p. 35, for a description based upon personal observation.

¹⁹ Ibid., p. 29.

²⁰ From data in Pravda, March 26, 1967.

²¹ See Polozhenie . . . , p. 10.

²² Carson, op. cit., p. 66.

²³ Turkmenskaia iskra, March 16, 1965.

the attention of the voter away from local issues—and real potential grievances—and toward the ultimate question of loyalty to the regime and "Soviet patriotism." In other words, the regime attempts to remove issues from the elections entirely. This is done not only by a propaganda campaign and by choosing model, "non-controversial" candidates, but also by a positive attempt to satisfy local grievances in advance of election day. Thousands of "agitators" are sent out to explain the causes of past deficiencies, laud past accomplishments and promise all sorts of future improvements in local living conditions.²⁴

The reason for this emphasis is not hard to discover. The Soviet voter has been molded in a political environment which permits the voicing of dissent exclusively on local issues, on issues that essentially involve the implementation by local officials of policies decided at higher levels. Thus if these issues of local implementation were thrust into the forefront of the election campaign, there is every reason to suspect that the negative vote, and the number of defeated local candidates, would rise sharply. This is particularly true of certain regions where the local party and state organizations have been thoroughly roasted in the official press for shortcomings in past performance. In a country still far short of Utopia, still displaying its full share of corruption and mismanagement, it is still necessary to make each vote against every last officially-sponsored candidate a vote of "no confidence" in the entire regime, and thus a potentially traitorous act.

By this means, the regime attempts to remove elections entirely from the area of limited grievances and to make it a simple test of allegiance to the system. The Soviet voter, in effect, is told to seek redress of his grievances through other administrative channels, and at election time to stand and be counted on the ultimate issue of loyalty. Soviet propagandists make the point that on certain local issues "all the instructions of the voters are collected after the election, and measures are taken to carry them out."25 It is quite clear, however, that such "instructions" are communicated to the candidates informally, and are in no way, either in theory or in practice, connected with the act of voting.

But what of the negative voter? Is he, by reverse logic, dissenting against the entire Soviet system when he crosses out the name of the "bloc" candidate on the ballot? Some Western observers, such as Mote, make this simple reversal: "If casting a vote on election day is a sign of support of the regime, then not casting a vote is a sign of opposition."26 Unfortunately, the matter is not quite so simple. It cannot be assumed that all negative votes and abstentions are expressions of total rejection of the system. These negative votes may also express disapproval of the particular candidates, or local grievances, or personal grievances (resulting from bureaucratic bungling, being passed over for job promotion, etc.), or crankiness, or eccentricity, or even frivolity. Finally, such a negative vote may actually express genuine antagonism to the values of the regime or its basic structure, but this is only one possibility which must be weighed with the others. Some Soviet voters simply may not heed the warnings of the regime that voting is a test of loyalty, and not a means of expressing particularized dissent. They may derive psychological satisfactions from negative voting; they may be deluded into thinking that positive results will issue from this act, or they may simply take Soviet propaganda at face value when statements are made that "the electoral system in the U.S.S.R. shows that constitutional principles combined with practical guarantees ensure genuine democracy and respect for the rights of citizens."27

As this quotation from a typical Soviet source indicates, the dissenting voter does have some support from official Soviet doctrine. The question of elections illustrates the basic ambivalence of current Soviet ideology, which stands athwart two contrary notions of human society and personality. On the one hand, there is the commitment to the model of the conflictless social monolith, and its assumption that there is a single "correct" answer to every problem to which all will agree, once their basic interests are harmonized by the removal of classes. On the other, there is the idea of "the free development of the individual human personality," with its assumptions of great creativity and variety of expression. The two principles are not miscible, despite the vigorous efforts of Soviet ideologists to shake up a single solution. As we have already seen, Soviet elections contain elements of both principles, the idea of the monolithic plebiscite

²⁴ See, for example, the article, "Razgovor byl interesen," Sovetskaia Estoniia, March 3, 1965.

²⁶ N. G. Starovoitov, Poriadek organizatsii i provedeniia vyborov v terkhovnye sovety soiuznykh i avtonomnykh respublik i v mestnye sovety deputatov trudiashchikhsia (Moscow, 1963), p. 76.

²⁶ Mote, op. cit., p. 76.

²⁷ A. Gorshenev and I. Cheliapov, Sovetskaia izbiratel'naia sistema (Moscow, 1959), p. 5.

on the one hand, and the legal provisions for secret ballots, several competing candidates, and run-off elections on the other. Even though the heavy emphasis in the propaganda-especially in the press-is on the plebiscite theme, the knowledgeable Soviet dissenter can take refuge in the contrary, thoroughly respectable concept of Soviet ideology if he wishes. This is especially important since he would most likely justify his negative vote in terms of the inadequate qualifications of the particular candidate. This interpretation of his negative vote would be unanimously seconded by the learned Soviet experts on ideology. In explaining why some candidates are defeated in local elections, two such experts write:

This act [i.e., defeat of a candidate] is only evidence of the high activism of the voters and of the fact that the public organizations and meetings obviously made a mistake when they nominated the candidate. The mistake has been corrected. As a result of new elections in all such areas, other deputies will be elected.²⁸

Thus the dissenter could conceivably relate his negative vote to his high sense of public responsibility and "activism" when confronted with a "mistake" of the nominating organizations.

In any case, one need not accept the interpretation that all negative votes are anti-regime votes in order to conclude that the phenomenon bears closer investigation than has been accorded it in the past. In the absence of opinion polls, we cannot determine the distribution of dissenting views, but the existence of electoral data does permit some analysis of the location of dissent and the frequency of its expression through the ballot.

II. MEASURING DISSENT

The present study of electoral returns is restricted to the biennial elections for the local soviets. There are two reasons for this approach: the reported data are more complete and detailed for these elections, and the relative closeness of these soviets to local issues. and of the candidates to the electors, makes the dissenting vote in these elections more interesting and significant. As already mentioned, the Soviet regime is more permissive toward localized dissent than toward dissent on national issues, and the Soviet voter has consequently become depoliticized on the larger issues. Furthermore, even though negative votes are registered in elections for the all-union Supreme Soviet and the Supreme

TABLE 1. MEAN SIZE OF ELECTORAL UNITS, U.S.S.R., 1967*

Unit	Registered Voters Per Unit
krai	1,603,717
oblast'	887,946
city raion	89,566
okrug	53,861
city	41,895
raion	26,477
poselok	3,767
selo	1,525

^{*} Data calculated from Pravda, March 26, 1967.

Soviets of the republics, the candidates for these soviets are relatively remote from the voter and their qualifications are generally of a higher, more irreproachable level than the local candidates. In fact, as we shall see from the data, the frequency of dissent is inversely related to the size of the electoral unit when other factors are held constant.

As indicated in Table 1, the size of the electoral units is extremely variable in local elections. The average krai, with more than 1.6 million voters can hardly be considered a unit of "local" representation at all, especially since these units are generally vast and sparsely populated. On the other hand, the selo (village) unit is more than 100 times smaller than the krai, and can be considered truly local in character. The poselok (settlement), with almost four thousand electors, can also be counted as a local unit. It is a peculiarity of Soviet electoral organization that such small units are found only in rural areas, for the smallest unit of urban voters (the city soviet) numbers approximately forty thousand.29

Two kinds of information reported in the Soviet press are useful for analysis of dissent: the number of negative voters and absentees, and the number of defeated candidates. Since it is virtually impossible to miss voting by accident, only design or sheer physical incapacitation can account for absenteeism.³⁰ In fact, the vote-getting machine is so marvel-

²⁹ The city raion is found only in relatively large cities, which are subdivided. This explains the fact that they have, on average, considerably more voters than the city soviets.

³⁰ It should be added that those who happen to be away from home on election day receive a "Certificate of the Right to Vote," which they can exchange for ballots at any polling place in the Soviet Union.

²⁸ Ibid., p. 41.

ously efficient that in the Tadzhikistan raion elections of 1957, 1951, 1963 and 1965, with over 400,000 registered voters, not a single lonely Tadzhik absented himself from the polls. Because of this rather awe-inspiring organization, one can assume that in the vast majority of cases, absenteeism is the result of purposeful abstention—one must be an artful dodger, and not merely absent-minded!

Thus it seems reasonable to add the number of absentees to the number of negative voters as an indication of total dissent expressed through the ballot. Since this information is given for the various administrative units shown in Table 1, and since it is given separately for each union republic in the unionrepublic newspapers, a useful basis of comparison can be established. This figure, expressed as a percentage of the total registered voters for the various units will be termed the Individual Dissent Index (IDI), since it is essentially a measure of individual negative choices, made presumably without communication or discussion with others. It represents the acts of a small minority, engulfed in an atmosphere of conformity.

The other piece of published information, the number of defeated candidates, leads to a rather different analysis. The data reveal that candidates are never defeated in any but local elections, and that even in local elections candidates are defeated only in the smaller electoral units. In fact, 98.2 percent of all defeated candidates in the elections studied systematically (1957, 1961, 1963 and 1965) were from the smallest electoral units, the selo and poselok. There was not a single recorded instance in the elections studied of & defeated candidate in any unit larger than the city soviet. This is certainly not the result of increased pressure on the voter in balloting for larger units. In order for a candidate to be defeated, he must receive less than a majority of the votes cast, and under Soviet conditions this can occur only in small, relatively cohesive and relatively isolated communities. Only in a small, cohesive community could there be sufficient communication of the dissenting view prior to the election to assure each vcter that he would actually be a member of the majority by voting "no." Only as a majoritarian could he be absolutely assured of being counted as an "activist" who corrected a "mistake" of the nominating organizations. Only in an isolated community, far from the party-state control levers, could discussion be oren enough to achieve a dissenting consensus. Thus the published information on defeated candidates serves as a measure of group dissent rather than individual dissent in the Soviet Union. Since the different units and republics elect vastly different numbers of deputies, a convenient unit of comparison would be the number of successful candidates for each defeated candidate, which we shall call the Group Dissent Index (GDI). As one might expect, this number in all cases is quite large, for the defeated candidate is a rather rare animal in the Soviet Union, generally representing less than .001 percent of all candidates in any given election.

These two indices are readily obtainable from published Soviet data and provide excellent measures of comparison for two different types of dissent: the dissent of the individual nonconformist surrounded by conformity, and the dissent of the small, cohesive group against the local authorities. The two indices are almost completely independent, for the votes cast against the defeated candidates form a very small proportion (less than one percent) of the total negative vote. In adjudging the reasons for individual dissent, the full range of possibilities already discussed must be considered. The IDI is important as an over-all measure of dissent on all levels in the Soviet Union. Group dissent, because of its rarity and its heavy concentration in small. rural communities of the RSFSR, is not as useful as a comparative measure of dissent in different areas of the Soviet Union-for example, in three elections studied, the Turkmenian and Tadzhik Republics did not report a single defeated candidate—but it does provide us with a clearer picture of a particular type of dissent, based on a consensus opposed to local conditions or candidates.

The two indices can be compared both statically (eliminating the time dimension by averaging results from different areas or electoral units over a period of years) and through time (by following trends shown in successive elections). Because of limitations of data, nine of the fifteen union republics of the U.S.S.R., representing 89.2 percent of its population, have been included.³¹ Complete data for calculation of the IDI were reported by the Soviet press only for the local elections of 1957, 1961 and 1965, although data on defeated candidates have been reported for all local elections.³²

³¹ Data for the missing republics (Armenia, Azerbaidzhan, Georgia, Kirgizia, Moldavia, Uzbekistan) were not readily available or were not completely reported in the local press for one or more elections.

32 Curiously enough, when local elections coincide with elections for the republic supreme soviets—a situation which occurs every four Static Analysis. A quite revealing comparison can be made of variations of IDI among the nine union republics studied. Table 2 shows the average IDI of the nine republics for three elections, and reveals a striking difference in the amount of dissent registered by the voters in differing areas. Although the republics in general are distinguished by differing national cultures, large-scale population movements of past decades have complicated the picture. Particularly in some of the smaller republics, the in-flow of ethnic Russians and Ukrainians has tended to dilute the distinctive national culture of the area.33 Nevertheless, national differences do remain, and the borders of the union republics can still be taken as approximate lines of division between different peoples.

As shown in Table 2, Estonians are significantly more likely to be dissenters—at least at election time—than any of the other national groups. One can easily relate this opposition sentiment to Estonia's troubled times in the recent past, its brief period of independence, forced entry into the Soviet Union during the Second World War, and Stalin's post-war repressions and the settlement of many ethnic Russians in Estonia. One would be satisfied with this explanation were it not for the fact that the Lithuanians, who for the most part shared the Estonians' fate, indicate very little dissent at election time. This difference in frequency of dissent can only be explained by a careful study of contemporary conditions in the two neighboring republics, a subject beyond the scope of this essay.

Another result which bears some discussion is the high IDI for the Russian Republic. It must be kept in mind that the Russian Republic, which stretches from the Baltic to the Pacific, and contains more than half the population of the Soviet Union, also contains many non-Russian nationality groups living quite remote from the power centers in Moscow and Leningrad. All indications are that these groups, and the Russians who have settled in the austere new towns of the Siberian plains, contribute more than their share to the amount of dissent shown in Russian Republic elections.

The average GDI for the union republics

TABLE 2. MEAN IDI BY UNION REPUBLIC, ELECTIONS OF 1957, 1961 AND 1965*

Republic	Mean IDI (%)
Estonia	1.18
RSFSR	0.86
Kazakhstan	0.55
Latvia	0.44
Turkmenistan	0.32
Belorussia	0.29
Ukraine	0.27
Lithuania	0.25
Tadzhikistan	0.21

^{*} Sources:

Sovetskaia Rossiia, March 19, 1965; March 12, 1961; March 8, 1957

Pravda Ukrainy, March 20, 1965; March 10, 1961; March 7, 1957

Sovetskaia Belorussiia, March 19, 1965; March 24, 1961; March 7, 1957

Kazakhstanskaia pravda, March 20, 1965; March 11, 1961;

Alma-Atinskaia pravda, March 14, 1957

Turkmenskaia iskra, March 19, 1965; March 9, 1961; March 7, 1957

Kommunist Tadzhikistana, March 20, 1965; March 17, 1961; March 7, 1957

Sovetskaia Litva, March 26, 1965; March 9, 1961; March 7, 1957

Sovetskaia Latviia, March 20, 1965; March 22, 1961; March 14, 1957

Sovetskaia Estoniia, March 26, 1965; March 22, 1961; March 15, 1957

during these years is shown in Table 3. Three republics, the RSFSR, Estonia, and Latvia show markedly less reticence in defeating candidates than the others, and these three republics also score high in individual dissent as shown in Table 2. Over-all, the rank-order correlation of GDI and IDI for the nine republics is +0.62. Kazakhstan's pattern of relatively high IDI and low GDI fits very well the picture of a district which has seen a large influx of young people (during Khrushchev's Virgin Lands program) who have subsequently become disillusioned but who have not yet established solidary groups. This hypothesis is supported by the figures, which indicate a rather high level of dissent manifested almost exclusively through individual action.

Another method of comparison has been used to determine if any significant differences exist between urban and rural areas, and between large and small electoral units, in the years—the press reports only incomplete data. One explanation might be that the subject of elections is allocated a fixed amount of scarce Soviet newsprint regardless of the number of elections held.

³³ For example, the Kazakh people contribute only 30 percent of Kazakhstan's population, and the Kirgiz form only 40.5 percent of Kirgizia, according to the last census (1959).

Table 3. Mean gil by union republic, elections of 1957, 1961, 1963, and 1965*

Republic	Mean GDI
RSFSR	6630
Estonia	7353
Latvia	8022
Lithuania	11220
Belorussia	12117
Ukraine	28120
Kazakhstan	28629
Turkmenistan	**
Tadzhikistan	**
Mean (above nine republics)	8344

^{*} For sources see Table 2

Note: High numerical values of GDI indicate low incidence of dissert.

expression of electoral dissent. In this study three types of electoral units were compared: large urban (city soviet), large rural (raion soviet), and small rural (selo and poselok soviets). The IDI's for each of these units were aggregated for all nine republics, with the results shown in Table 4.

The results indicate that individual dissent is highest in urban areas, which might indicate a weak Soviet reflection of the urban malaise that has afflicted other industrial or industrializing nations. Another interesting result is that small rural units show considerably more dissent than large rural units, even though for the most part the same voters are involved in both cases. This means that there are thousands of rural voters who cast their ballots for their raion candidate, and at the same time vote against their local candidate. Thus the evidence supports the hypothesis that rural voters are more likely to voice their discontent over

TABLE 4. MEAN IDI FOR DIFFERENT ELECTORAL UNITS, NINE REPUBLICS, ELECTIONS OF 1957, 1961, 1965, AND 1967*

Electoral Unit	IDI (%)
Large urban	0.75
Small rural	0.64
Large rural	0.48

^{*} Data in Pravda, March 26, 1967 permit this calculation, but not comparison by republic. For other sources, see Table 2.

TABLE 5. ABSENTEEISM AS A PERCENTAGE OF TOTAL NEGATIVE CHOICES

Electoral Unit	Absenteeism (%)
Large urban	11.3
Large rural	7.9
Small rural	5.9

local conditions than over larger, "political" issues.

Table 5 gives a further indication of differences between urban and rural voting patterns. The results clearly show that the urban voter is more likely to show his opposition by staying away from the polls than the rural voter. It is plausible to conclude that the difference lies not so much in the psychology of the voters, but in the increased opportunities for evasion that are provided by the mass concentration of voters in the cities. The rural voter might be just as apathetic, but he is organized in smaller, more self-contained groups making escape more difficult. This conclusion is given added support by the fact that in rural areas, absenteeism is higher for the large units than for the small units, even though the large units have a lower IDI.

Comparison of urban and rural units for indications of group dissent shows, as already mentioned, that this phenomenon is almost exclusively found in rural areas. Of 910 candidates defeated in five local elections (1957, 1961, 1963, 1965, 1967) throughout the U.S.S.R., only ten were candidates for city soviets. The fact that defeated urban candidates represent only 1.1 percent of all defeated candidates is directly related to the size of urban and rural electoral units, as shown in Table 6. It is quite apparent that on the aver-

TABLE 6. MEAN NUMBER OF ELECTORS FOR EACH CANDIDATE, U.S.S.R., 1967*

Candidate for:	Mean Number of Electors
krai soviet	5432
oblast' soviet	4355
okrug soviet	571
raion soviet	339
city soviet	328
city raion soviet	430
poselok soviet	· 68
selo soviet	48

^{*} Calculated from data in Pravda, March 26, 1967

^{} No defeated candidates reported in three elections age it would take only a bare majority of 48 voters to defeat a candidate for the smallest rural unit (selo), while it would take a majority of 328 voters to defeat a candidate for the smallest urban unit. If the hypothesis is correct that pre-election communication of dissent among the voters is required to defeat a candidate, it would follow that the process would be much more difficult in a group of over three hundred than in a group of less than fifty. In addition, the urban group is far less likely to have developed the necessary group solidarity because of the greater fluidity of movement in the urban environment.

Based upon the record of past local elections, then, one can draw the following general conclusions about voting patterns and dissent in the Soviet Union:

- 1. The amount of individual dissent indicated in elections is inversely related to the size of the electoral unit. The Soviet voter is more likely to dissent against local conditions than against policies of wider importance. In this attitude, he reflects the values of the regime, which permits criticism of local implementation, but not of national policies.
- 2. There is more individual dissent in the cities than in the countryside. This may be the result of the greater education, "sophistication," and diversity of the urban population in comparison with the peasantry of the villages.
- 3. There is far more group dissent in the countryside than in the cities. This clearly demonstrated phenomenon can be related to the greater solidarity, cohesiveness and isolation of rural groups, as well as the much smaller size of the minimal rural electoral units (selo and poselok soviets). It is probably true, however, that this rural group dissent is not directed toward politically significant issues.
- 4. Opportunities for abstention from voting are greater in the cities than in the countryside. This conclusion, which emerges from the data on urban and rural absenteeism, is based on the assumption that absentees are for the most part willfully abstaining.
- 5. There is significantly more individual and group dissent in the Russian Republic (RSFSR) and Estonia (followed closely by Latvia and Kazakhstan) than in the other republics studied.

Trend Analysis. Some very interesting and quite unexpected results were obtained from analysis of trends in Soviet voting during the past ten years. As shown in Figure 1, there has been a general and steady decline in electoral dissent over the past decade in both urban and rural areas. This would seem to contradict the expectation that with increased liberalization of Soviet society, with the growth of diversity and stratification of the population and with loosening of controls over political expression. there would be an increase in nonconformity and diversity of opinions. This cherished ideaor perhaps hope-need not be discarded on the "garbage heap of history," as Trotsky was wont to say, if we recall the previous conclusion that most negative voting throughout the Soviet Union is probably based on economic and local issues rather than on "purely political" issues of national policy. In this case, the decrease in negative voting can be related to the general improvement in living conditions which has occurred in the Soviet Union in the past ten years. As already suggested, the typical dissenting voter has probably resisted the regime's heavy-handed invitation to vote on the ultimate issue of lovalty to communism. and has instead cast his "Nyet" as a little reminder that he hadn't been pleased with the last pay raise, or the increase in food prices, or the lack of adequate recreation facilities in his village. Students of American voting habits will realize that this is far from a frivolous or fanciful explanation of voting behavior.34 It is far less fanciful under Soviet conditions, where the government, if not each candidate, is clearly and wholly responsible for the economic problems that trouble the souls of Soviet voters. A corollary explanation would be that the increased liberalization of Soviet society has opened up more effective channels for the communication of moderately dissenting views and grievances than existed in the past, and that some negative voters have abandoned an act they always knew was more symbolic than effective, and taken advantage of those new channels that can achieve demonstrable results.

The general pattern of decline in individual dissent is repeated in all the union republics studied (see Figure 2), except Tadzhikistan, Kazakhstan and Latvia, which show a slight to moderate increase. A roughly comparable decline in group dissent is indicated in Table 7, although the poor agricultural conditions of trade in 1961 resulted in a sharp increase in group dissent (i.e., lower GDI) during the election of that year. The general decrease of rural group dissent can be ascribed to well-known improvements in the conditions on the collective farms. The effects of the Brezhnev-Kosygin "new deal" for agriculture, announced in March 1965, may possibly be related to the ³⁴ See Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes, The American Voter (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1960), pp. 393-401.

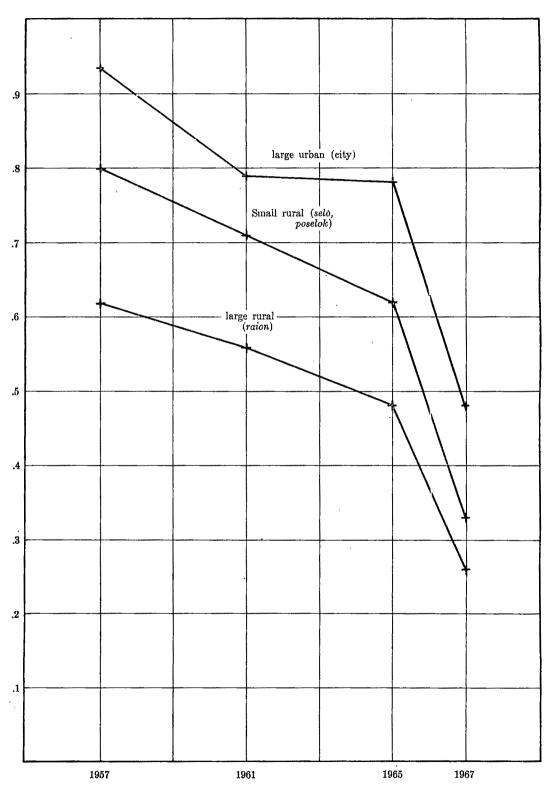

Fig. 1. Decline in IDI by Electoral Unit 1957-1967

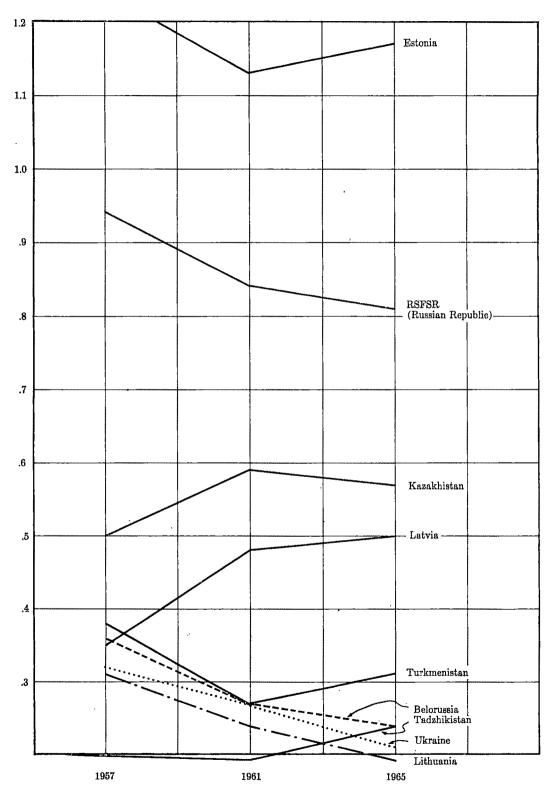

Fig. 2. IDI by Union Republic 1957-1965

TABLE 7. U.S.S.R. AVERAGE GDI FOR FOUR LOCAL ELECTIONS

Year	Average GDI
1957	9278
1961	7316
1965	9664
1967	15855 marked decline in rural group dissent shown (in Table 7) for 1967.

III. CONCLUSIONS

If our hypothesis is correct that increased liberalization of Soviet society, and the general improvement in living conditions results in a decreased use of elections as a vehicle for the expression of dissent, the study of Soviet elections might prove to be a less rewarding enterprise in future years. On the other hand, there is the possibility that in the long run the idea of an election as a choice between alternatives could make some headway. It is not altogether unreasonable to suggest the possibility that:

Russians are being educated in the procedures of modern elections, and some day in the future may be allowed a choice of candidates on election day.... Certainly there can be no argument that the legal machinery for elections on western European or American lines is all present. Not a word of the present laws would need to be changed. 35

Even this prospect, however, should be treated with caution. It is not enough to offer "a choice of candidates on election day," if these candidates are all hand-picked selections of a single ruling party. This sort of system has been used in Poland without producing any notable increase in the democratic content of Polish politics.³⁶

The Soviet regime has not permitted even this limited choice, and has chosen to emphasize the ceremonial aspects and the theme of social unity. As a result it has had to face the inevitable consequence of social apathy. The long-term problem is that Soviet elections in their present form present a basic contradiction between structure and function. The structure of Soviet elections in its formal aspect conforms to the functional requirements of a contested election between candidates representing differentiable alternatives. The function of Soviet elections at present, however, is to symbolize mass patriotism and allegiance through a daylong public ceremony. The contradiction is not subtle, and one can assume that it is recognized by many Soviet citizens. By ritualizing the elections, the regime has removed the element of uncertainty and drama which make elections intrinsically interesting, even when the choices offered to the electorate are not. But when choices are not even offered, excitement disappears, and the regime must struggle mightily with pen and loudspeaker to generate enthusiasm.

Under such circumstances, one could imagine two possible alternatives to the present system: the Soviet authorities could eliminate elections entirely, or they could permit a limited choice between pre-selected candidates, as in Poland. The first choice could be easily justified in ideological terms, under the assumption that the stage of pure communism is being approached; it would save money and time, and it would remove the patent ambiguity of the present electoral practices. Still, the regime would lose the positive symbolic benefits, and the citizen's commitment-through-action that the elections provide. The second choice might therefore seem more advantageous since it would retain the symbolic and active supportive elements and at the same time permit a competitive—and possibly even interesting campaign based on the qualifications of the candidates.

One suspects, however, that the most likely future for Soviet elections will be a continuation of the present. They have become entrenched through time as a symbol of regime legitimacy, and as the Soviet regime passes its fiftieth anniversary, it seems more reluctant than ever to tamper with such symbolic institutions. Although Soviet elections do not create much excitement, they still provide a splendid opportunity for the regime to test its mobilization powers, and to prove to the world—and to itself-that it can make just about every ablebodied adult in the Soviet Union perform a useless task at a prescribed time and placeand do it with a smile! But as long as it does this, the few scowling faces in the crowd will provide us with some useful information on dissent in the Soviet Union.

³⁵ Carson, op. cit., p. 75.

³⁶ See B. A. Strashun, Izbiratel'noe pravo sotsialisticheskikh gosudarstv (Moscow, 1963), pp. 175-76; Hansjakob Stehle, The Independent Satellite: Society and Politics in Poland since 1946 (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1965), pp. 183-189; and Jerzy J. Wiatr, "Elections and Voting Behavior in Poland," Essays on the Behavioral Study of Politics, ec. Austin Flanney (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1962), pp. 235-251.

SOVIET ELITE PARTICIPATORY ATTITUDES IN THE POST-STALIN PERIOD*

MILTON LODGE University of Iowa

This paper, part of a larger study, is a comparative analysis of five Soviet elites-the central Party apparatchicki, and four specialist elites: the central economic bureaucrats, the military, the literary intelligentsia, and the legal profession. By content analyzing representative periodicals for each elite, data are collected on elite attitudes toward participation in the political system. The overall goal is to gain a measure of the direction and scope of Soviet elite attitudinal change since Stalin; more specifically, (1) to measure the extent to which the elites perceive themselves as participants in the policy-making process, (2) to determine whether the elites perceive their participatory role as expanding over time, and (3) to demark changing patterns of Partyspecialist elite relations from 1952-65.

To ground this study in a theoretical framework, analytical categories and hypothesesderived in part from Brzezinski and Huntington's Political Power: USA/USSR-are formulated to test the perceived extent of elite participation in the Soviet political process.1 Synoptically, models of political systems may be built by reducing to essentials the mode of interaction between the regime and society. A key variable in analyzing this interaction between superstructure and base is the role and efficacy of societal groups in influencing policy formation and implementation. Following this tack a descriptive continuum may be set up for classifying political systems. At one end of the continuum are ideological systems (e.g., the

* An earlier version of this paper was delivered at the 1967 Annual Meeting of the Midwest Conference of Political Scientists, Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana, April 27–29, 1967. The data were collected at the Institute for the Study of the USSR, Munich, Germany, in the winter of 1965–66, funded by a grant from the University of Michigan Center for Russian and East European Studies. I am indebted to the Institute's staff for their cooperation, to Professors William Zimmerman and Vernon Van Dyke for helpful criticisms, and to Merrill Shanks and Susan Lawther for methodological assistance.

¹ Zbigniew Brzezinski and Samuel Huntington, Political Power: USA/USSR (New York: Viking Press, 1964), Pt. I. USSR), at the other "instrumental" systems (e.g., the United States). In instrumental systems the relationship between the political and social system is characterized by "access and interaction." In an ideological political system—with totalitarianism at the polar extreme—social groups are infiltrated, controlled, manipulated, and denied effective participation in the political process.

Brzezinski, along with a growing number of Western scholars, notes some degree of Soviet systemic change over time, arguing that the central Party apparatus—still dominant in policy-making and implementation—is being forced to tolerate greater elite participation in the political process. The extent to which the specialist elites perceive themselves and are perceived by the other elites as participants is the focal point of this study and the major variable in determining the degree of systemic change along the continuum toward a less ideological political system.

The ideological-instrumental continuum may be graphically portrayed as a five-point scale ranging from perceived Party dominance on the ideological side of the continuum to perceived specialist elite participation at the instrumental end of the continuum, with 3.0 representing joint, relatively equal, Party-specialist elite participation. The analytical categories are comparably scaled and designed to generate data suitable for plotting elite attitudes on the continuum.

The scaled positions within the participatory categories are:

- 1.0 Party participation solely
- 2.0 Party participation primarily
- 3.0 Joint Party-specialist elite participation
- 4.0 Specialist elite participation primarily
- 5.0 Specialist elite participation solely (See Figure 1.)

In this hypothetical situation the Soviet political system is Party-dominant—all the elites are participating within the ideological parameters (1.0-2.9) of the political arena. Instrumentality—operationally defined as specialist elite participation in the political process—would characterize the political system if specialist scores were in the 3.0-5.0 range.

Within the Party's espoused values for the "transition to communism" the knowledge and skills of specialists, it is reasoned, are indispensable. "No single strategic elite." writes Suzanne Keller, "can today know all there is to be known, and none can perform all the functions involved in social leadership." If it is true that the Party and specialists are becoming increasingly interdependent, what, from the Party's perspective, would be the ideal Party-specialist relationship? Ruling out either polar extreme as systemically dysfunctional, a tentative "mix" may be a mini-max position in which the maximum degree of specialist participation is tolerable which still allows for Party dominance in the policy and decision making arena. With 3.0 corresponding to relatively equal Party-Specialist participation, the Party's optimal position would be in the 2.5-2.9 range where the Party could capitalize on specialist elite participation without surrendering control.

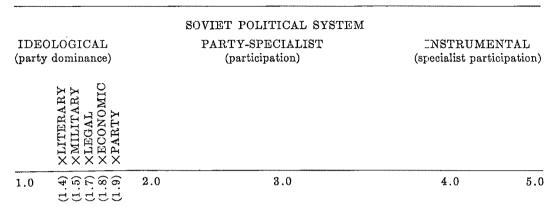

Fig. 1. Ideological-Instrumental Continuum.

I. RESEARCH METHOD

Western analyses of Soviet politics must, of necessity, rely heavily on published sources. Both the totalitarian and Kremlinological models typically portray Soviet communication channels as being monopolistically controlled by the central Party apparat. Rejecting both approaches, this project is premised on the assumption that Soviet specialist elites—due to their strategic role in society—enjoy sufficient leeway in the system to articulate a range of beliefs and values in their specialist journals.

Soviet spokesman grudingly acknowledge and Western analyses have demonstrated that specialist journals are vehicles for the limited articulation of elite attitudes.³ Representing a functional sphere of activity in the political system, specialist journals primarily perform an instrumental role—authors, as experts, elaborate on policies within their sphere of competence, suggest ways and means for improving implementation, mobilize support, and most important of all, criticize shortcomings. The overwhelming majority of sampled articles are achievement oriented, that is, are chiefly concerned with questions of how best to fulfill the plan, increase efficiency, and overcome weaknesses.

² Beyond the Ruling Class: Strategic Elites in Modern Society (New York: Random House, 1963), p. 70; the five elites in this study generally conform to Keller's concept of strategic elites and fulfill the expectation that elite participation will increase over time.

Within this orientation authors are predominantly concerned with specifics: a manager of a textile factory ir. Petropavlosk argues that Party interference in the running of the plant resulted in decreased production; a Marshal complains that criticism of company commanders at Party meetings undermines the officer's authority and reduces troop morale: a jurist warns that a Central Committee decree calling for the exemplary punishment of "parasites" undercuts the Party's campaign to strengthen socialist law; Tvardovsky, editorin-chief of Novy mir, favorably comments on "truthfulness" in literature, while Khrushchev rails against the young writers' emphasis on "decadent" themes. In sum, although specialist journals are rarely vehicles for an open and direct confrontation with the Party, specialist attitudes are articulated through instrumental proposals and criticisms—within the Party's espoused values of productivity, efficiency, and "communism"—without overtly challenging the Party's role in policy integration. In the Soviet context, rejection of the Party's integrative role is opposition, elite participation in the formulation and implementation of specific policies is politics. Direct opposition is rare, politics is ubiquitous. With the decline of terror in the post-Stalin period controversies are no longer zero-sum games.

³ Soviet references to this problem are numerous. See, e.g., the authoritative editorial titled "Concerning Discussions in Scholarly Journals," in Kommunist, No. 7, 1955, which, after stating that Marxism-Leninism must be the "essential" framework within which specialist discussion should take place, bemoans the fact that scholarly articles "often" by-pass Farty formulas and all too frequently attempt "to reverse fundamental theses of the Party." For a general discussion of the increasing leeway for instrumental criticism in the post-Stalin period, see Sidney Ploss, Conflict and Decision-Making in Soviet Russia, (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965). A quantitative analysis comparing Soviet elite values manifested in journals is found in Robert Angell's "Social Values of Soviet and American Elites," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 8 (December, 1964), 330-385.

By content analyzing articles in specialist elite journals and aggregating the frequencies of occurrence, elite attitudinal trends may be compared. Categories are formulated and data collected on elite beliefs—(who is described as actually making decisions), and elite values (preferences on who should make decisions). The resultant analysis of elite beliefs and values yields a measure of attitudinal trends toward a more participatory, less ideological, political system. All references to elite participation therefore refer to attitudinal, not actual, participation and may be treated as indicators of systemic change.

The Elites. For each elite, "representative" periodical(s) were selected for content analysis:

The Central Party Kommunist (Communist)
Apparat Partinaya zhizn (Party Life)

The Economic Elite Voprosy ekonomiki (Problems of Economics)
Ekonomicheskaya gazeta

Ekonomicheskaya gazeta (Economic gazette)

The Military Krasnaya zvezda (Red Star)

The Legal Profession Sovetskoye gosudarstvo i pravo (Soviet State and Law)

Sovetskaya yustitsia (Soviet Justice)

The Literary Elite Oktyabr (October)

Literaturnaya gazeta
(Literary Gazette)
Novy mir (New World)

The Sample. To satisfy the definitional requirement of objectivity in content analysis systematic sampling procedures are required.

I. The unit of analysis is the article. Articles in the sample were chosen from the periodicals on the basis of a quota sample. The issues from each periodical were selected at intervals so as to cover the entire year and avoid the inclusion of any one period, e.g., avoiding every December issue of journals or Monday issue of newspapers. From the selected issue only the lead article, the first signed article, was coded. (In newspapers the lead article is the first signed article in the upper left hand corner of page two.)

II. The unit of enumeration, what is being coded and counted, is the major theme of a paragraph. When clearly articulating one position in one category, the major theme could be coded once and only once.

III. The size of the sample is equal for each elite each year, 600 paragraphs per elite for each of the eight sampled years—1952, 1953, 1955, 1957, 1959, 1961, 1963, and 1965—a yearly sample of 3,000 paragraphs (600 paragraphs ×5 elites) for a total study sample of 24,000 paragraphs (3,000 paragraphs per year ×8 years).

Categories and Hypotheses. The categories, or value dimensions, are designed to generate data on Soviet elite attitudes toward the policy-making and decision-making process. Policy-making is operationally distinguished from decision-making in terms of the policy decision's impact on society.. Policy-making entails decisions which affect a) the entire USSR, or b) one or more republics. Decision-making refers to policies affecting any one administrative unit below the republic level, e.g., a region, territory, district, factory or farm. Thus a decision affecting all collective farms in a republic is operationally defined as policy-making, while a decision affecting a specific collective is defined as decision-making.

Reliability. Reliability tests were administered to establish a presumption of objectivity. Twenty-five percent of all sampled articles were recoded by a second coder working independently of the first. The articles included in the reliability test were selected by means of an "accidental sample," i.e., chosen randomly for each journal each year. The formula for testing reliability is:

Total number of agreements

Total number of paragraphs in the article

= percentage of reliability

The total study reliability is statistically significant at 89.4 percent.

TABLE 1. ELITE PERCEPTIONS OF THE POLICY-MAKING ARENA, 1952-1965

Policy-Making is the Responsibility of

- 1.0 the Party leadership solely
- 2.0 the Party leadership primarily
- 3.0 both the Party and specialist participating
- 4.0 the specialists primarily
- 5.0 the specialists solely.

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Party	1.9	1.9	2.0	1.4	2.9	2.7	1.7	2.3	2.1
Economic	000	2.5	2.3	1.5	3.2	3.0	2.8	3.6	2.5
Legal	000	1.3	2.3	2.9	1.7	4.0	2.5	3.8	2.7
Military	$(1.8)^{b}$	(1.6)	1.6	1.3	000	2.2	3.3	2.7	2.1
Literary	1.8	1.0	1.8	2.9	2.4	2.0	2.5	3.1	2.3
All Elites	1.8	1.6	1.9	2.1	2.5	2.6	٤.7	3.2	2.4
Specialists	1.8	1.6	1.9	2.1	2.4	2.8	2.8	3.3	2.4

F(33,106) = 3.089, significant at .001

- An example of position 5.0, taken from the illustrative material used in training the coders, is: The formation of our military world view has taken place in a creative atmosphere . . . and is the result of the common effort of military theorists and practical military people. Thanks to this, we have developed a body of unified theory on the basis of which a broad state program has been carried out to prepare the country and armed forces for the defense of the Fatherland. Kommunist Vooruzhennykh sil, No. 10 (May 1962), p. 12.
- ^b Data for the military were unavailable for 1952 and 1953. The mean score for all elites was assigned the military for these years and noted within the brackets.

II. ELITE PARTICIPATORY ATTITUDES IN THE POST-STALIN POLITICAL STSTEM

The Soviet political system—when conceived as an ideological system—is characterized by central Farty apparat dominance in the political arena.

I. ON POLICY MAKING

Hypothesis I: Over time the specialist elites increasingly describe themselves as participants in the policy-making process.

In operational terms Party primacy will be reflected in mean scores of 1.0-2.9 on Category I—Who is Repsonsible for Policy-Making?—while higher, participatory scores of 3.0-5.0 in the later years would support the hypothesis that the policy-making process is becoming less ideological over time (Table 1).

The general trend is toward increased specialist elite participation in the policy-making arena. Note, for example, the gradual, rather steady increase in Specialist scores from 1953 onward, culminating in 1965 with an instrumental score of 3.3. While the thrust toward greater specialist elite participation is significant, the trend is uneven for each of the individual elites. A zig-zag course is the characteristic pattern, perhaps test described by the un-Leninist notion of two steps forward one step back. For the specialist elites, reversals are typically followed by a resurgence which marks an advance beyond the previous low. This dysrhythmic process is a common phenomenon on all the categories and as will be shown, is a function of Party-specialist elite conflict.

By dividing the eight sampled years into two equal periods, 1952-57 and 1959-65 overall participatory trends are more readily illustrated (Table 2).

TABLE 2. ELITE PERCEPTIONS OF THE POLICY-MAKING ARENA, 1952-57 to 1959-65

Elites	1952–57	1959-65	% Change
Party	1.8	2.4	+33%
Economic	1.9	3.3	+74%
Legal	2.4	2.9	+21%
Military	1.6	2.3	+44%
Literary	1.9	2.7	+42%
All Elites	1.9	2.7	+42%
Specialists	1.9	2.8	+47%

With a 47% Specialist increase in 1959-65 over the earlier period, hypothesis I is supported—table 3. Elite values toward participation in the policy-making arena, 1952-1965

Policy-Making Should Be The Responsibility Of

1.0 the Party leadership solely

2.0 the Party leadership primarily

3.0 both the Party and specialists participatinga

4.0 the specialists primarily

5.0 the specialists solely

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Party	1.9	1.4	1.5	2.1	2.1	2.2	2.0	2.4	1.9
Economic	1.0	1.2	3.0	1.6	2.9	3.4	2.7	3.1	2.2
Legal	1.2	1.4	1.9	2.9	2.7	3.2	3.7	3.3	2.5
Military	(1.3)	(1.3)	1.4	2.8	2.3	2.4	3.2	3.4	2.3
Literary	1.4	1.3	2.9	2.7	2.8	3.0	3.1	3.6	2.6
All Elites	1.3	1.3	2.1	2.5	2.6	$^{2.7}$	$^{2.9}$	3.2	2.4
Specialist	1.2	1.3	2.3	2.5	2.7	3.0	3.2	3.4	2.4

F(38,177) = 7.246, significant at .001

An example of position 3.0 is contained in a speech by Khrushchev at a meeting of agronomists: You say "Comrade Khrushchev said thus and so." Am I the highest authority in agricultural science? You are President of the Ukraine Republic Academy of Sciences and I am the Secretary of the Party Central Committee. You must help me in these matters, and not I you. I might be wrong, and if I am, you, as an honest scientist, should say: "Comrade Khrushchev, you do not quite understand the matter." If you explain things to me correctly, I will thank you for it. Let us say I was wrong. But you will say, "Comrade Khrushchev said this and I supported him." What sort of scientist is this comrades? This is toadyism and timeserving.

Pravda, December 25, 1961.

the perceived boundaries of the political arena are expanding over time. As specialist elite participation increases, Party dominance decreases: all the elites recognize greater specialist elite participation, although in 1959–65 the Party at 2.4 defines the parameters of the policy-making arena in more restrictive terms than do the Specialists.

Juxtaposed to the belief category—who is described as actually making policy—is its counterpart, a value category on who should make policy.

Hypothesis 2: The Specialist elites are pressing the Party for greater influence in the policymaking arena.

To show the extent of specialist elite pressure on the Party for a larger role in policy-making, three operational prerequisites need be met: 1) Specialist scores on the value category (who should participate?) must increase over time, 2) must be demonstrably higher than Party scores, and 3) be appreciably higher, more participatory, than perceptions of actual participation (Table 3).

Again the trend is toward greater specialist elite participation. In 1963 and 1965 the Specialists are in the participatory range, and in 1965 only the Party opts for Party dominance. The general trend for Specialists is continuous and marks a steady increase from 1952 through 1965. Developments over time are more clearly demonstrated by comparing the 1952–57 period with 1959–65 (Table 4).

TABLE 4. ELITE VALUES TOWARD POLICY-MAKING 1952-57 to 1959-65

Elites	1952–57	1959-65	% Change
Party	1.7	2.2	+29%
Economic	1.5	2.9	+93%
Legal	2.0	3.1	+55%
Military	1.7	$^{2.9}$	+71%
Literary	1.9	3.2	+68%
All Elites	1.8	2.9	+61%
Specialists	1.8	3.1	+72%

In support of the hypothesis that the specialist elites are pressing the Party for greater participation in the policy-making arena, the three requisite conditions are met:

1) Specialist scores increase over time. The

TABLE 5. COMPARISON OF SPECIALIST ELITE PERCEPTIONS AND VALUES OF THE POLICY-MAKING ARENA

Is-Should Categories	1959	1961	1963	1965	1959–1965
Specialist beliefs (who makes policy?)	2.4	2.8	2.8	3.3	2.8
Specialist values (who should make policy?)	2.7	3.0	3.2	3.4	3.1
% should $>$ is	13%	7%	14%	3%	11%

instrumental average of 3.1 in 1959-65 marks a 72% increase over 1952-57.

- 2) By 1959-65 all the specialist elites opt for a more participatory role in policy-making than the Party deems desirable. In every year from 1955 through 1965, Specialist scores are higher, i.e., more participatory, than are Party scores. Since increased elite participation directly reduces Party dominance the Party, as expected, claims that actual elite participation in the later period is greater (2.4) than desirable (2.2).
- 3) Specialist scores on who should make policy are appreciably higher in the 1959-65 period than on the question who is described as making policy (Table 5).

In sum, on the important question of policymaking, a strong participatory trend is manifested by the specialist elites and recognized by the Party. Not denying the Party's ability to check, at least temporarily, elite participation,⁴

4 Note, e.g., the effect of Khrushchev's 1957 a distinct feature of the post-Stalin period is this attitudinal development away from strict Party dominance.

2. ON DECISION-MAKING

In an ideological political system the Party is portrayed as dominant in local as well as policy level decisions, reserving for itself the role of final arbiter in disputes over implementation.

Hypothesis 3: Over time the specialist elites increasingly depict themselves as participants in the decision-making process (Table 6). The years 1959 and 1961 represent the high tide of decentralization. Participatory Party victory over Malenkov and Zhukov on the economic and military elites, and the effect of the 1962-63 anti-parasite legislation on the legal elite. The zig-zag course for the individual elites is apparently a result of major policy disputes between the Party and specific elite.

TABLE 6. ELITE PERCEPTIONS OF THE DECISION-MAKING ARENA, 1952-1965

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Party	2.4	2.4	2.6	2.6	3.3	4.0	2.1	3.1	2.8
Economic	000	2.5	3.3	2.8	4.2	3.8	2.5	$^{2.2}$	3.0
Legal	3.0	000	3.1	2.8	2.5	2.8	2.9	2.5	2.8
Military	(2.5)	(2.6)	2.5	2.9	2.2	2.7	3.3	3.0	2.7
Literary	2.1	2.7	4.1	$^{2.9}$	4.3	2.7	4.0	3.2	3.2
All Elites	2.5	2.6	3.5	2.8	3.1	3.1	2.9	2.8	2.9
Specialists	2.5	2.6	3.2	2.8	3.3	2.9	3.2	2.7	2.9

F(35,154) = 1.166, significant at .001

An example of position 5.0 is:

Indeed, if the chief means to be used in war is nuclear missiles, this means that we are obligated to construct both the theory of the art of warfare, the operational tactical training of troops and their indoctrinating with regard for the use, above all, of these weapons. This means that each officer, master sargent, sargent, soldier and sailor must learn to act, to carry out his duties and battle orders, as required by the conditions of nuclear-missile war."

Krasnaya zvezda, May 11, 1962.

scores in these years mirror Party efforts to increase production and efficiency through local initiative. By late 1961, however, the Party line changed as the inevitable consequences—"localism," "family circles," and fraud—threatened economic planning and central Party control.

The third hypothesis—a predicted Specialist increase over time—is tenuously supported with an 8% participatory increase in 1959-65 over the earlier period (Table 7).

TABLE 7. ELITE PERCEPTIONS OF THE DECISION-MAKING ARENA, 1952-57 TO 1959-65

Elites	1952–57	1959-65	% Change
Party	2.5	3.1	+23%
Economic	2.9	3.2	+11%
Legal	2.9	2.6	-12%
Military	2.6	2.8	+ 8%
Literary	3.1	3.6	+18%
All Elites	2.8	2.9	+ 5%
Specialists	2.8	3.0	+ 8%

The level of elite participatory attitudes in both periods is high, significantly higher than on policy-making, and seemingly reflects greater tolerance by the Party of specialist elite participation at the local level. With an instrumental score of 3.0 in 1959-65, the Specialists perceive themselves as relative equals to the Party in decision-making.

Hypothesis 4: The Specialists are pressing the Party for greater influence on the decision-making level (Table 8).

For specialists, instrumental scores on who should make decisions are manifested in every year from the death of Stalin onward, and a 16% overall increase is recorded over time (Table 9).

TABLE 9. ELITE VALUES TOWARD DECISION-MAKING 1952-57 TO 1959-65

Elites	1952–57	1959-65,	% Change
Party	2.7	2.9	+ 7%
Economic	3.4	4.1	+21%
Legal	3.0	3.7	+23%
Military	3.0	3.0	000%
Literary	3.3	3.6	+ 9%
All Elites	3.1	3.5	+13%
Specialists	3.1	3.6	+16%

In both periods the Specialists score in the instrumental range, and in 1959-65 all the specialist elites press for greater participation than the Party believes desirable.

When specialist elite perceptions of the decision-making process (who makes decisions?) are compared to elite values (who should make decisions?) two patterns emerge:

1) Despite ups and downs through the years; in each of the sampled years the Specialists opt for greater responsibility in decision-making than they depict themselves as having (Table 10).

2) Of all the elites in the 1959-65 period, only the Party claims that elite participation (perceived by the Party to be 3.1) is greater than desirable (2.9). If it is true that the Party is seeking a formula for balancing a high level of specialist elite participation with Party control, a comparison of Party and Specialist scores on who should make decisions suggests that the specialist elites seek to upset the mini-

TABLE 8. ELITE VALUES TOWARD PARTICIPATION IN THE DECISION-MAKING ARENA, 1952-1965

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Party	3.1	2.8	3.4	2.1	3.7	3.6	2.3	2.1	2.9
Economic	3.3	4.0	4.3	2.2	4.5	3.8	4.0	4.2	3.8
Legal	1.7	3.6	3.3	3.3	4.1	4.1	3.2	3.4	3.4
Military	(2.9)	(3.3)	2.3	4.1	3.0	2.9	2.9	3.2	3.1
Literary	3.8	2.6	3.7	3.2	3.9	4.5	3.2	3.4	3.5
All Elites	2.9	3.0	3.3	3.0	3.9	3.7	3.3	3.3	3.3
Specialists	2.9	3.1	3.3	3.2	3.9	3.8	3.4	3.6	3.4

F(37,194) = 1.767, significant at .001

a An example of position 5.0, taken from Khrushchev's speech at the Moscow Writers' Union: I do not think I ought to take up an analysis of your works in my address. I am not a literary critic, as you know, and for that reason do not feel called on to analyze your literary works. Pravda, May 22, 1959.

TABLE 10. COMPARISON OF SPECIALIST PERCEPTIONS OF THE DECISION-MAKING ARENA TO SPECIALIST PARTICIPATORY VALUES, 1952-65

Should-Is Categories	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	1952–57	1959–65	All Years
Who makes decisions	2.5	2.6	3.2	2.8	3.3	2.9	3.2	2.7	2.8	3.0	2.9
Should make decisions	2.9	3.1	3.3	3.2	3.9	3.8	3.4	3.6	3.1	3.6	3.3
% should > is	16%	19%	3%	14%	18%	31%	6%	33%	11%	20%	14%

max formula at the Party's expense (Table 11).

TABLE 11. COMPARISON OF PARTY AND SPECIALIST VALUES TOWARD PARTICIPATION IN DECISION-MAKING (WHO SHOULD MAKE DECISIONS?)

Elites	1952-57	1959-65	All Years
Party Specialists	2.7 3.1	2.9 3.6	2.8 3.4
% Spec. > Party	15%	24%	21%

Scanning the data on the decision-making categories it appears that the military is closest to the Party's position, but this compliance is, as will be demonstrated in the discussion of Party-Specialist conflict, directly traceable to Zhukov's defeat in 1957, and scores in the later years suggest that the military has strengthened its position since the Cuban missile crisis. The economic elite, despite its decline in 1957 following Malenkov's fall and Khrushchev's industrial reorganization, scores in the instrumental range on decision-making, reflecting a degree of success in its drive for greater managerial influence at the factory level. (Scores on the policy level follow a similar course.) The legal elite—the only specialist elite to experience a decline in participation on the decisional level, apparently a result of the Party's post-1958 retreat on socialist legality -topped all elites with a 23% increase over time on who should make decisions, indicating dissatisfaction with Party dominance. (An identical pattern occurred on the policy-making categories.) In both the 1952-57 and 1959-65 periods, the literary elite scored in the participatory range on decision-making and is, predictably, kept from still higher scores by the more Party-oriented attitudes articulated in the conservative journal Oktyabr. All in all, specialist elite participation in the decision-making arena is significant at 2.9 for All Years, and pressure to enhance their participatory role (3.4 for All Years) is growing increasingly strong over time.

3. AUTHORITY SOURCES IN PROBLEM SOLVING

A relationship exists between the form of political system and the type of rationalizations used in initiating, defending, and criticizing policy decisions. Historically, the dominance of the Party in the Soviet political system is linked to its claim of ideological supremacy. Certain sources of authority are supportive of CPSU dominance, e.g., the justification of policy decisions based on an appeal to Leninist historical consciousness, whereas other authority sources, for instance, a policy recommendation based on empirical evidence or expert opinion, are more conducive to specialistelite participation in the political process. In the category tapping the authority sources appealed to by the five elites in justifying their position on policies and decisions, lower scores of 1.0-2.9 reflect a Party dominant ideological system, scores in the 3.0-3.9 range are conducive to joint Party-specialist participation, and the higher scores of 4.0-5.0 support a more instrumental environment for specialist elite participation.

Hypothesis 5: Over time, as elite participation increases, the elites will opt for more instrumental forms of justification (Table 12).

As specialist elite participation increases it is hypothesized that the elites will tend increasingly to justify and criticize policy decisions in more instrumental terms, since appeals to historical consciousness and ideological awareness

TABLE 12. ELITE JUSTIFICATIONS FOR POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS, 1952-1965

What is the authority source appealed to in policy and decision making? How are policy decisions justified?

- 1.0 recommendations are based on an understanding of the laws of historical development/by analogy to a theory or decision of Marx, Lenin, Stalin in the past
- 2.0 recommendation is generally derived from Marxism, Leninism, Stalinism
- 3.0 recommendation is derived from Marxism. Leninism, Stalinism, in conjunction with practice/scientific Marxist-Leninist analysis/Marxism and objective analysis^a
- 4.0 recommendation is based on expert opinions/the clash of opinions/discussion
- 5.0 recommendation is derived from objective investigation/by empirical methods/by scientific findings

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Party	2.3	2.5	2.8	3.3	3.9	3.4	3.1	2.5	2.9
Economic	2.1	2.6	3.2	2.8	3.1	3.1	3.8	3.6	3.1
Legal	1.5	2.7	3.2	3.8	3.5	3.7	4.0	3.2	3.1
Military	(2.1)	(2.5)	2.3	2.6	2.3	2.3	2.7	2.9	2.5
Literary	2.2	2.2	2.5	3.4	3.3	2.5	3.2	3.1	$^{2.9}$
All Elites	2.1	2.5°	2.8	3.2	3.4	2.9	3.3	3.1	2.9
Specialists	2.0	2.5	2.8	3.1	3.1	2.9	3.4	3.2	2.9

F(38,209) = 2.661, significant at .001

^a An example of position 3.0:

Marxism is not an "universal master key" which can be applied without study practice and without analyzing the data of practice. Authors who construct their conclusions merely on superficial analogies, [position 1.0] or interpretations, comparisons, and "analyses" of quotations [position 2.0] and not on the study of facts—on the study of life—need to be reminded of how the founders of Marxism described the significance of the theory they established.

Kommunist, No. 7, 1955.

are more supportive of Party dominance. Comparing the two periods, the trend over time marks a significant change away from strict ideological appeals (Table 13).

TABLE 13. ELITE JUSTIFICATIONS FOR POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS, 1952-57 TO 1959-65

Elites	1952-57	1959–65	% Change
Party	2.8	3.2	+14%
Economic	2.6	3.5	+35%
Legal	2.8	3.5	+25%
Military	2.4	2.6	+ 8%
Literary	2.7	3.0	+11%
All Elites	2.6	3.2	+23%
Specialists	2.6	3.2	+23%

With Specialists in the instrumental range in four of the last five years and showing a 23% increase over time, the hypothesis is generally affirmed. In the 1959-65 period all elites but the military tend to evaluate policies in instrumental terms more conducive to specialist elite participation. Party scores are high; throughout the Khrushchev years from 1957–1963, the Party scored in the instrumental range. This development may qualify as one indicator of what some observers, notably Barrington Moore, foresee as a Soviet potential for "technical-rational" development.⁵

4. PARTICIPATORY VALUES: AN OVERVIEW

Although the hypotheses and categories are analytically distinct, all relate to the basic question of elite participation. By collapsing the categories into one dimension and averaging each elite's score on all five categories, a Grand Mean score is derived which may serve as a general indicator of overall participatory trends in the post-Stalin period (Table 14).

Readily visible at the outset is the year by year instrumental increase for Specialists from 1952 through 1965. Participatory trends are manifested by all the elites (Table 15).

⁵ Terror and Progress—USSR (New York, Harpur Torchbooks, 1954), chap. 7.

TABLE 14. ELITE ATTITUDES TOWARD PARTICIPATION: ALL CATEGORIES COMBINED 1952-1965

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Party	2.3	2.2	2.5	2.3	3.2	3.2	2.2	2.5	2.6
Economic	2.3	2.6	3.2	2.2	3.6	3.4	3.1	3.3	2.9
Legal	1.9	2.3	2.8	3.2	2.9	3.6	3.3	3.2	-2.9
Military	2.	2.2	2.0	2.7	2.5	2.5	3.1	3.0	2.5
Literary	2.2	2.0	3.0	3.0	3.4	2.9	3.2	3.3	2.9
All Elites	2. I	2.2	2.5	2.7	3.1	3.0	3.0	3.1	2.8
Specialists	2.I	2.2	2.7	2.8	3.1	3.1	3.2	3.2	2.8

TABLE 15. ELITE ATTITUDES TOWARD PARTICIPATION: ALL CATEGORIES COMBINED, 1952-57 TO 1959-65

Elites	1952–57	1959-65	% Change
Party	2.3	2.8	+22%
Economic	2.5	3.4	+36%
Legal	2.6	3.2	+23%
Military	2.5	2.7	+ 8%
Literary	2.6	3.2	+23%
All Elites	2.5	3.1	+24%
Specialists	2.6	3.1	+19%

A 24% All-Elite increase in the latter period is significant and indicative of the rapidity of change since Stalin. Thru 1959-65 Specialists scores are in the participatory range and in 1963 and 1965 every specialist elite is over 3.0.

The military is perennially low among the specialists and at times below the Party as well. In all probability this reflects Party efforts to exercise exceptionally rigorous political controls over the military. Although not readily apparent from the figures, Marshal Zhukov's removal in 1957 was a crucial development in Party-military relations. By comparing attitudinal scores from an equal sample of articles from Krasnaya zvezdx for the period immediately preceding and following Zhukov's ouster, the effects of Zhukov's dismissal on the military elite are demonstrated (Table 16).

TABLE 16. MILITARY ATTITUDES SURROUNDING MARSHAL ZHUKOV'S DISMISSAL

Categories	Pre- Zhukov Ouster	Post- Zhukov Ouster	All 1957
Who Makes Policy?	1.7	1.0	1.3
Who Should Make Policy?	3.6	1.5	2.8
Who Makes Decisions?	3.5	2.0	2.9
Who Should Make Decisions?	4.4	2.8	4.1
Authority Source	2.7	1.9	2.6
All Categories Combined	3.3	1.9	2.7

The "price" Khrushchev paid for the military's support against the anti-Party group was for a time exceedingly high. From the data Zhukov's major thrust was for greater autonomy in the decision-making arena: a score of 4.4 represents a virtual denial of Party influence over local level military affairs. Not until 1963—following the Cuban missile crisis—did the military recover from the post-Zhukov crackdown. The decline in military scores following an open confrontation against the Party is a characteristic pattern for all the specialist elites, again demonstrating the Party's capacity to thwart, temporarily, elite participation in the political process.

While a dysrhythmic pattern of elite behavior is typical for all the categories, 1963 marks a crisis year in Party-elite relations, for contrary to earlier developments the party's retreat in 1963 to a more Party dominant position was not, as in the past, accompanied by a general decline for the specialist elites but by an overall Specialist increase to a more instrumental position. In short, Party-elite relations became significantly more conflictful as both Party and elites denied one another a dominant role in the political arena.

III. PARTY-SPECIALIST ELITE RELATIONS

The Party, confronted with more elite participation than it considers desirable and with 6 Secondary support marking the missile crisis as a turning point in military-Party relations is found in Thomas Wolfe, Soviet Strategy at the Crossroads (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1964), and Roman Kolkowicz, The Soviet Military and the Communist Party (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967).

7 See Carl Linden, Khruschhev and the Soviet Leadership (Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1966), for a discussion of the Cuban missile crisis as a variable in Khrushchev's fall and as a possible cause for the Party's loss of control over the elites in 1963 and 1965, esp. pp. 146-147.

TABLE 17. PARTY-ELITE	RELATIONS: ACCOMMOD	DATION OR	CONFLICT:	ALL CATEGORIES
	COMBINED, 195	52-65*

Elites	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
Economic	17	+.35	+.73	12	+.36	+.23	+.91	+.88	+.37
Legal	48	+.07	+.29	+.84	30	+.37	+.03	+.78	+.34
Military	-(.20)	+(.05)	47	+.44	74	69	+.80	+.56	03
Literary	13	22	+.49	+.69	+.16	25	+.97	+.82	+.36
Specialists	24	+.02	+.23	+.45	12	10	+.95	+.77	+.27

^{*} minus scores denote accommodation, plus scores conflict.

still higher elite aspirations, finds it increasingly difficult to enforce mini-max boundaries on the specialist elites. Comparing elite beliefs and values, two types of Party-elite relations may be identified: accommodation or conflict. Accommodation exists when both the Party and specialist elites substantially agree on the allocation or responsibility in policy and decision making. Conflict—opting for mutually exclusive values—exists when the Party and elites substantially disagree on the allocation of responsibility in the political arena.8

Tentatively:

Hypothesis 6: As specialist elite participation increases, Party-elite conflict increases.

And:

Hypothesis 7: As specialist elite participation increases beyond Party dominance, i.e., beyond mini-max boundaries, the intensity of conflict increases.

Focusing on system-wide trends, Partyelite relations may be typed by comparing differential scores on the combined category (Table 17).

All-Year differential scores show that the economic, literary, and legal elites are in conflict with the Party. The military, at -.03, is in a

* In operational terms, accommodation exists when the Party's score on the participatory categories is higher than the elite's score, i.e., when the specialist score is within the Party's prescribed boundary of the political arena. (E.g., if the Party score is 2.90 and the specialist score 2.50, the extent of accommodation is —.40, the minus sign denoting accommodation.) Conflict exists when the specialist elite score is more participatory than that of the Party. (E.g., if the Party score is 2.50 and the elite score 3.00, the level of conflict is +.50, plus signs denoting conflict.) For clarity all mean scores are carried two decimal places in the accommodation conflict tables.

"bare bargain" relationship. The years 1952, 1959, and 1961 are periods of accommodation, 1955, 1957, 1963 and 1965 years of conflict. Since 1959 and 1961 are the only two years in which the party scored in the instrumental range. Party-elite accommodation in these two years is largely due to the Party's permissive definition of the boundaries of the political arena. With +.27 the All-Year conflict score, those years above the mean constitute "crisis years"; rank ordered the crisis years in Party-Specialist relations are 1963, 1965, and 1957, notably, all periods related to succession crises. thereby lending support to the notion that when the Party is internally divided elite participation increases.

On scanning the differential scores of the individual elites an interesting pattern emerges: following an open confrontation against the Party, the elite typically moves from conflict to accommodation, then, in the next sampled year back into a conflict relationship with the Party. For example, note the two-steps-forward, one-step-back pattern for the economic elite in the years from 1955 thru 1959, the legal elite's 1959 accommodating position following the Party's 1958 retreat on the Fundamental Laws, and the military's 1959 score following Marshal Zhukov's ouster. Accommodation, it appears, is enforced accommodation—is a result of successful Party efforts to thwart elite encroachments in the political arena, rather than a sign of a consensual definition of the boundaries of the political system. Within this framework, conflict signifies the Party's inability to control the participatory beliefs and aspirations of the specialist elites.

As predicted in hypothesis 6, Party-elite conflict increases over time (Table 18).

A threefold increase in conflict is significant, especially so when it is recalled that All-Elite participation scores on the combined category increased by 24%, and the Party moved from 2.3 in the early period to a mini-max score of

TABLE 18. PARTY-ELITE RELATIONS: ACCOMMODATION OR CONFLICT ALL CATEGORIES COMBINED, 1952-57 TO 1959-65

Elites	1952-57	1959-62
Economic	+.20	+.60
Legal	+.18	+.47
Military	05	02
Literary	+.21	+.43
Specialists	+.12	+.37

2.8 in 1959-65. In the later period, then, Partyelite conflict increases at a sharper rate than does elite participation, thereby supporting the predicted increase in intensity of conflict as Party dominance is threatened by the Specialist elites.

Conflict characterizes Party-elite relations in the post-Stalin period and in particular in the later years. This conflict is becoming generalized throughout the system. All the dimensions are in conflict (Table 19).

Two inferences may be drawn from this comparison of conflict scores. First, the focus of Party-specialist elite conflict is changing over time: in 1952-57 the question of elite participation on the decision-making level was most in conflict, while in 1959-65 participation in the policy-making arena ranks as the major source of Party-elite conflict. Since specialist elite participation in the policy-making arena threatens the Party's integrative role, this development constitutes a most serious challenge to the Party's position in the Soviet political system.

Secondly, while all dimensions but the perceived boundaries of the decision-making arena are in conflict in 1959-65, this one instance of accommodation is a result of the Party exceeding its mini-max boundaries with a participatory score of 3.1. That responsibility for decision-making is in contention is apparent from the +.73 1959-65 conflict score on who should participate—the Party opting for 2.9 (the absolute maximum level for maintaining dominance in the decision-making arena), the Specialists denying Party dominance with a 3.6 average in 1959-65. Thus, by the later period the 2.5-2.9 mini-max range no longer represents the boundaries of compromise but a field of conflict.

IV. CONCLUSION

Three systemic trends emerge from a review of the data:

1. Elite participatory attitudes show a marked increase over time, reaching the instrumental level in 1959-1965. By plotting All-Elite grand mean scores on the ideological-instrumental continuum this trend is graphically depicted in Figure 2.

With 3.0 corresponding to joint Party-elite participation, the trend is away from Party dominance toward what appears to be a "polyarchical" system, toward what H. Gordon Skilling calls a "pluralism of elites." 10

- 2. Conflict characterizes Party-specialist elite relations in the post-Stain period. Party-elite conflict exists in both periods. In 1952-1957, with a Specialist participation score of 2.5, the extent of Party-elite conflict is +.12, while in 1959-65 the level of Specialist participation climbs to 3.1 and the level of conflict to +.37. In short, as specialist elite participatory attitudes increased by one-quarter, Party-elite conflict showed a threefold increase, despite the Party's move from 2.3 to a mini-max position of 2.8.
- 3. Concomitant with the attitudinal development toward elite participation and the intensification of Party-elite conflict is the trend
- ⁹ Robert A. Dahl, Preface to Democratic Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1956), chap. 3.
- ¹⁰ "Interest Groups and Communist Politics," World Politics, 18 (June, 1966), p. 449.

TABLE 19. PARTY-SPECIALISTS RELATIONS: ACCOMMODATION OR CONFLICT, 1952-65

Categories	1952	1953	1955	1957	1959	1961	1963	1965	All Years
who makes policy?	14	26	08	+.71	47	+.14	+1.13	+1.05	+.26
who should make policy?	69	06	+.82	43	+.49	+.75	+1.15	+.93	+.48
who makes decisions."	+.10	+.23	+.63	+.21	01	-1.13	+1.10	32	+.10 who should make decisions?	11	+.25	17	+1.08	+.15	+.24	+1.02	+1.50	+.50
authority sources	36	04	04	18	•	+.50	+.32	+.71	+.02
All Categories	24	+.02	23	+.45	12	+.10	+.95	+.77	+.27

IDEOLOGICAL		F	'AR'	ey-si	PECIA	LIS	T		INSTRUM	IENTAL
(party dominance)			(partic	ipation	1)			(specialist pa	rticipation)
	1952	1953	1955	1957	1963	1959	1961	1965
***************************************	×	×	×	×	×	×	×	×
1.0	2.0				3.0				4.0	5.0

Fig. 2. The Ideological-Instrumental Continuum All-Elite Scores on All Categories toward an erosion of the ideological foundations of Party dominance—toward what Almond and Powell call the "secularization of values." Over the years all the elites, the Party included, increasingly come to rely on scientific knowledge and expert skills as crucial resources in the decision-making process.

In sum, the Soviet political system is com-

¹¹ Gabriel A. Almond and G. Bingham Powell, Jr., Comparative Politics: A Developmental Approach (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1967), pp. 24-25; the secularization of culture is described as:

the process whereby traditional orientations and attitudes give way to more dynamic decision-making processes involving the gathering of information, the evaluation of information, the laying out of alternative courses of action, the selection of a course of action from among these possible courses, and the means whereby one tests whether or not a given course of action is producing the consequences which were intended.

petitive. By 1959-1965 participatory elite attitudes and Party-elite conflict reach levels which are incompatible with the totalitarian model. The Party's capacity to dominate what Stalin fondly called the "commanding heights" is an empirical question, not an absolute given in the post-Stalin period. This is not to deny that the Party is more powerful than the elites, but rather that the Party is not omnipotent. Party-specialist elite interdependence, not Party dominance, characterizes Party-elite relations. New models of Soviet politics are obviously needed. The conception of the Soviet political system as a monolith is a myth.

¹² See H. Gordon Skilling, op. cit., pp. 449-551; Alex Inkeles, "Models in the Analysis of Soviet Society, Survey, No. 60 (July, 1966), pp. 3-12; Joel J. Schwartz and William R. Keech, "Group Influence on the Policy Process in the Soviet Union," this REVIEW, 840-851.

GROUP INFLUENCE AND THE POLICY PROCESS IN THE SOVIET UNION*

JOEL J. SCHWARTZ AND WILLIAM R. KEECH University of North Carolina

It has become widely recognized that Soviet officials do not formulate public policy in a vacuum, and that, indeed, their deliberations take into account in some fashion the needs and demands of various elements of the society. Further, it has been observed that social groups of various types play a noticeable, if only rudimentary role in articulating interests to the top of the hierarchy. In fact one author has gone so far as to assert that communist policy-making results from a "parallelogram of conflicting forces and interests." While such viewpoints are now far more widely accepted than in the early fifties, relatively little effort has been devoted to illustrating cr illuminating how Soviet public policy in general or even a given Soviet policy can be importantly affected by group activity.

We propose here to make a contribution in that direction. Using the Educational Reform Act of 1958 as an exemplary case, we intend to show how and through what process groups can affect policy outcomes, and by identifying circumstances under which this takes place to generate some hypotheses about when such influence is most likely to recur. In their excellent analysis of Soviet policy formation, Professors Brzezinski and Huntington identify what they call "policy groups," which come closest of any nongovernmental groups to participating in policy formation. These groups, such as the military, industrial managers, agricultural experts and state bureaucrats.

whose scope of activity is directly dependent on the allocation of national resources and which are directly affected by any shift in the institutional distribution of power, . . . advocate to the political leadership certain courses of action; they have their own professional or specialized newspapers which, at times and subject to over-all Party control, can become important vehicles for expressing specific points of view.²

- * The authors wish to express their appreciation to the University of North Carolina Research Council for supporting the research on this subject.
- ¹ H. Gordon Skilling, "Interest Groups and Communist Politics," World Politics, 18 (April, 1966), p. 449.
- ² Zbigniew Brzezinski and Samuel P. Huntington, Political Power: U.S.A./U.S.S.R. (New York, 1963), p. 196.

In this article we will investigate an instance wherein such groups seemed to influence policy with the result of virtually scuttling one of Khrushchev's own major proposals.

We do not mean to challenge the view that ultimate power in the U.S.S.R. resides at the top of the Communist Party hierarchy. Neither do we mean to infer that the top party leadership was forced by a "policy group" to act against its will. We do not suggest that the instance we cite is modal. Indeed it is the best example we are aware of. We hope that the major payoff in this paper will be in showing why things happened as they did. This is the first step in finding out whether and how often to expect them again.

The first major section of the paper will describe the situation we use as a basis for our speculative analysis about the Soviet decision making process. The second will attempt to explain why things happened as they did, and the third will report some hypotheses about when such phenomena are likely to recur.

I. DEBATE OVER THE 1958 ACT

A prominent feature of post-Stalin Russia has been the nationwide discussion of certain legislative proposals. This does not constitute a totally new innovation in the Soviet Union. During the preceding period such important laws as the constitution of 1936 received nationwide discussion before enactment. A few differences, however, deserve mention. First, the frequency of these discussions has substantially increased. Second and more important, the impact of these discussions on the proposed legislation has in some instances been far more than peripheral. This especially applies to the debate which surrounded the Educational Reform Act of 1958. A closer look at this debate will afford us an opportunity to consider how the opinion of various "publics" can influence the policy process.

There can be little doubt about whose initiative lay behind the proposed reform. At the thirteenth Komsomol Congress in April of 1958, First Party Secretary Khrushchev severely criticized the existing school system and demanded fundamental changes.³ This attack seems to have been motivated by three problems facing Soviet society in the mid-fifties, the cause of which Khrushchev linked to the existing school system.

³ Khrushchev's statement can be found in XIII S''ezd vsesoiuznogo leninskogo kommunisticheskogo

First, the Soviet press had unceasingly criticized the denigrative attitudes of the younger generation toward physical labor.4 In the opinion of the First Secretary, the undue emphasis upon classical academic training and the neglect of the polytechnical side of education were largely responsible for this attitude.

Second, competition for admission to higher education had reached an excessive degree and this likewise had caused great concern among political leaders.5 The competition itself has largely been a by-product of changes in the economic and educational systems.

Prior to 1950 the rapid growth of the economy and the underdeveloped secondary educational facilities maintained the demand for skilled technical cadres at a higher level than the supply. Throughout this period the number of available places in higher education exceeded the number of secondary school graduates. The post war years, however, witnessed a remarkable acceleration of secondary school facilities and enrollment. In 1949, out of a total enrollment of thirty-three million pupils only about one million were in grades eight to ten. Four years later the number of pupils in secondary education had risen to four and one half million. Now the annual supply of secondary school graduates greatly exceeded the number of vacancies in higher education. Since the Soviet regime, for reasons of its own, was unwilling to widen the availability of higher education, the gates of universities were closed to millions of youth regardless of their educational attainment.

An inevitable consequence has been the intensification of competition for the available number of places. The pressures for admission souiza molodezhi: stenograficheskii otchet (Moscow 1959), pp. 278-282.

became abnormally high because of the widespread notion that a college degree represents the key to individual advancement and entrance into the new class of Soviet intelligentsia. Consequently, those high school graduates initially denied admission refused to accept their fate. Instead of entering the labor force, many of them became perennial college candidates. Very often they applied to schools whose area of specialization was of no genuine interest to them. But in the absence of alternatives they would often enter an agricultural institute just to be able "to study somewhere." Here again Khrushchev charged that the educational system had bred such attitudes. By allowing students to continue their education uninterruptedly and by stressing almost exclusively academic material, the schools naturally generated the expectation that the path to life lay solely through higher education.

The third problem involved the increasing stratification of Soviet society. The notion that higher education was the key to membership in the "new class" had a firm basis in fact. Yet these educational channels for upward social and political mobility were being drastically constricted as a consequence of their preemption by the incumbent political and bureaucratic elites. Khruschchev himself admitted that in the competition for admission to college the influence of parents often proved more important than the merit of the candidates. He further stated that only thirty to forty per cent of the enrolled students in higher education institutions came from worker and peasant backgrounds.9 The differential access to a prime source of mobility gravely concerned the First Sectetary. Both the content and tenor of his statements clearly indicate that Khrushchev sought to eliminated privilege and inequality from the Soviet educational system. 10

Finally we should mention an additional factor which may have influenced the reform movement. At the time of the debate some western scholars argued that the specifics of Khrushchev's proposals owed much to the serious labor shortage the Soviet economy was about to experience.11 The argument may be ⁴ See, for example, L. Bueva, "Tvorcheskii trud- osnova kommunisticheskogo vospitaniia molodezhi," Kommunist, Vol. 37, No. 3 (Feb., 1961), p. 53; and also Komsomol' skaia pravda, March 2, 1956; February 10, 1957.

⁵ See XIII S'ezd. op. cit., p. 280. See also S. Pavlov, "Sovetskaia molodezh' v bor'be za kommunizm," Kommunist, Vol. 36, No. 4 (March, 1960), p. 63.

⁶ Nicholas DeWitt, Education and Professional Employment in the USSR (Washington, 1961), p. 140.

⁷ In his speech to the XIII Komsomol Congress, Khrushchev noted that "last year higher educational institutions were able to accept ^{400 000} new students, half of them for full time study .--. However, at least 700,000 secondary school graduates failed to gain admission last year to higher or technical schools and between 1953-1956 about 2,200,000 failed to gain admission" XIII S"ezd, op. cit., p. 278.

⁸ Ibid, p. 282.

⁹ Pravda, September 21, 1958.

¹⁰ XIII S"ezd, op. cit., p. 280.

¹³ See, for example, DeWitt, op. cit., p. 15.

briefly summarized as follows. Because of severe war losses and a declining birth rate in the post war period the Soviet Union would have one-third fewer people entering the labor force during the late fifties and early sixties than normally would have been the case. Consequently the ambitious economic growth program could be achieved only if the vast majority of young people were channelled into the active labor force instead of higher education. It is important to note, however, that the Soviet press never cited a labor deficit as cause for the reform. Other evidence also casts doubt apon the validity of this thesis. 12

While there is room for disagreement as to what problems motivated the reform, there is no ambiguity regarding Khrushchev's proposals for dealing with them. In September of 1958, the party secretary published his "thesis" on school reorganization.13 He suggested that continuous acedemic education be abolished and that all students be required to combine work with study. In effect this meant phasing out the ten year school which at that time constituted a completed sceondary education. After finishing a seven or eight year primary school, said Khrushchev, every young person should enter the labor force. Those who wished to prepare themselves for higher education could continue their studies in evening and correspondence schools. Successful students would receive two or three days released time from work to facilitate studying.

The substitution of part time work and study for full time education in secondary day schools had, from Karushchev's point of view, two advantages. First, it would intsill in the younger generation a respectful attitude toward physical labor. Second, it would equalize access to higher education. The secondary day schools had become the province of children from the urban intelligentsia. Evening and correspondence schools, on the other hand, recruited most of their students from worker and peasant families. The difference in the quality of education offered by these two divisions gave the day school graduate an obvious advantage. By fusing the two channels into one undifferentiated system, Khrushchev hoped to eliminate the class bias in Soviet education. The road to a higher education would be the same for all irrespective of the positions or jobs which the parents held in society.

Study in higher educational institutions was also to be put on a part time basis. The student would acquire the first two or three years of his college education through evening or correspondence courses. Thereafter he could complete his training on a full time schedule. Moreover, no individual was to be granted admission to higher education unless he had already worked full time after completing secondary school. Once again we see Khrushchev's determination to deemphasize the purely academic side of education and to enhance the importance of work experience.

If we compare Khrushchev's September Memorandum with the actual law adopted in December 1958 we find that the two differ not only in detail but in basic principle.14 To begin with, the old secondary day school was preserved more or less intact both in form and content. Khrushchev's demand that work be combined with study had received token satisfaction by increasing the number of hours devoted to polytechnical training within the schools. But the quantity and quality of academic subjects had in no way been sacrificed. The law established an eleven year day school to replace the old ten year day school system. The addition of another year permitted greater emphasis upon labor training without simultaneously diluting the quality of academic education. Indeed, the number of hours devoted to purely academic subjects proved to be exactly the same under the new system as it had been under the old.15

The maintenance of continuous secondary full time education must be seen as a rebuff to Khrushchev's demands. When the new law went into effect, it became apparent that nearly all the former ten year schools would continue to operate as part of the new eleven year system. Some figures also suggest that the number of students enrolled in the new system was comparable in size to the two senior grades of the old ten year school. It is true that Khrushchev recognized in his memorandum the need for some full time day schools. But he envisaged ¹² For a refutation of the labor deficit thesis see "Facts and Figures," Bulletin of Radio Free Europe, September 22, 1958.

¹³ See Pravda, September 21, 1958.

¹⁴ For a text of the law see Spravochnik partiinogo rabotnika (Moscow, 1959), pp. 517-533.

¹⁶ For an analysis of this point see an article by Klaus Mehnert in Die Welt, July 18, 1959.

¹⁶ The actual law left this point unclear but later developments indicated that just as many children—about a third of the total—would attend full time high schools as had been the case before the reform. See Thomas Bernstein "Soviet Educational Reform," (M. A. Thesis, Columbia University, 1962), p. 111, and articles in The New York Times, September 2, 1959; Wall Street Journal, June 29, 1960.

that they would operate only during a transitional period and he expected their number to be sharply reduced right from the beginning of the reform.

While the eleven year system might have satisfied the demand that work be combined with study, it could not possibly have achieved Khrushchev's other expressed purpose—the elimination of privilege and inequality. The perpetuation of a bifurcated full time and part time school system insured that inequality would persist. Nevertheless the disadvantages faced by the evening and correspondence student might have significantly diminished had the law incorporated Khrushchev's suggestion regarding releasted time for study. Yet in this area as well important modifications were made. The reorganization decree left this question open and subsequent legislation resulted in a far less liberal policy.17 Under these circumstances the vast majority of college students would continue to come from the full time secondary schools and an inevitable byproduct would be the continuation of class bias in higher education.

The provision for admission to and study in higher educational institutions likewise markedly deviated from Khrushchev's suggestions. Instead of absolutely requiring full time work before admission, the law merely stipulated that priority would be granted those with the record of employment or military service. But precedence for people with production experience already existed before the reorganization of the school system. Thus the wording of the law gave only formal recognition to an on-going practice. It cannot be interpreted as a "concession" to the demands made by Khrushchev in his memorandum.

His insistence upon part time study during the first few college years appears to have been more successfully realized. At least the law accepted it in principle. However, even here some important alterations occurred. The law explicitly exempted from this requirement all students in difficult theoretical disciplines. Similarly, the requirement would be inoperative in both non-technical higher educational institutions and in arts faculties at universities since "factory work for students cannot in these cases be connected with their future ¹⁷ Instead of the two to three days released time from work as suggested by Khruschchev, students in evening schools received only one additional free day for study. See A. I. Shebanova, "O l'gotakh dlia lits sovmeshchaiushchikh rabotu s obucheniem," Sovetskoe gosudarstvo i pravo Vol. 30 (November, 1960), pp. 99–102.

job."18

Generally speaking, the education reform failed to implement the most important goals and purposes which Khrushchev had articulated in his memorandum. What factors can account for the observable disparity between the September proposal and the December law? To answer that question we must look briefly at the discussion which ensued during this period of time. The content of that debate clearly revealed that different societal groups, or at least some members of them, opposed Khrushchev's reform.

Teachers and administrators identified with the ten year school obviously wished to preserve and protect their institutional bailiwicks. But a frontal assault on the First Secretary's ideas would not have been good politics. Instead they opposed the reform more deviously. Essentially they argued that to prepare youth for manual labor it was not necessary to send them after the eighth grade to factories or farms. A much better way would be to bring the factories and farms into the schools by setting up first class workshops. Under these conditions it would be possible to teach pupils the same skills they could learn by entering the labor force. To substantiate their case the proponents of this approach assumed the initiative even before the appearance of Khrushchev's September memorandum. Prior to the opening of the school year in 1958, Y. I. Afanasenko, Minister of Education for the Russian Republic, announced that the number of schools giving training in industrial and agricultural skills would double. He further announced that the Russian Republic had begun experiment with extending secondary schools from ten to eleven years. Under the extended program students would spend half of their time at school and the other half at jobs on farms, in factories, or at construction sites. He mentioned that fifty schools with this program had operaetd the last year and this number would increase to two hundred this year. Here, in embryonic form, was the eleven year school system that became law in December of 1958. Thus, through word and deed, those occupational groups associated with full time secondary education sought to protect the organization they had built with effort and care.19

¹⁸ This point was made by the Soviet Minister of higher education and was reflected in the final law. See V. P. Eliutin, "Soveshchanie rabotnikov vysshei shkoly," Vestnik vysshei shkoly, Vol. 16, No. 10 (October, 1958), p. 9.

¹⁹ Literaturnaia gazeta, August 30, 1958.

Other groups opposed to the reform included higher educational and scientific personnel. Their arguments were perhaps more telling. They warned that it would be impossible under the new system to ensure the supply of highly qualified cadres for economic and societal growth. How can we, they asked, perfect and advance scientific knowledge when new entrants to higher educational schools would have only eight years of regular schooling behind them and who. in the following years, would have forgotten the little they had once learned. Several prominent educators and scientists went so far as to assert that a hiatus between incomplete and complete secondary school as well as between complete secondary school and higher education would result in irreparable damage to the state. For creative work in scientific research often manifests itself when the individual has reached his midtwenties and the acquisition of theoretical knowledge on a large scale demands uninterrupted study.20

The warning of experts reinforced grave doubts raised by many parents. The basic argument of the latter was that a shortened basic school program would adversely affect the physical and intellectual maturation of adolescents. Furthermore, it was said that channeling young people into production at an early age does not give them a chance to adequately choose a skill which best suits them.21 While both of these points had merit, parental views were somewhan suspect because other motives could be reacily discerned. As Khrushchev himself pointed out, many parents were determined that their children receive opportunities for maximum education. They saw his plans as a threat to that opportunity and responded by attacking it. To the extent that pedagogical experts echoed parental concerns. as some did, they served as a linkage between public opinion and political decision makers. By atriculating the interests of an amorphous group in technical terms, the experts transformed their claims into a politically relevant issue.

A few words must also be said about the attitudes of factory managers. Although their opposition did not find explicit expression in the debate, their behavior left few doubts as to where they stood on the issue. Long before the question of reform had arisen, managers had displayed a reluctance to hire and train juvenile workers. Under the new arrangements they would become responsible for all sorts of educational functions for which the factory was ill prepared. Moreover, the large influx of school children and the necessity to train them would inevitably divert managers from their own duties of production and plan fulfillment. In light of this fact it is not surprising that the reform act failed to implement Khrushchev's suggestions regarding released time from work. That would have greatly complicated the managers' tasks and we can assume that their views were transmitted to the proper authorities.22

At this point, our task is to account for the role of groups in forming educational policy in this instance by interpreting a number of facts. The objective facts we must work from are, in summary, that Khrushchev made a far-reaching proposal to deal with a number of educational problems facing the regime, and that the substance of the proposal was radically modified. The major proponent of the reform was obviously Khrushchev himself. The most important—indeed the only—opponents of the changes we can identify are the social groups cited above.

Here we should note that if one quantifies the number of articles which appeared during the debate, the oppositional point of view is clearly a minority. It is quite possible that a "war of memoranda" may have been raging behind the scenes and that during this exchange the minority position was in fact the majority point of view.²³ Whatever may have been the case, it is undeniable that the opposi-

²² For a scathing criticism of managerial attitudes toward juvenile workers see the lead editorial in Pravda, September 25, 1957.

²³ There is some evidence that the opposition was far greater than one would gather from simply reading the official press. For example, relatively few parental criticisms found their way into print. But during 1963–64 when the first author of this paper was conducting interviews in the Soviet Union, it was learned that a very large number of urban middle class parents had strongly criticized Khrushchev's proposals at "PTA" meetings held during the reform debate period. Similarly, Professor William Johnson of the University of Pittsburgh told the same author that opposition among educational officials was far more widespread than the official press revealed. Professor Johnson was in the Soviet Union at the time of the ²⁰ For examples of such arguments see Literaturnia gazeta, June 26, 1958; December 20, 1958; Pravda, September 24, 1958; October 17, 1958; November 19, 1958. K Ia Kondrat'ev and P.A. Shi'lov" O nekotorykh voprosakh universitetskogo obrazovaniia," Vεstnik vysshei shkoly, Vol. 16, No. 10 (October, 1958), pp. 17–23.

²¹ See Pravda, November 30, 1958; December 2, 1958; Literaturnaia gazeta, December 20, 1958.

tional arguments were closer to the form of the finally enacted law.

There are several possible interpretations which would explain the outcome of the educational reform debate. One might argue, for example, that the disparity between the September memorandum and the December law resulted from Khrushchev changing his mind. Once the technocratic elites had pointed out the potentially dangerous consequences inherent in Khrushchev's proposals, the First Secretary simply revised his original position. There is no way, of course, to verify or falsify this interpretation. Since we have no knowledge of Khrushchev's preference schedule or to whom he would most likely listen, we must allow for the possibility that anyone who had a position and stated it prior to the outcome might have influenced Khrushchev. If we accept this interpretation, however, we must resolve certain questions which detract from its credibility.

When Khrushchev spoke to the Komsomol Congress in April, 1958, he stated that the Party Central Committee had, for some time, been discussing the improvement of public education. Presumably, experts had been consulted during the course of such discussions. We might also presume that Khrushchev sounded out experts between April and September when he was preparing a detailed proposal for educational reform. In light of this, it seems unlikely that Khrushchev changed his mind because he heard convincing arguments which had not been made in the far longer period which preceded publication of his memorandum.

It is also important to recall that Khrushchev clearly identified himself personally with the issue of educational reform. He placed his public prestige squarely upon the line. As Richard Neustadt has pointed out, chief executives cannot afford to make indiscriminate public pronouncements. If they are sensitive to the prerequisites of power and influence, they must carefully weigh the consequences which flow from what, when and how they say things.24 All the evidence we have on Khrushchev's career suggests that he was highly sensitive to the requisites of power and influence. Thus not only did the First Secretary have ample opportunity to consult expert opinion on the educational question, but he also had a

Our own inclination then is to discount. though not categorically reject, the possibility that Khrushchev simply changed his mind between September and December. An alternative interpretation is that bureaucratic groups prevailed over the First Secretary and forced him to act against his will.25 To accept this, however, would demand a rewriting of the literature on political power and resources in the Soviet Union that we think is neither necessary nor appropriate. It is quite easy on the other hand to imagine more important actors prevailing over Khrushchev with the social groups associating themselves spuriously, so to speak, with the stronger actors. In suggesting this interpretation we must argue inferentially because the only direct evidence we have about opposition to the proposal relates to the groups. In the section below we will attempt to account for what happened and to assess the role of the social groups in it.

II. THE ROLE OF SOCIAL GROUPS IN SHAPING THE ACT

Brzezinski and Huntington express the orthodox interpretation in arguing that the key political resource in the Soviet Union is control of the party organization, and that such control can be shared only at the top.

Thus, insofar as there are limits on the power of the top leader in the Soviet Union, they stem from his sharing control of the apparat with a small number of colleagues... the principal limits on the power of the Soviet leader are inside the Kremlin.²⁶

We agree, and we feel that those colleagues were crucially important in defeating Khrushchev's proposal. But the opposition of the groups identified above was not coincidental. We submit that the groups were mobilized after the dispute was left unresolved at the top.

Such an argument forces us to take sides in a dispute among Soviet scholars about whether or not there is conflict within the Soviet leadership at times other than succession crises. It is the position of the "conflict" school that policy issues such as those on agriculture, heavy industry, consumer goods, foreign affairs, Stalinism, economic reorganization and education are continuous sources of dispute vested political interest in doing so before publicly stating his position.

debate and is known to have extensive contacts with Soviet educators.

²⁴ Richard Neustadt, Presidential Power (New York, 1964).

²⁵ For an analysis of the reform with this type of implication see David Burg, "Some thoughts on the Soviet educational reform," Bulletin, 6 (March, 1959), 32–36.

²⁶ Brzezinski and Huntington, op. cit., p. 145.

among the top leadership. When one issue is resolved, another is likely to take its place. We think there is strong evidence for this viewpoint, which became more compelling than ever with Khrushchev's political demise in October, 1964.²⁷

In this specific case, Khrushchev stated in April. 1958, that the Party Central Committee was presently engaged in preparing a resolution on the improvement of public education.28 But the September "theses" proved to be simply a note by Khrushchev with the "approval" of the Central Committee, instead of a formal resolution by that august body. This suggests that Khrushchev's educational reform was a highly personal document which lacked support among a substantial element of the top political leadership. Esoteric evidence to support this thesis is provided by the unusual silence of the top political leadership during the educational reform debate. Khrushchev appears to have been the only Praesidium member to have played a significant role in the reform discussions and to have clearly and publicly expressed his attitudes. Sidney Ploss has argued that in the context of Soviet politics the silence of leaders on a topical issue must be construed as disagreement with the expressed viewpoint of their colleagues.29 It is also significant that major amendments to Khrushchev's plan were reflected in the Central Committee resolution on education reform which was finally issued on November 16, 1958.30

If, as we have argued, the important conflict was on the top leadership level, and if the persons on that level have the power to determine policy outcomes, what role did the social groups play? The answer hangs on the nature of conflict among the leaders. It is well known that such conflict involves elements of power struggle and elements of dispute over policy alternatives. Sometimes these elements operate independently of one another; more often they intertwine. Since Khrushchev had decisively defeated his rivals for power in 1957, we can assume that in the case of the education reforms of 1958 the elements of power struggle were less important than at almost any time since Stalin's death, and that the elements of unadulterated policy dispute were correspondingly more important. Indeed, it is unlikely that Khrushchev would have survived such a defeat as this had this policy dispute involved much power struggle.

Insofar as this was really a policy dispute, it involved numerous problem-solving considerations, as we emphasized above. The problems and policy positions associated with them involved a number of questions of judgment about what courses of action would solve the problem, and what the consequences of such action would have for other goals of the regime. It is here that the groups play an important role. Numerous groups have recognized expertise about what problems are in their own area. The ten year school personnel had an authoritative position for a judgment that students could get work experience without radically changing the school organization and curriculum. The scientific community had good claim to special insight into the needs of training scientists. Parents may be viewed as having some legitimate judgment about the needs of adolescents, although this is less apparently expertise. One student of the reform debate has argued that

The most important factors responsible for the change in Khrushchev's original proposals probably were the arguments of experts—the function of expert opinion was to point out to the leadership the possibly harmful consequences to Soviet society of the literal adoption of Khrushchev's original plans.³²

It is hard to identify any concrete resource other than their own recognized expertise which the groups might have used in the dispute. Neither money, votes nor popularity were relevant to its resolution. Only the expert judgment was clearly relevant. The only reasonable alternative would seem to be that the regime may have accorded the positions of these groups a certain legitimacy just because they were group preferences, much as an American public official might yield to a constituent's demand simply because he views it as legitimate and because he may view his job as one of servicing such demands when they are legitimate and do not conflict with other goals. We have no reason to believe that Soviet officials view their jobs this way. Communist ideology, unlike democratic ideology, supplies ²⁷ See for example, Carl A. Linden, Khrushchev and the Soviet Leadership 1957-1964 (Baltimore. 1966).

²⁸ See XIII S''ezd, op. cit., p. 282.

²⁹ See Conflict and Decision-Making in Soviet Russia (Princeton, 1965), p. 17-18.

³⁰ For an analysis of these amendments see Rudolph Schlesinger, "The Educational Reform," Soviet Studies, 10 (April, 1959), 432-444.

²¹ See Brzezinski and Huntington, op. cit., pp. 267, 269-283, 295-300.

³² Bernstein, op. cit., p. 119. See also Brzezinski and Huntington, p. 214.

its own policy goals, rather than depending on public expressions of preference to define them. Besides, we have already seen that the goals of these groups conflicted with the goals of none other than the First Secretary of the Communist Party. It does seem apparent that insofar as groups influenced the outcome of this issue it was through the communication of their expert judgments to people at the top of the hierarchy who were in a position to influence outcomes. The expertise became a resource to be used in making a case that more harm than good would result from the proposed reform.33 We contend that in the Soviet Union policy issues are often decided on the basis of such debates. If such is the case the arguments of persons who are recognized as being knowledgeable can be an important resource for the proponent or opponent of a policy proposal.34

One can see elements of ambiguity in this interpretation of the role of these groups as articulators of expert judgment. It may appear, for example, that the ten year school personnel are looking out for themselves when they oppose changes in their institution. The position of the parents seems even more transparent. There may even have been some selfinterest involved in the position of the scientists. The point is that there is no objective way for either Soviet leaders or American scholars to clearly separate the elements of self-interest from those of expert predictions of dire consequences. We would argue that in western democracies as well there is often an almost indecipherable mixture of preference and prediction in policy debate. For example, 33 In this instance, many political leaders may have been especially inclined to "believe" these arguments. As primary members of the new class, Communist Party cadres had good reason to support the educational status quo. They were among the chief beneficiaries of the existing system. Their children enjoyed advantageous access to full-time secondary and higher education. There is no question that such cadres hoped to perpetuate the provision of such education for their children. Khruschhev's proposals surely must have caused consternation among party cadres which other top party leaders would readily have been conscious of. In this respect the party itself was probably an important constituent pressure group which reinforced the doubts Khrushchev's colleagues had about the widsom of his proposals.

³⁴ For a view of government as problem solving and adapting to environments in which communications play a crucial role, see Karl W. Deutsch, The Nerves of Government (New York, 1963).

social welfare policies in the United States are commonly defended in terms of the prospects of contraction and recession if welfare funds are not fed into the economy. The very ambiguity between preference and prediction may serve to enhance the prospects of group influence through the pressing of interests with the support of expert judgments. The congruence of one's interests with one's predictions is probably less important than the persuasiveness of the predictions and the acknowledged expertness of predictors, no matter whose interests they seem to support.

This almost inevitable mixture of self-interest and expertise provides a channel through which groups in the Soviet Union may influence policy when higher powers seek their judgment. We do not know how common this occurence is, but we are confident that expertise is not used in this way to resolve all policy disputes. We will devote the remainder of this paper to an assessment of conditions leading to such a state, and to hypotheses about when to expect it. Our first set of hypotheses deal with what conditions within the current post-Stalin regime will be associated with such group influence. The second set will attempt to identify what it is about post-Stalinist Russia that makes this possible in contrast with the Stalin era.

III. SOME HYPOTHESES

Leadership conflict has already been cited as an important factor in leading top officials to look to group expertise. It is more than conceivable that monolithic leadership would itself seek expert advice, but we expect that it would do so more surreptitiously than through semi-public debate. More importantly, it could ignore the advice when it chose to rather than in effect being reversed by it. Under conditions of leadership conflict, unresolved disputes may lead some of the participants to broaden the scope of conflict by involving policy groups who might shift the balance. The dynamic involved may be something like the following. There is a split, for example, among the Politbureau, wherein the First Secretary is about to prevail. Holders of the minority position may react to their imminent defeat by contacting their sympathizers among the "policy groups" and urging them to state their position on the issue in their specialized publications, in hopes that the balance of power will shift in their favor when more actors are involved. Broadening the scope of conflict may change the outcome.35

³⁵ See Ploss, op. cit., pp. 61, 84, 286, for other

We hypothesize that the more and greater the disputes on the top policy making level, the more likely it is that policy groups will be involved and listened to.

Brzezinski and Huntington point out that policy-makers are "more responsive to the demands or aspirations of groups" during a struggle for power, which would seem to bear out our point.36 They use Khrushchev's struggle as an example but they themselves point out elsewhere that victors in power, struggles often reverse themselves and adopt the policies advocated by their opponent.37 This pattern would seem to reduce the long term impact of group influence in a power struggle. Our own example is of an unreversed policy decided in a period when the heat of the struggle for power had diminished, whether it had completely died or not. Indeed the absence of a threat to his power may well have made Khrushchev more willing to yield. Brzezinski and Huntington say that while policy is the means to power in succession struggles,

In stable dictatorial conditions, however, the leader may sometimes exercise power in matters that do not affect the security of his position. Then, as with the education reform of 1958, he can tolerate substantial amendments to his original proposal.³⁸

It may be, then, that conditions of tranquility lend themselves more effectively to more or less permanent and far-reaching group influence than do power struggles. Leaders are probably more eager to solicit the support of groups when they are trying to secure power or ward off threats to their position, but group influence may be more permanent and real outside of power struggles. We are not prepared to predict that group influence over policy will be greater under power struggles or more ordinary policy conflicts, but we are prepared to argue that under either of these conditions of leadership conflict group influence will be greater than when leadership is relatively monolithic. Such an hypothesis is at the core of our whole argument.

examples and a discussion of changes in the scope of conflict in the Soviet Union. See also E. E. Scattschneider, The Semisovereign People (New York, 1960), for a discussion of the impact of other kinds of changes in patterns of conflict in the United States.

Bauer, Inkeles and Kluckhohn observe that the failure of a policy may lead the Politburo to adopt an approach that they recently opposed.39 Our example does not directly support this observation, although of course it does not conflict with it, but the important point suggested by it is that the nature of the issue may be an important variable. Pursuing the rationale for our argument of group influence in the educational reforms it is apparent that the problematic character of the issue and the fact that the consequences of a shift were not known with certainty made the judgment of policy groups more important than they would have been otherwise. The obvious implication of this is that the more problematic the consequences of a given course of action the more likely it is that groups would be involved.

A related point that is derived from interest groups politics in western democracies is that groups are likely to be more influential in policy outcomes when the issue is narrow and technical than when the issue is broad and general. In democratic polities, this is partly because other publics are less likely to be paying any attention or to care when the issue is technical. Thus the field is left relatively open for the interested group. A further rationale would be pertinent in the Soviet Union. It is not so much that other actors are or are not concerned; it is rather that technical advice and opinions are at a premium on technical issues.

We hypothesize that the more problematic and technical the issue, the more dependent on expert judgment elites will be. Consequently they will be more likely to consult policy groups, who will thereby be more influential on such issues.

While we hope that the above hypotheses help account for conditions varying within the current post-Stalinist regime which we associated with such group influence as we have illustrated, we do not argue that such influence ever occurred in the Stalin era. We know of no such prominent examples. In this final section we will identify several underlying conditions which in part distinguish the two eras and make groups more important in policy formation, or at least potentially so, in the present.

One important change is that the rigid dictatorial one-man rule of the Stalin period has ³⁶ Op. cit., p. 198.

³⁷ Ibid., pp. 193, 240-252.

³⁸ Ibid., p. 270.

³⁹ Raymond A. Bauer, Alex Inkeles and Clyde Kluckhohn, How the Soviet System Works (New York, 1956), p. 98.

⁴⁰ See Harry Eckstein, Pressure Group Politics (Stanford, 1960).

given way to collective leadership. While there may be one dominant leader, his power is shared among several key figures at the apex of the political structure. Under conditions of a diffused power structure, group influence is far more likely. When power is exercised in an autocratic manner, groups must gain the ear of the all-powerful leader if they are to influence the policy process. During a period of collective leadership the access routes to points of decision making become more numerous. Indeed, the very nature of collective leadership may make political leaders more responsive to group demands.

Carl Linden has argued that the transition from autocracy to oligarchy brings with it a constant struggle for political primacy at the very top. Since no individual is automatically assured of predominant power he must secure that position by winning and holding the support of a combination of societal groupings. His actual or potential rivals, on the other hand, can build their own constituency coalitions by identifying with those elements discontented with an incumbent leader's policy. The politics of leadership struggle then intertwines with the politics of group conflict. It is this interdependence which facilitates group influence on the policy process.⁴²

We hypothesize that the larger and more collective the top leadership, the greater the prospects for the sort of disputes that can lead to the involvement of social groups in policy formation.

The attitudes of those leaders and their methods of social control will also have an important bearing on the prospects for group influence. Under a system of terror individuals are frightened into silent submissiveness and live in an atomized state. Unaware that others share common attitudes, grievances and interests, the terrorized citizen accepts his lot and does not attempt to influence the behavior of decision makers.⁴³ Only when terror subsides does this condition of "pluralistic ignorance" end and the opportunity for interest articulation emerge. For now communication, both through the formal mass media and through informal personal interaction, assumes a more candid and realistic nature. Under these new conditions the communication process itself facilitates group influence. It serves to generate widespread awareness of commonly shared attitudes which in turn becomes a powerful factor inducing groups to influence policy outcomes in their favor.

⁴¹ Dispersion of decision making can assume a "personalized" as well as an institutional form. Instead of separation of powers between executive legislative, and judicial groups one may find a separation of powers between leaders at the top of an outwardly monolithic political structure. See Ploss op. cit., p. 286. On the relationship between group influence and a diffusion of power see Harry Eckstein, "Group Theory and the Comparative Study of Pressure Groups," Comparative Politics edited by Harry Eckstein and David Apter (New York, 1963), p. 396.

The leasning of terror enhances the prospect for group influence in other ways as well. David Easton points out that not all societal claims and demands are converted into policy outputs. Only those which become public issues have this possibility.44 In any polity this requires the patronage and support of some political authority figure. In a system where terror is no longer all-pervasive individuals may be far more likely to risk identification with unresolved issues since the consequences of poor choices are far less serious. At best it may mean that one's power position remains static. At worst it may mean a diminution in political power and perhaps even demotion. But it does not mean internment or execution as it so often did during the Stalinist period. The individual has lost a political battle but not necessarily the war. He remains on the scene with the possibility of recouping his losses and rising once again to top political positions.

We hypothesize that groups will be influential as technocratic spokesmen only when terror subsides and the regime accords them legitimacy of expression of their point of view.

The kind of expert judgment involved in the interest articulation we have described is a function of the nature of the society. Harry Eckstein has noted that modernization increases the significance of groups in the political process.⁴⁵ We suggest that the modernization of Russia positively relates to potential group influence in several ways. First, it in-

- ⁴³ This condition of "pluralistic ignorance" is discussed in Bauer and others, op. cit., p. 263.
- "David Easton "The Analysis of Political Systems" Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings edited by Roy C. Macridis and Bernard E. Brown (Homewood, 1964), pp. 94-95.
- ⁴⁵ "Group Theory and the Comparative Study of Pressure Groups," Comparative Politics, op. cit., p. 395.

⁴² Op. cit., pp. 20-21.

troduces a functional specialization and differentiation into the society which in turn generates a diffusion of interests competing with one another to write the laws of society to their advantage. During the early stages of Soviet rule the party preempts interest articulation not only because it wants to but also, to some degree, because it has to. The society which the Bolsheviks inherited was largely composed of an undifferentiated mass of peasants who had traditionally played a politically passive role. Thus the task of identifying and articulating interests fell to the party by default.

This is not to say that at the time of Bolshevik ascendancy there were no functionally specialized groups with political experience in the protection of their interests. They existed but they were far fewer and far less significant than in the present period. Furthermore, those groups tended to be stigmatized by their identification with the old regime. Thus any demands put forth by them lacked an essential ingredient for success—the presumption of legitimacy. The a priori belief of the party that such individuals were disloyal deprived them of any political currency which could be used in the process of trading support for recognition of their demands.

The modernization of Russia has fundamentally altered this situation. Not only has it generated a complex economic and social pluralism but it also has provided new cadres to staff these skilled groups.46 Those who possess scarce technical capabilities are far more likely to exert influence today than in the past. Such technocrats are products of the new system (the new Soviet man) and their loyalty is not impugned. Consequently, their attempts to influence the political process is perceived in legitimized rather than counterrevolutionary terms. The arguments of scientific, educational, and managerial experts may have been motivated by selfish concerns. But. as we noted earlier these arguments were made in the context of what would best serve the interests of the Soviet Union. Given the fact that these experts are the products of the Soviet period, their counsel cannot be ignored on the grounds that the purveyors of such ideas are politically suspect. The handicap which afflicted old specialists simply does not operate in the contemporary period.

⁴⁶ For an interesting suggestive article on the growth of pluralism in Russian society see Henry L. Roberts, "The Succession to Khrushchev in Perspective," Proceedings of the Academy of Political Science, 28 (April, 1965), 2-12.

Stalin's transformation of Russia insured the increased importance of groups in the policy process in yet another way, although the full impact of this development had to await the dictator's death. It was during the thirties and forties that the politicization of society reached totalitarian dimensions. As politics came to predominate in all areas of life individuals realized that the protection of their interests could be achieved only by gaining access to and influencing the political structure. Unlike western political systems where many issues are resolved in the private sector of the society. the struggle over who gets what when and how in the Soviet Union takes place entirely within the public domain.47 Thus individuals and groups are perforce compelled to focus their attention and pressure on the decision-making process if they hope to maintain or improve their status.

The fourth contribution of modernization stems from the fact that a complex technological society requires stable occupational group membership. As we have already suggested the behavior of managers, teachers, educators and scientists was motivated in part by their desire to protect interests derived from their occupational roles. Such a phenomenon occurs, however, only when individuals have an opportunity to firmly anchor themselves in one occupational role so that it becomes for them an important reference group. This connotes, in turn, an absence of the recurring purge so characteristic of the Stalinist period. Stalin purposefully removed leading strata of important groups lest they become too closely identified with the interests of those groups and more specifically lest they use the economic, social and political resources inherent in those groups for the purpose of delimiting the decision making power of the leader.

Now this is a very costly procedure and one

⁴⁷ We are identifying here a difference of degree. As Eckstein notes, pressure groups have become very active and significant in the postwar political systems of Britain, France, etc., for similar reasons. "One rather obvious reason for this development is the growth of the social service state- of positive government regulating, planning, directing, or entirely drawing into itself all sorts of social activities. This trend has given social groups a greater stake in politics and therefore mobilized them to a much greater extent while making government increasingly dependent on the collaboration and advice, technical or otherwise, of the groups," Comparative Politics op. cit., p. 395.

that a developed society cannot afford to engage in for very long. Managers, teachers, scientists and other specialists are not created overnight and their summary purge means not only a loss of experienced and skilled personnel but also the forfeiture of scarce economic resources invested in their education and training. As Soviet society has become more complex and sophisticated this type of gross economic waste proved intolerable. We do not imply, of course, that high ranking Soviet personnel are no longer removed from their positions. The official press is full of accounts concerning the removal of such personnel. We do argue, however, that "the purge" today significantly differs from its Stalinist predecessor. At present leading occupational strata are not removed in the wholesale manner reminiscent of the thirties and forties. More importantly their removal is seldom if ever accompanied by internment or execution. Most often they seem to be demoted to a less prestigious and influential job but within the same area of expertise.

We hypothesize that the more modern the society, the more dependent it is on technical expertise, which in turn improves the prospects that groups may influence policy when higher powers seek their judgment.⁴⁸

We have attempted in this article to illustrate that under some circumstances social groups can influence policy formation in the Soviet Union. We have specified those circumstances as clearly as we could, providing hypotheses according to which we expect group influence to vary. If our analysis is sound and valid, we hope that it may provide some guidelines for further research on group influence in the comparative study of Communist political systems. Indeed, we hope that some parts of our analysis may be relevant to the study of the role of groups in policy formation in noncommunist political systems as well.

⁴⁸ See S. N. Eisenstadt, The Political Systems of Empires (New York 1963), for a suggestive analysis of the role of skill groups in historical bureaucratic empires.

⁴⁹ See Robert C. Tucker, "On the Study of Comparative Communism," World Politics, 19 (January, 1967), 242-257.

POLITICAL SOCIALIZATION AND THE HIGH SCHOOL CIVICS CURRICULUM IN THE UNITED STATES*

KENNETH P. LANGTON AND M. KENT JENNINGS
University of Michigan

Attempts to map the political development of individuals inevitably become involved with the relative contribution of different socialization agencies throughout the life cycle. Research has focused to a large extent on the family and to a much lesser degree on other agents such as the educational system. At the secondary school level very little has been done to examine systematically the selected aspects of the total school environment. To gain some insight into the role of the formal school environment, this paper will explore the relationship between the civics curriculum and political attitudes and behavior in American high schools.

A number of studies, recently fortified by data from Gabriel Almond and Sidney's Verba's five-nation study, stress the crucial role played by formal education in the political socialization process.

[None of the other variables] compares with the educational variable in the extent to which it seems to determine political attitudes. The uneducated man or the man with limited education is a different political actor from the man who has achieved a high level of education.

Such conclusions would not have greatly surprised the founders of the American republic, for they stressed the importance of education to the success of democratic and republican government. Starting from its early days the educational system incorporated civic training. Textbooks exposing threats to the new republic were being used in American schools by the 1790's. By 1915, the term "civics" became associated with high school courses which emphasized the study of political institutions and citizenship training.²

- * Financial support for the study reported here came from the Dan'orth Foundation and the National Science Foundation. Kenneth Langton also wishes to acknowledge the support of the National Institute of Mental Health. We express our appreciation to Philip Converse for his helpful comments.
- ¹ Gabriel Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton Princeton University Press, 1963), pp. 135-136.
- ² For a short historical background and bibliography on the civics curriculum in American

Throughout this period to the present, however, there has been controversy over the objectives, content, and impact of government courses. While most educators can agree that the development of good citizenship is important, the "good citizen" is something of an ideal type whose attitudes and behavior vary with the values of those defining the construct. Yet when the literature on the development of civics is examined a few consistent themes appear. The civics course should increase the student's knowledge about political institutions and process, make him a more interested and loyal citizen, and increase his understanding of his own rights and the civil rights of others. The literature also implies that good citizenship does not exist in vacuo; it means active political participation as well as loyalty and interest.3

It is apparent that curriculum, teachers, school climate, and peer groups all may contribute to the political socialization process; but the relative contribution of each is unclear. Attempts to assess the actual impact of the school in general, and the curriculum in particular, have produced controversial and inconsistent results. College studies which have examined general curriculum effects (for ex-high schools see, inter alia: I. James Quillen, "Government Oriented Courses in the Secondary School Curriculum," in Donald H. Riddle and Robert S. Cleary (eds.), Political Science in the Social Studies (36 Yearbook, National Council for the Social Studies, 1966, pp. 245–272; and Franklin Patterson, "Citizenship and the High School: Representative Current Practices," in Patterson, et al., The Adolescent Citizen (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1960), Chap. 5.

³ See for example: Educational Policies Commission, Learning the Ways of Democracy: A Case Book in Civic Education (Washington: National Education Association of the United States, 1940), Chap. 1; and Henry W. Holmes, "The Civic Education Project of Cambridge," Phi Delta Kappan, 33 (December, 1951), 168-171.

'For related bibliography and a general discussion of this problem see: James S. Coleman, "Introduction" in James S. Coleman (ed.), Education and Political Development (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965), pp. 18-25.

ample, liberal arts vs natural science programs) upon the political values and beliefs of students have generated differing results. Because of the lack of comparative research designs and controls for pre-selection as well as the differences in institutional cultures being examined, the impact of college curricula is still an open question.

Other inquiries have been more focused. Arthur Kornhauser⁷ and Albert Somit, ⁸ among others, used student panel studies to measure attitude change resulting from exposure to one or more specific courses. While Kornhauser found significant change in attitudes toward liberal economic positions among students in ⁵ C. Robert Pace, "What Kind of Citizens Do College Graduates Become," Journal of General Education, 3 (April, 1949), 197-202; W. H. Holtzman, "Attitudes of College Men Toward Non-Segregation in Texas Schools," Public Opinion Quarterly, 20 (1956), 559-569; Theodore Newcomb, Personality and Social Change (New York: Dryden, 1943); Rose Goldsen, et al., What College Students Think (Princeton: Van Nostrand, 1960): A. J. Drucker and H. H. Remmers, "Citizenship Attitudes of Graduated Seniors at Purdue University," Journal of Educational Psychology, 42 (1951), 231-235; and Irvin Lehman, "Changes In Attitudes And Values Associated With College Attendance," Journal of Educational Psychology, 57 (April, 1966), 89-98.

6 Allen H. Barton, Studying the Effects of College Education (New Haven: Edward Hazen Foundation, 1959), p. 76; Charles G. McClintock and Henry A. Turner, "The Impact of College upon Political Knowledge, Participation, and Values," Human Relations, 15 (May, 1962), 163–176; and Theodore M. Newcomb, "The General Nature of Peer Group Influence," in Theodore M. Newcomb and Everett K. Wilson, College Peer Groups (Chicago: Aldine, 1966), p. 2.

⁷ Arthur Kornhauser, "Changes in the Information and Attitudes of Students in an Economics Class, "Journal of Educational Research, 22 (1930), 288-308.

8 Albert Somit, et al., "The Effect of the Introductory Political Science Course on Student Attitudes Toward Political Participation," this REVIEW, 52 (December, 1958), 1129-1132; Marvin Schick and Albert Somit, "The Failure to Teach Political Activity," The American Behavioral Scientist, 6 (January, 1963), 5-8; James A. Robinson, et al., "Teaching with Inter-Nation Simulation and Case Studies," this Review, 60 (March, 1966), 53-65; and Charles Garrison, "The Introductory Political Science Course As An Agent of Political Socialization" (Unpublished Dissertation, University of Oregon, 1966).

an economics class, Somit concluded that introductory courses in political science which emphasized personal political participation had no significant impact on the students' own attitudes along that dimension.

At the high school level the outcome of research on the association between curriculum and political socialization has also been mixed. Moreover, the conclusions of these studies are often hampered by their lack of generalizing power to broader universes of students and by the rather restricted nature of the dimensions being studied.

In a quasi-experimental study of three Boston-area high schools, Edgar Litt found that while civics courses had little impact upon students' attitudes toward political participation, these courses did affect students' "political chauvinism" and "support of the democratic creed." Experimental pedagogical methods have also resulted in some observable short term cognitive and affective changes.10 However, other studies of the relationship between formal courses in social studies and politically relevant attitudes report either inconclusive or negative results. The early New York Regent's Inquiry on Citizenship Education, which found that the quantity of work done in social studies was not reflected in changed "citizenship" attitudes, was later echoed by the Syracuse and Kansas studies of citizenship¹¹ and data from the Purdue Opinion Panel.12

Almond and Verba asked adult respondents in their comparative study to recall if any time was spent in their school teaching about politics and government. They compared the level

⁹ Edgar Litt, "Civic Education Norms and Political Indoctrination," American Sociological Review, 28 (February, 1963), 69-75.

¹⁰ See, e.g., C. Benjamin Cox and Jack E. Cousins, "Teaching Social Studies in Secondary Schools and Colleges," in Byron Massialas and Frederick R. Smith (eds.), New Challenges in the Social Studies (Belmont, California: Wadsworth Publishing Company, Inc., 1965), Chap. 4; and Robert E. Mainer, "Attitude Change in Intergroup Programs," in H. H. Remmers (ed.), Anti-Democratic Attitudes in American Schools (Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1963), pp. 122-154.

¹¹ Franklin Patterson, et al., op. cit., pp. 71-73; Roy A. Price, "Citizenship Studies in Syracuse," Phi Delta Kappan, 33 (December, 1951), 179-181; and Earl E. Edgar, "Kansas Study of Education for Citizenship," ibid., 175-178.

¹² H. H. Remmers and D. H. Radler, The American Teenager (New York: Charter, 1962), p. 195.

of subjective political competence of individuals who reported that time was spent in their school teaching about politics with those who reported that it was not. The authors indicate that the data show "a relatively clear connection between manifest political teaching and political competence in the United States, Britain, and Mexico." They conclude that manifest teaching about politics can increase an individual's sense of political competence, but this is less likely to happen in nations (like Germany and Italy) whose educational systems have been dominated for much of the life span of the respondents by anti-democratic philosophies.

In addition to the mixed findings of various studies, there is also some question as to the potential of the secondary school for political socialization. It is possible that by the time students reach high school many of their political orientations have crystallized or have reached a temporary plateau. Recent research¹⁴ on the political socialization of American preadults argues that the elementary school years are the most important for the formation of basic political orientations.¹⁵ It is also possible that the high school civics courses to which students are exposed offer little that is new to them, that they simply provide another layer of information which is essentially redundant.

Granting either or both of these points one should, perhaps, not expect dramatic movements simply on the basis of one or two courses. However, some incremental changes should be visible. One might also hypothesize differential incremental effects according to some central characteristics of the students, their families, the school, the curriculum, or the political orientations themselves. It is to an examination of such possibilities that we now turn.

¹³ Almond and Verba, op. cit., p. 361.

¹⁴ Robert D. Hess and David Easton, "The Role of the Elementary School in Political Socialization," The School Review, 70 (1962), 257-265; David Easton and Robert Hess, "The Child's Political World," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 6 (August, 1962), 229-246; Robert Hess and Judith Torney, The Development of Political Attitudes In Children (Chicago: Aldine, 1967); and Fred Greenstein, Children And Politics (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1965).

¹⁵ On the other hand, Adelson and O'Neil find important political cognitive development taking place during the adolescent years. See Joseph Adelson and Robert O'Neil, "The Growth of Political Ideas in Adolescence: The Sense of Community," Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 4 (September, 1966), 295–306.

I. STUDY DESIGN

The data to be employed come from a study conducted by the Survey Research Center of The University of Michigan in the spring of 1965. Interviews were held with a national probability sample of 1669 high school seniors distributed among 97 secondary schools (public and non-public). An important feature of the student sample is that it was drawn from a universe of 12th graders; school dropouts in that age cohort are therefore automatically eliminated. For all but 6% of the sample each student's mother or father, designated randomly, was interviewed. Additional interviews were conducted with 317 of the students' most relevant social studies teachers. Finally, in order to determine some general academic and structural characteristics of each school, interviews and questionnaires were administered to school officials.

The particular social studies courses taken by each student were determined in the following way. In each school a list was made of the social studies courses offered during grades 10–12. As each individual course offered in a school was read to the respondent, he indicated if and when he had taken it during the past three years—that is during the 10th, 11th and 12th grades.

We were particularly interested in those courses which are commonly referred to as high school government or civics courses. A broad array of courses were included under this rubric. They ranged from the usual American Government and Problems of Democracy courses, through Political Science, Americanism, Communism and Democracy, to International Relations, World Citizenship, and Comparative Politics. Contemporary History courses which were essentially studies of current events were also included in this dimension. Normally, however, we distinguished between history and civics courses. While both types of courses (as well as other social studies) may have an impact on students' political orientations, in this paper we shall generally limit our focus to the civics curriculum.

Each student in the sample was scored according to the number of government courses he had taken during his three years of high school. About one-third of the students had not taken such a course, and of those who had the great majority had taken no more than one (Table 1). Therefore in the following analysis when we talk about the direct impact of the

Table 1. Number and type of civics courses taken by american high school seniors $\hbox{ in grades } 10{-}12$

Number of Courses	Percent	Type of Course Among Those Taking A Course	Percent
0	32	American Government	67
1	59	American Problems	37
2+	9	Other	10
	100%		114%
N =	(2060)b	N =	=(1401)

^a Percentages exceed 100 because some students have taken more than one course.

civics curriculum upon political orientations it will mean for most students the difference between no civics course and one civics course. Since a civics course is usually taken by requirement, we may assume that there is little self-selection bias at work.¹⁶

Table 1 also shows a breakdown of the type of course experienced. The division is between the more frequently-taken American Government course, the less popular American Problems course, and a sprinkling of more esoteric titles. The "Problems" course is commonly called Problems of Democracy, Contemporary Problems, Problems of American Life, and so forth. Schools typically offer either American Government or American Problems although they are occasionally found together, and infrequently—in nonpublic or especially small schools-neither course may be offered.17 Whereas the American Government courses focus heavily on the forms, structures, backgrounds, and traditions of American political life, the Problems courses are more eelectic in terms of the disciplines utilized, emphasize a wider scope of socio-political activities, are more contemporary in nature, and are typically organized around major problems in American public life. Because of the different emphases and formats of the two types of courses, educators have suggested that they will have differential effects.

¹⁶ A regional pattern is present. Appreciably more students in the West and Midwest had taken such courses than was true in the South and, especially, in the Northeast. It appears that this variation did not influence the findings reported below. Other personal and school characteristics did not discriminate among takers and nontakers of civics courses.

¹⁷ For a more detailed account of social studies curriculum offerings see M. Kent Jennings, "Correlates of the Social Studies Curriculum: Grades 10–12," in Benjamin Cox and Byron Massialas (eds.), Social Studies in the United States (New York: Harcourt, Brace, & World, 1967).

In selecting the dependent variables for this analysis, we attempted to touch on many of the consistent themes in the "civics" literature which are germane for political science. Rather than examine only one or two variables, we have elected to pursue a wide variety so that the possible variations in effects may be uncovered.

1. Political knowledge and sophistication.—
For better or worse, performance on factual examinations is a prime way in which the success of a course and teacher is evaluated. Students were asked six questions dealing with recent and contemporary political events and personalities. The pattern of responses formed a Guttman-type political knowledge scale. Another measure (explained below), touching more directly on political sophistication, ascertained the students' perception of ideological differences between political parties.

2. Political interest.—A hallmark of the "shoulds" of political education in the United States is the shaping of citizens to take an active interest in political affairs. Although numerous studies of adults suggest that the schools and other socializing agents fall short of the goals envisioned by the authors of civics textbooks, it is nevertheless possible that these achievements would be even less impressive in the absence of intensive inculcation in the civics courses. Among many alternative measures of interest available in the interview protocols, we shall rely on the answers to a straightforward inquiry. 19

18 Respondents were asked to identify (1) the number of years a U.S. Senator serves; (2) the country Marshall Tito leads; (3) the number of members on the U.S. Supreme Court; (4) the name of the Governor of their state; (5) the nation that during WWII "had a great many concentration camps for Jews"; and (5) whether President Franklin Roosevelt was a Republican or a Democrat.

The six items formed a Guttman scale with a coefficient of reproducibility (CR) of .92.

19 "Some people seem to think about what's going on in government and public affairs most of b This is a weighted N resulting from a factor applied to correct for unavoidably imprecise estimates made at the time the sampling frame was constructed. All results reported here are based on weighted N's. In the case of multivariate analysis using data from the parents as well as students, the base weighted N will be 1927, a reduction occasioned by the fact that interviews were not held with 6% of the students' parents.

- 3. Spectator politicization.—A more direct measure of interest in political matters is the degree to which students consume political content in the mass media. If the civics curriculum spurs an interest in politics, it should be reflected in greater media consumption. Separate soundings were taken of the students' behavior vis-a-vis television, newspapers, and magazines.²⁰
- 4. Political discourse.—Even more dramatic evidence of the success of the civics experience would be an upsurge in the pre-adult's level of politically-tinged dialogue. In view of the fact that there are relatively few ways in which the high school senior can (or does) assume active political roles, the frequency of political conversations is not an improbable surrogate for forms of adult-level political activity. For present purposes the student's report of the frequency with which he discusses politics with his peers will be used.²¹
- 5. Political efficacy.—The belief that one can affect political outcomes is a vital element of political behavior, and Easton and Dennis have demonstrated the rising sense of efficacy as the child progresses through elementary school.²² Much of civic education's thrust is toward developing a sense of civic competence. Efficacy was measured by the students' responses to two items.²³ the time, whether there's an election going on or not. Others aren't that interested. Would you say you follow what's going on in government and public affairs most of the time, some of the time, only now and then or hardly at all?"

²⁰ Students were asked how often they "read about public affairs and politics" in newspapers or magazines and how often they watched "any programs about public affairs, politics, and the news on television."

²¹ "Do you talk about public affairs and politics with your friends outside of classes?" (If yes) "How often would you say that is?"

²² David Easton and Jack Dennis, "The Child's Acquisition of Regime Norms: Political Efficacy," this Review, 61 (March, 1967), 25-38; Almond and Verba, op. cit., Chap. 12; and Angus Campbell, et al., The American Voter (New York: John Wiley, 1960), pp. 103-105, 480-481.

²² The following two items were used to construct a three point political efficacy scale with a CR of .94.

- (1) Sometimes politics and government seem so complicated that a person like me can't really understand what's going on.
- (2) Voting is the only way that people like my mother and father can have any say about how the government runs things.

- 6. Political cynicism.—While trying to create interest in politics and a sense of efficacy, the civics curriculum almost inevitably tries to discourage feelings of mistrust and cynicism toward the government. Indeed, cynicism seems in part to be antithetical to a feeling of civic competence.²⁴ A six-item scale was used to arrange the students on a political cynicism dimension.²⁵
- 7. Civic tolerance.—Considerable discussion exists in the citizenship literature on the necessity for inculcating norms of civic tolerance. Even though the curriculum materials and the teachers often fail to grapple with the complexities of these norms, a proper and necessary role of civics courses is seen as creating support for the "Bill of Rights," due process, freedom of speech, recognition of legitimate diversity, and so forth. In order to probe the effect of exposure to civics courses on these types of beliefs, a three-item civic tolerance scale was devised. 27
- ²⁴ Robert E. Agger, Marshall Goldstein, and Stanley Pearl, "Political Cynicism: Measurement and Meaning," The Journal of Politics, 23 (August, 1961) 477-506.
- ²⁵ The following six items formed a political cynicism scale which had a CR of .92.
 - (1) Over the years, how much attention do you feel the government pays to what the people think when it decides what to do...?
 - (2) Do you think that quite a few of the people running the government are a little crooked not very many are, or do you think hardly any of them are?
 - (3) Do you think that people in government waste a lot of money we pay in taxes, waste some of it, or don't waste very much of it?
 - (4) How much of the time do you think you can trust the government in Washington to do what is right?
 - (5) Do you feel that almost all of the people running the government are smart people who usually know what they are doing, or do you think that quite a few of them don't seem to know what they are doing?
 - (6) Would you say the government is pretty much run by a few big interests looking out for themselves or that it is run for the benefit of all the people?

²⁶ See Byron Massialas, "Teaching American Government in High School," in Cox and Massialas, op. cit., pp. 167-195.

²⁷ The following three agree-disagree questions formed a Guttman scale with a CR of .95.

(1) If a person wanted to make a speech in this

8. Participative orientation.—Instilling a propensity toward participation in public life becomes especially evident as a civic education goal as the adolescent approaches legal age. In particular, one might hypothesize that the participation ethic would displace a more basic and early-formed orientation such as loyalty to country. Responses to an open-ended question tapping the students' view of the "good citizen" form the basis of the participative-orientation measure.²⁸

Before turning to the findings it will be instructive to consider some of the factors which could affect the relationship between exposure to civics and the dependent variables. For example, one could argue that a positive association between exposure and political knowledge may only be found among students from less educated and less politicized families. This "sponge" theory maintains that children from more culturally deprived families are less likely to be saturated with political knowledge and interest in the family environment: therefore they are more likely to be affected by the civics curriculum when they enter high school. Conversely, one might hypothesize that it is the child from the more highly educated family who is most likely to have developed the minimal learning skills and sensitivity to politics which would allow him to respond to civics instruction.

The academic quality of the high school could also affect the efficacy of the civics curriculum. A school that sends 75% of its seniors on to a four year college might be presumed to have a significantly different and better academic program than a school that sends only 15% of its students.

Since we are focusing on civics courses rather than history courses—taken in moderate to heavy amounts by virtually all high school students—we also want to be sure that we are measuring the independent effect of the civics curriculum and not the interactive effect of the history courses. One can easily think of other possible predictor variables: grade average, sex, political interest, and so forth.

The problem of multiple predictors clearly calls for a form of multivariate analysis. We chose the Multiple Classification Analysis Program (MCA).²⁹ This program is useful for examining the relationship of each of several predictors to a dependent variable at a zero order level and while the other predictors are held constant. Eta coefficients and partial beta coefficients indicate the magnitudes of the relationships for zero order and partial correlations, respectively. The program assumes additive effects and combines some features of both multiple regression and analysis of variance techniques. Unlike conventional regression procedures the program allows predictor variables in the form of nominal as well as higher order scales and it does not require or assume linearity of regression.

In the subsequent multivariate analysis seven variables were held constant while the independent effect of the civics curriculum was examined: 1) quality of the school;³⁰ 2) grade average; 3) sex; 4) student's political interest;³¹ 5) the number of history courses taken; 6) parental education; and 7) parental politicization (discussion of politics within the family). Information on the latter two variables was based on interviews held with the students' parents, not from students' reports, as is commonly the case.

II. FINDINGS FOR THE WHOLE SAMPLE

One of the first points to be established here is that scant differences emerge in the dependent variables as a consequence of whether the student had taken a more traditional American Government course or the more topicallyoriented, wider ranging American Problems course. There is a consistent, though quite small tendency for students taking the former course to consume more political content in newspapers, magazines, and on television, and to discuss politics with peers more frequently. But compared with students taking the American Problems course they more often stress the loyalty (48% versus 37%) rather than the participation aspect of good citizenship behavior. Aside from these rather meager differences, students taking the two major types of courses are virtually indistinguishable in terms community against religion, he should be allowed to speak.

⁽²⁾ If a Communist were legally elected to some public office around here, the people should allow him to take office.

⁽³⁾ The American system of government is one that all nations should have.

²⁸ The question wording is found on page 27.

²⁰ Frank Andrews, James Morgan, and John Sonquist, Multiple Classification Analysis (Ann Arbor, Michigan: Institute for Social Research, University of Michigan, 1967).

⁸⁰ School academic quality is based on the percent of seniors going on to four year colleges or universities in each school. This information was obtained from school sources.

³¹ When political interest was examined as a dependent variable in the MCA analysis it was, of course, dropped as a control variable.

of their political orientations. Knowing this, we may proceed with some confidence to treat them (and those taking a sprinkling of other courses) together and to focus our analysis primarily on the amount of exposure, viz., none, one, or two courses during grades 10–12.

An overview of the results offers strikingly little support for the impact of the curriculum. It is true that the direction of the findings is generally consonant with the predictions advanced above. That is, the more civics courses the student has had the more likely he is to be knowledgeable, to be interested in politics. to expose himself to the political content of the mass media, to have more political discourse, to feel more efficacious, to espouse a participative (versus loyalty) orientation, and to show more civic tolerance. The possible exception to the pattern is the curvilinear relationship between course-taking and political cynicism. Thus, the claims made for the importance of the civic education courses in the senior high school are vindicated if one only considers the direction of the results.

However, it is perfectly obvious from the size of the correlations that the magnitude of the relationships are extremely weak, in most instances bordering on the trivia. The highest positive eta coefficient is .06, and the highest partial beta is but .11 (for political knowledge).³² Our earlier anticipation that course-taking among older adolescents might result in only incremental changes is borne out with a vengeance. Indeed, the increments are so miniscule as to raise serious questions about the ²² For convenience partial beta coefficients will be referred to as betas or beta coefficients. The beta coefficient is directly analogous to the eta, but is based on the adjusted rather than the raw mean. It provides a measure of the ability of the predictor to explain variation in the dependent variable after adjusting for the effects of all other predictors. This is not in terms of percent of variance explained. The term beta is used because "the measure is analogous to the standardized regression coefficient, i.e., the regression coefficient multiplied by the standard deviation of the predictor and divided by the standard deviation of the dependent variable, so that the result is a measure of the number of standard deviation units the dependent variable moves when the explanatory variable changes by one standard deviation." Andrews, op. cit., p. 22.

As mentioned earlier, the MCA program assumes additive effects. While some interaction may be present, a close scrutiny of the statistical analysis makes it doubtful if the impact is particularly large.

utility of investing in government courses in the senior high school, at least as these courses are presently constituted. Furthermore, when we tested the impact of the history curriculum under the same control conditions it was as low or lower than the civics curriculum.³³

It could be argued that the inclusion of a key variable, viz., the quality and type of teaching. would produce differential effects among those students who have taken one or more courses. This may be true, and in another place this possibility will be examined in detail. However, given the meager zero-order correlations, it is doubtful if that impact will be particularly large.34 Another factor which might elicit differential patterns among students taking such courses is the content of the materials used and the nature of the classroom discourse. This contingency, too, will be dealt with elsewhere, but it faces in large part the same difficulty as does the teacher contingency. It also confronts the reality of considerable uniformity in curriculum materials and the domination of the textbook market by a few leading books.35

Do these findings mean that the political orientations of pre-adults are essentially refractory to change during the senior high school years? This possibility cannot be easily dismissed. Certainly the pre-high schooler has already undergone, especially in the American context, several years of intensive formal and informal political socialization. He may have developed, by the time he reaches secondary school, a resistance to further formal socialization at this stage in his life cycle. But there is also an alternative or additional explanation. If the course work represents information redundancy, there is little reason to expect even modest alterations. By redundancy we mean not only repetition of previous instruction, though there is surely a surfeit of that. We mean also redundancy in the sense of duplicating cues from other information sources, particularly the mass media, formal organizations, and primary groups. Students not taking civics courses are probably exposed to these other sources in approximately the same doses as those enrolled in the courses. Assuming that this is the case, and that the courses provide relatively few new inputs, the consequence would be lack of differentiation between course takers and non-course takers.

³³ In a preliminary analysis the impact of taking social studies courses as a whole was examined. The number of social studies courses taken accounted for little difference in the students' orientations.

³⁴ We were interested in what effect the students' perceptions of the quality of their civies teachers and courses as well as the sex of the teacher might have on the relationships. Students were asked to rank each of the courses they had taken from extremely good to extremely poor. They also ranked the quality of their teachers in the same way. Prior to the MCA analysis the relationship between the civics curriculum and the dependent variables was examined within contingency tables controlled for course and teacher ratings. Course and teacher ratings had no consistent, significant effect upon the relationships. Controls for the sex of the student's teacher also produced no significant differences.

²⁵ See James P. Shaver, "Reflective Thinking, Values, and Social Studies Textbooks," School Review, 73 (1965), 226-257; Frederick R. Smith and John J. Patrick, "Civics: Relating Social Study to Social Reality," and Byron Massialas, "Teaching American Government in High School," both in Cox and Massialas (eds.), op. cit., pp. 105-127, 167-195.

For these reasons it would be well to look at courses and teachers which do not generate information redundancy. That is the virtue of examining the finer grain of teacher performance and course content, as proposed above. Another strategy, and one to be adopted in the remainder of this paper, would be to look at subpopulations of pre-adults where redundancy might be less frequent than for pre-adults in general. Less redundancy could be occasioned either by infusion of new information where relatively little existed before, or by information which conflicts with information coming from other sources.

Among the universe of subpopulations one could utilize, perhaps none is as distinctive as that of the Negro minority. The unique situation of Negroes in American social and political life and the dynamics now at work have been well-documented. Because of cultural differ-

36 In addition to such classics as Gunnar Myrdal's An American Dilemma (New York: Harper & Bros., 1944), see more recent works: Thomas F. Pettigrew, A Profile of the American Negro (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand, 1964); William Brink and Louis Harris, The Negro Revolution in America (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1964); Kenneth B. Clark, Dark Ghetto (New York: Harper & Row, 1965); Lewis Killian and Charles Grigg, Racial Crises in America (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1964); Donald R. Matthews and James W. Prothro, Negroes and the New Southern Politics (New York: Harcourt, Brace, & World, 1966); Dwaine Marvick, "The Political Socialization of the American Negro," The Annals, 361 (September, 1965), 112-127; and ences between the White majority and the Negro minority, the frequent exclusion of Negroes from socio-political life, the contemporary civil rights ferment, and the less privileged position of Negroes in our society, it seems likely that information redundancy would occur less often among the Negro preadults. Therefore, the student sample was divided along racial lines.

III. FINDINGS FOR THE NEGRO SUBSAMPLE

Although the Negro portion of the sample is not as large as one might desire for extensive analysis (raw N=186, weighted N=208), it is sufficiently large to permit gross comparisons with White students of similar social characteristics and also permits some analysis within the Negro subpopulation. The subsample size and the fact that the dropout rate is appreciably higher among Negroes than Whites underscores the admonition that this subsample should not be extrapolated to the Negro age cohort in general. It should also be noted that the subsample contains twelve respondents classified as non-Whites other than Negro.

Demographically, the Negro students are located disproportionately in the South (55% versus 25% for Whites) and come from more disadvantaged backgrounds than do the Whites The latter is true despite the fact that the backgrounds of Negro students who have persevered through high school are undoubtedly less deprived than are those of their cohort who dropped out. Social status differences between Negroes and Whites are more pronounced in the South than in the North.

Negro and White students have taken civics courses in approximately the same proportions (Negroes 63%, Whites 68%). When the association between the civics curriculum and the dependent variables discussed above was reexamined within both racial groups, some intriguing differences appeared. These caused us to reassess the place of the civics curriculum in the political socialization of American youth.

Political Knowledge. White students score more highly on the knowledge scale than do Negroes; and when parents' education is controlled the differences persist at all levels. Civics courses have little effect on the absolute political knowledge level of whites (beta = .08). The number of courses taken by Negroes, on the other hand, is significantly associated with their political knowledge score (beta = .30).

William C. Kvaraceus, et al., Negro Self Concept: Implication for School and Citizenship (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., 1965).

The civics curriculum is an important source of political knowledge for Negroes and, as we shall see later, appears in some cases to substitute for political information gathering in the media.

Although the complex multivariate analysis holds parental education constant, it does not allow us to observe easily the singular role of this crucial socialization factor upon the relationship between curriculum and political orientations. Therefore, contingency tables were constructed with parental education controlled for all relationships between the number of government courses taken on the one hand, and each political orientation on the other. All instances in which education makes a distinctive imprint are reported.37 For the case at hand-political knowledge-controls for parental education did not alter the effects of the curriculum among either Whites or Negroes.

In another attempt to measure political knowledge as well as ideological sophistication, students were asked which political party they thought was most conservative or liberal. Each party has its "liberal" and "conservative" elements, but studies of roll call voting in Congress as well as the commentary of the politically aware places the Republican party somewhat to the right of the Democrats. Forty-five percent of the students said that the Republicans were more conservative than the Democrats. Thirty-eight percent confessed to not knowing the answer.

In answering this question the student was faced with a problem not of his own making. It can be presumed that some respondents made a random choice (i.e., guessed) to extricate themselves. One gauge of the frequency of guessing is how often the Democrats were assigned a conservative position (17%). If we make the reasonable assumption that this form of random guess is symmetric around the midpoint of the response dimension, we can say that an additional 17% of the students guessed "correctly" by putting the Republicans in the conservative column. Accordingly, we may deduct 17% from the 45% who said Republicans were more conservative, leaving 28% who are able to connect the conservative label to the Republican party.38

³⁷ Parental education was used as a summary control variable because we felt that it best captures the tone of the whole family environment as well as other sources of socialization.

³⁸ We have borrowed this method of adjusting "correct" answers from Donald E. Stokes, "Ideological Competition of British Parties," paper

TABLE 2. THE RELATION BETWEEN THE CIVICS CURRICULUM AND KNOWING THE IDEOLOGICAL POSITION OF THE REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRAT PARTIES AMONG NEGRO AND WHITE STUDENTS

Number of Civics		Adjusted : Correct	Percentag Respons
Courses	Courses Negro White
	%	N	%	N
0	0	(72)	29	(543)
1+	19	(122)	31	(1184)

We are less interested in the absolute number of students who are able to connect symbol with party than with the role the civics curriculum plays in this process. Again we see that course work has little impact on White students while the percent of Negroes who "know" the parties ideological position increases as they take more civics courses (Table 2).

These findings using both measures of political knowledge offer an excellent example of redundancy in operation. The clear inference as to why the Negro students' responses are "improved" by taking the courses is that new information is being added where relatively less existed before. White students enrolled in the courses appear to receive nothing beyond that to which their non-enrolled cohorts are being exposed. This, coupled with the great lead which Whites in general already have over the Negro students, makes for greater redundancy among Whites than Negroes.

One should not deduce from these results that the white students have a firm grasp on political knowledge; as Table 2 and other data indicate, they clearly do not. Rather, White students have reached a saturation or quota level which is impervious to change by the civics curriculum. From their relatively lower start the Negro students' knowledge level can be increased by exposure to the civics curriculum.

Political Efficacy and Political Cynicism. Almost twice as many Negro students as White scored low on the political efficacy scale. When the effect of parental education is partialed out the racial differences remain at each educational level, although they are somewhat diminished. Interestingly enough, the difference in the percentage of those who scored low is presented at 1964 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, Chicago, Illinois.

TABLE 3. THE RELATION BETWEEN THE NUMBER OF CIVICS COURSES TAKEN AND POLITICAL EFFICACY AMONG NEGRO STUDENTS, BY PARENTAL EDUCATION

3	Elementary	,
Pol	Political Efficacy
				Gamma
Low	Medium	High
07		-	N
	-•			.56
30	21	40	(99)	.00
,	7.1.01	,
	_
Poli		сy
Low	Medium	High
56	20	24	(41)
34	27	39	(62)	.36
	College
Pol	litical Effica	ıcy
Low	Mediun
32	32	36	(15)
37	19	44	(24)	.02
	Poli Low % 64 30 Poli Low 56 34 Pol Low 32	Political Effice Low Medium % % 64 20 30 27 High School Political Effice Low Medium 56 20 34 27 College Political Effice Low Medium 32 32	Low Medium High % % % 64 20 16 30 27 43 High School Political Efficacy Low Medium High 56 20 24 34 27 39 College Political Efficacy Low Medium High 32 36	Political Efficacy

a Parental education was set by the highest level achieved by either parent. "Elementary" means neither parent exceeded an eighth grade education; "high school" that at least one parent had one or more years of high school training; and "college" that at least one parent had one or more years of collegiate experience.

less between Negro and White students whose parents have had only an elementary school education (13%) than between Negro and White students whose parents have had a college education (24%).

The number of civics courses taken by White students has little perceptible effect on their sense of political efficacy (beta=.05). Among Negroes, though, course exposure is moderately related to a sense of efficacy (beta=.18). As can be seen in Table 3, this is particularly true for Negroes from less educated families. The strength of the relationship decreases significantly among higher status students. Course-taking among the lower-status Negroes acts to bring their scores into line with their higher status cohorts. There is but a faint trace of this pattern among White students.

Although Negro students at all levels of parental education feel less efficacious than their White counterparts, it must be concluded that without the civics curriculum the gap would be even greater. As in the case of political knowledge, we have another illustration of less redundancy at work among the Negro subsample. For a variety of reasons the American political culture produces a lower sense of efficacy among Negro youths compared with Whites. But by heavily emphasizing the legitimacy, desirability, and feasibility of citizen participation and control, the civics course adds a new element in the socialization of low and middle status Negro students. Since those from the less educated families are more likely to be surrounded by agents with generally low efficacy levels, the curriculum has considerably more effect on them than on their peers from higher-status environments. Leaving aside the possible later disappointments in testing the reality of their new-found efficacy, the Negro students from less privileged backgrounds are for the moment visibly moved by course exposure.

While Negroes as a whole are less politically efficacious than Whites, they are not at the same time more politically cynical. The proportion of twelfth graders falling into the three most cynical categories of a six point political cynicism scale includes 21% of the White and 23% of the Negro students. This relatively low level of political cynicism among Negroes may seem ironic, but it is consistent with their view of the "good citizen" role (discussed later). The high school civics curriculum has only a slight effect upon the cynicism level of Whites (beta = .11) and none among Negroes (beta = .01). However, this difference suggests that the cynicism of the latter may be somewhat less moveable than that for Whites.

Civic Tolerance. One of the abiding goals of civic education is the encouragement and development of civic toleration. Negroes as a whole score lower on the civic tolerance scale than do Whites. When parental education is controlled the racial differences remain at each education level, although they are moderately attenuated. Again, as with political efficacy, the differences in the percentage of those scoring low is less between Negro and White students whose parents have had only an elementary school education (18%) than between Negro and White students whose parents have had a college education (28%). What we may be witnessing is the result of Negro compensation for the White bias in American society—a bias to which higher status Negroes may prove most sensitive.

The number of civics courses taken has little effect on White students' civic tolerance scores (beta = .06), with somewhat greater impact being observed on those from homes of lower parental education. There is, however, a moderate association between exposure and Negro students' sense of civic tolerance (beta = .22). The more courses they take, the higher their level of tolerance. Negroes are more intolerant even when educational controls are introduced, but the civics curriculum appears to overcome in part the environmental factors which may contribute to their relatively lower

TABLE 4. GAMMA CORRELATION BETWEEN NUMBER
OF CIVICS COURSES TAKEN AND POLITICAL INTEREST AND DISCUSSION WITH PEERS
AMONG NEGRO STUDENTS, BY
PARENTAL EDUCATION

Parental Education	Political Interest	Political Discussion
Elementary	+.31	+.20
High School	18	31
College	21	36

tolerance. The items on which the civic tolerance measure is based all have to do with the acceptance of diversity. Aggregate student and parent data suggest that these items tap a dimension of political sophistication less likely to be operative in the Negro-subculture. To the extent that the civics courses preach more tolerance, the message is less likely to be redundant among the Negroes than the Whites. Unlike political knowledge and efficacy, though, course-taking exerts its main effect on Negro twelfth graders from better-educated families, thereby suggesting that a threshold of receptivity may be lacking among those from lower-status families.

Politicization—Interest, Discussion, and Media Usage. Students were asked about their interest in public affairs and how often they discussed politics with their friends outside class. There is little difference between racial groups among those who expressed high interest in politics or said they discussed politics weekly or more often with their friends. Nor did controls for parental education uncover aggregate racial distinctions. Moreover, the civics curriculum appears at first glance to have little impact upon these two indicators of politicization among Negroes (beta = .15 and -.07. respectively) or Whites (beta = .06 and .04). Yet an examination of Table 4 indicates that curriculum effect is differentially determined by the educational level of the Negro students' parents (in contrast to a lack of variation among Whites). The differential effect may account for the low beta coefficient in the multivariate analysis.

As Negroes from less educated families take more civics courses their political interest and frequency of political discussion with peers increases. Since less educated parents ordinarily evince lower states of politicization, one could explain this in terms of nonredundant information spurring an upsurge in student politicization. Students from higher status families, however, actually appear to undergo depoliticization as they move through the civics curriculum.

In their excellent social and psychological inquiry into the personality of the American Negro, Abram Kardiner and Lionel Ovesey observed that it is the higher status Negro who is most likely to identify and have contact with Whites and their culture.³⁹ But due to their race, the disappointments are more frequent and their aspirations more likely to founder on the rock of unattainable ideals.

Because of his parents' experiences, the higher status Negro student may have received a more "realistic" appraisal of the institutional and social restrictions placed upon Negro participation in the United States. Upon enrolling in the civics course he finds at least two good-citizen roles being emphasized. The first stresses a politicized-participation dimension. The second emphasizes a more passive role: lovalty and obedience to authority and nation. If he has absorbed from his parents the probability of restrictions, the participationpoliticization emphasis in the curriculum may have little impact upon the higher status Negro student. Redundancy is low because the information conflicts with previous learning. The "reality factor" causes him to select out of the curriculum only those role characteristics which appear to be more congruent with a preconceived notion of his political life chances. As we shall see later, higher status Negro students' perception of the good citizen role is compatible with the above interpretation.

Students were also asked how often they read articles in newspapers or magazines or watched programs on television that dealt with public affairs, news, or politics. In the aggregate, students from each racial grouping employ newspapers and magazines at about the same rates; but Negro students use television more often than do Whites, and at all levels of parental education. The civics curriculum has a different impact upon political media usage among Whites and Negroes. Table 5 shows that for White students there is a consistent—but very weak-association between taking civics courses and use of the media as an access point to political information. Among Negroes there is a consistently negative but somewhat stronger association between the civics curriculum and political media usage.

Observing the same relationship within contingency tables under less severe control conditions, the civics curriculum continues to have a negative—although fluctuating—impact upon political media usage among Negroes at all levels of parental education (Table 6).

³⁹ Abram Kardiner and Lionel Ovesey, The Mark of Oppression (Cleveland: The World Publishing Co. [a Meridian book], 1962).

Negative correlations among Negroes might be explained on at least two dimensions: substitution and depoliticization. A civics course may increase a student's political interest while at the same time acting as a substitute for political information gathering in the media. This is what appears to be happening among Negroes from less educated families. Negative associations between course work and media usage suggest that the former may be substituting for political information gathering in the media. But as we saw before, there is a significant increase in political interest among lower status Negroes as they take more civics courses. The lack of depoliticization in this group was further confirmed by the positive correlation between the civics curriculum and discussing politics with one's school friends (Table 4).

The case of the higher status Negro seems to be of a different order. Negative correlations between the civics curriculum and media usage may indicate substitution, but what is even more apparent is the general depoliticization of higher status Negroes as they move through the curriculum. The more courses they take the less likely are they to seek political information in newspapers, magazines, and television. In addition there is also a decrease in their political interest and propensity to discuss politics with their friends.

Citizenship Behavior. Interjecting race adds a special complexity to the relationship between the civics curriculum and the student's belief about the role of a good citizen in this country. Students were asked:

People have different ideas about what being a good citizen means. We're interested in what you think. Tell me how you would describe a good citizen in this country—that is, what things about a person are most important in showing that he is a good citizen.

Taking only their first responses, 70% of the

TABLE 5. PARTIAL BETA COEFFICIENTS BETWEEN NUMBER OF CIVICS COURSES TAKEN AND POLITICAL MEDIA USAGE AMONG NEGRO AND WHITE STUDENTS

Media	Negro	White
Newspapers	17	+.07
Television	21	+.04
Magazines	10	+.10

TABLE 6. GAMMA CORRELATIONS BETWEEN NUMBER
OF CIVICS COURSES TAKEN AND POLITICAL
MEDIA USAGE AMONG NEGRO STUDENTS, BY PARENTAL EDUCATION

Media	Parental Education
Media	Primary	Secondary	College
Newspapers	07	36	28
Television	39	42	17
Magazines	27	07	42

Whites and 63% of the Negroes fell along two general dimensions: loyalty and political participation. Within these two response dimensions there are distinct racial differences. Sixtyone percent of the Negro responses focus on loyalty rather than participation. Only 41% of the White students, on the other hand, see the "good citizen" role as being one of loyalty rather than political participation. When we probe the relationship between taking civics courses and citizenship orientation some interesting differences are revealed. More civics courses mean more loyalty and less participation orientation for Negroes. In Table 7 there is a 24% difference in loyalty orientation between those Negroes who have taken no civic courses and those who have taken one or more. Civics course work has a slightly opposite effect among White students.

TABLE 7. THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CIVICS CURRICULUM AND GOOD CITIZENSHIP ATTITUDES AMONG NEGRO AND WHITE STUDENTS

Number	ľ	Vegroes Stress	ing:
of Civics Courses	Loyalty	Participa- tion
	%	%	Na
0	51	49	(41)
1+	75	25	(85)
	,	Whites Stressi	ing:
,	Loyalty	Participa- tion
0	46	54	(395)
1+	39	61	(803)

^a These N's run lower than corresponding N's in other tables because those respondents not mentioning either loyalty or participation in their first response are excluded from the base.

TABLE 8. THE RELATION BETWEEN CIVICS
CURRICULUM AND CITIZENSHIP ATTITUDES
AMONG NEGRO STUDENTS, BY PARENTAL EDUCATION

Number of Civics	Ele
Courses	Loyalty	Participation
	%	%	N
0	8 3	17	(6)
1+	63	37	(28)
	${ m Hig}$
•
	Loyalty	Participation
.0	Loyalty 54	Participation 46	(24)
.0 1+			(24) (41)
-	54 90	46
-	54 90	46 10
-	54 90	46 10 College

In other words, while the civics curriculum has little impact upon the White student's view of the good citizen role, it appears to inculcate in Negroes the role expectation that a good citizen is above all a loyal citizen rather than an active one. Yet looking at this same relationship among Negroes under the more severe multivariate control conditions the size of the beta coefficient (-.10) is not large. While it is predictably negative (i.e., loyalty orientation increases with course work), the magnitude of the coefficients reduces our confidence in the earlier contingency table.

The difference in findings may be the result of moving from a relatively simple bivariate analysis with no controls for other possible intervening variables to a more sophisticated mode of multivariate analysis under more rigorously controlled conditions. This unundoubtedly accounts for part of the difference, but we also found, as before, that the civies curriculum has a differential effect upon Negroes depending on the educational level of their parents.

Negro students whose parents have some secondary school or college education increase their loyalty orientation by 36% and 28%, respectively, as they take more civics courses (Table 8). Negroes from less educated families, however, increase their participation orientation much like White students. Due to the small N for Negro students who have taken no courses and whose parents have an elementary school education or less this relationship should be treated quite cautiously. Although differences between Negroes from different levels of parental education have been mentioned before, the most one would want to say here is that the civics curriculum seems to increase the loyalty orientations of higher status Negroes while having a slightly opposite effect among lower status Negro students.

A number of interpretations can be placed on these findings. Both loyalty and participation are emphasized in the civics curriculum, and for White and lower status Negro students the dual emphasis has about equal effect. But as we noted earlier, the higher status Negro may have received from his more active parents a "realistic" appraisal of the institutional and social restrictions placed upon Negro participation in American politics. Consequently, the participation emphasis in the curriculum has little impact. The reality factor may cause the higher status Negro to select out of the curriculum only those role characteristics which appear to be most congruent with a preconceived notion of his political life chances.

Another rationale for the findings might be found in the relative fulfillment of White and Negro needs to belong, to be accepted in this society. If we assume that the Negro is cut off from many of the associational memberships and status advantages that most Whites take for granted, then his unfulfilled need to belong and to be accepted is probably greater than that of his white counterparts. This may be particularly true of the higher status Negro and his parents. Because of their relatively higher education in the Negro community, they have had more contacts with Whites-contacts which, because of their race, have led to more frequent rebuffs. The one association not explicitly denied Negroes is that of being a loval American. It is entirely possible that the psychic relief a higher status Negro receives in "establishing" his American good-citizenship is greater than that of his White counterpart or his lower status racial peer. As a consequence, the loyalty emphasis in the curriculum may have the most impact on the higher status Negro.41

41 In 1942 Gunnar Myrdal completed a comprehensive codification of the Negro culture and circumstances in America. He maintained that Negroes in this country were "exaggerated Americans," who believed in the American Creed more strongly than Whites. Gunnar Myrdal, op. cit.

⁴⁰ The beta coefficient for White students is +.07.

Regional Effects. The Negro students are located disporportionately in the southern part of the United States. Because of possible cultural differences we thought it advisable to control for region as well as parental education. Therefore the Negro subsample was divided into South and non-South with controls for high and low parental education employed in each region.⁴²

When controlled for region as well as parental education, the effects of the civics curriculum upon political knowledge, interest, discussion, television-newspaper-magazine usage, and loyalty-participation orientations were consistent with the results for the Negro subsample as a whole in all except two cases. Among the seven variables discussed above there are 28 cases (two for each region because of the education control or four for each variable) in which a possible deviation from the Negro subsample as a whole could occur. Due to the small marginals and the fact that there were 26 consistent findings, we attach little conceptual significance to these two exceptions.

In both regions the civics curriculum continued to be negatively associated with political media usage at all educational levels except for newspaper reading among higher status students outside the South. The relationships are slightly stronger in the South than in the non-South. The differential consequences of 42 The Negro subsample was not large to begin with, and a regional control in addition to the control for parental education reduced cell frequencies even further. Because the differential effects of parental education were found primarily between students whose parents had only an elementary school education versus those with high school or college education, we combined students from the latter two categories into one category. This retained the substance of the original education break in the South, but it still left only a small number of students outside the South whose parents had an elementary school education or less. In order to enlarge this latter group the parental education cutting point in the non-South was moved to a point between those parents who were at least high school graduates and those who had only some high school or less. If there are important regional differences in curriculum effect they should be apparent under these control conditions.

The respective raw and weighted N's for the four groupings are as follows: southern low educated—33, 44; southern high educated—48, 64; non-southern low educated—45, 42; non-southern high educated—53, 50.

parental education were remarkably consistent across both regions. As before, civics courses had a negative effect upon the political discussion (and political interest in the South) of higher status Negroes while having a positive impact upon lower status Negroes. Finally, in both regions the civics curriculum continued to have its greatest negative effect on the participatory orientations of Negro students from the more educated families.

There appeared to be different regional effects on only three of the dependent variables. The first of these was political cynicism. In the South course work increases cynicism slightly among high and low status Negroes while in the North political cynicism decreased as the student was exposed to the civics curriculum. However, in both regions the outcome of taking a civics course is to make the student from the higher educated family relatively more cynical than his lower status peer. As with cynicism, exposure to civics means a slight decrease in civic tolerance among high and low status southern Negroes. This is also true of lower status Negroes outside the South. For all three cases the magnitude of the relationships are quite small, the highest being a gamma of -.14. It is only among higher status nonsouthern Negroes that a stronger, positive relationship develops—+.39.

The political efficacy of lower status students in the South was increased much more by the civics curriculum (.64) than was the efficacy of their higher status peers (.32). This is consistent with the picture for the entire subsample. However, while there was a positive relationship between exposure and increased efficacy among higher status students in the non-South there was a negative relationship among lower status students. We are at a loss to explain this negative sign other than point to the small frequencies which may account for this departure.

IV. CONCLUSION

A number of studies in the United States and other countries have stressed the importance of education in determining political attitudes and behavior. The man with only a primary school education is a different political actor from the man who has gone to high school or college. Yet direct evidence demonstrating the effect of college and high school curriculum upon political beliefs and behavior of students is scarce and generally inconclusive.

Our findings certainly do not support the thinking of those who look to the civics curriculum in American high schools as even a minor source of political socialization. When we investigated the student sample as a whole we found not one single case out of the ten examined in which the civics curriculum was significantly associated with students' political orientations.

The lack of positive results raised many questions in our minds concerning the simple correlations between years of education and political orientations which are so prevalent in the literature, particularly the differences between people with high school versus college education. Of course, high schools and colleges are complex institutions. While the formal curriculum may have little effect, there is still the acquisition of conceptual skills, the social climate of the school, and the presence of peer groups, all of which may play a significant role in the political socialization process.43 These caveats still overlook one of the chief difficulties in studying the influence of higher education: the danger of confounding the effect of selection with that of socialization. For example, do the highly educated feel more politically competent because of their college socialization experiences or were they significantly different in this respect from their non-college bound peers before they ever entered college?

College bound students do differ significantly from those who are not planning to obtain a higher education. They tend to come from families with above average income and education and have all the cultural benefits of their higher status.⁴⁴ We found among the high school seniors a strong positive correlation between parents' education and students' intention to attend a four year college or university $(\gamma = .52)$. Because there was also a strong correlation between high school grades $(\gamma = .53)$ and college intentions, we feel confident that stated intention to attend college is a fairly good predictor of future attendance.

The fact that college bound students enjoy higher social status than those not planning to pursue a higher education suggests that there also may be important political differences between the two groups. Indeed, students who plan to attend college are more likely to be knowledgeable about politics ($\gamma = .39$); to express greater political interest (.32) and efficacy

⁴³ See Almond and Verba, op. cit., Chap. 12; Kenneth P. Langton, "Peer Group and School and the Political Socialization Process," this REVIEW 61 (September, 1967), 751-758; and M. L. Levin, "Social Climates and Political Socialization," Public Opinion Quarterly, 25 (Winter, 1961), 596-606.

⁴⁴ Ernest Haveman and Patricia West, They Went to College (New York: Harcourt, 1952).

(.37); to support religious dissenters' rights of free speech (.37) and an elected communist's right to take public office (.44); to read about politics in newspapers (.18) and magazines (.34); to discuss politics with their peers (.26); and they are three times as likely to place the correct liberal-conservative label on the Democratic and Republican parties as are those students who are not planning to pursue a college education.

To summarize, there is a lack of evidence that the civics curriculum has a significant effect on the political orientations of the great majority of American high school students. Moreover, those who are college bound already have different political orientations than those who do not plan to attend college. These two conclusions suggest that an important part of the difference in political orientations between those from different levels of education, which is frequently cited in the literature and is usually explicitly or implicitly ascribed to the "education process," may actually represent a serious confounding of the effect of selection with that of political socialization.

Although the overall findings are unambiguous, there is reason to believe that under special conditions exposure to government and politics courses does have an impact at the secondary school level. When White and Negro students were observed separately, it became clear that the curriculum exerted considerably more influence on the latter. On several measures the effect was to move the Negro youthsespecially those from less-educated familiesto a position more congruent with the White youths and more in consonance with the usual goals of civic education in the United States. Among White students from less educated families this pattern was barely visible. With respect to some quasi-participative measures, taking a civics course served to depress Negro performance, especially among those from better-educated families. In virtually all instances the Negro students were much more affected by taking such courses than were the whites, regardless of whether the results were positive or negative.

We argued that one explanation of the singular consequence of the curriculum upon Negro students is that information redundancy is lower for them than for White students. Because of cultural and social status differences, the Negro students are more likely to encounter new or conflicting perspectives and content. The more usual case for Whites is a further layering of familiar materials which, by and large, repeat the message from other past and contemporary sources.

It is conceivable that other subpopulations of students are differentially affected by the curriculum; that variations in content and pedagogy lead to varying outcomes; or that there will be delayed consequences from course exposure. In the main, however, one is hard pressed to find evidence of any immediate course impact on the bulk of the students. The programmatic implications of this conclusion are forceful. If the educational system continues to invest sizable resources in government and civics courses at the secondary level—as seems most probable—there must be a radical restructuring of these courses in order for them to have any appreciable pay-off. Changes in goals, course content, pedagogical methods, timing of exposure, teacher training, and school environmental factors are all points of leverage. Until such changes come about, one must continue to expect little contribution from the formal civics curriculum in the political socialization of American pre-adults.

CONSERVATISM. PERSONALITY AND POLITICAL EXTREMISM*

ROBERT A. SCHOENBERGER University of Michigan

I. INTRODUCTION

The empirical study of political ideology in mass publics must ultimately be related to political behavior; otherwise, the ideological description of such publics exists in an action vacuum. Yet, the most detailed and sophisticated descriptions and analyses of American conservatives and their characteristics are those which have most notably failed to connect their findings (about opinions, attitudes and ideologies) with consistent or predictable political activity of any kind.¹

This absence of systematic linkage between belief and behavior is primarily a consequence of the general absence of ideological structure in the political orientation of the broad American electorate. But it is also a consequence of the researchers' reliance on a priori ideological measures of doubtful validity.

Hence, when the student of politics is informed that reputed conservatives are, or tend to be, authoritarian, anti-Semitic and ethno-

- * I am grateful to Donald Stokes, Dale Neuman and William Riker for their comments and suggestions on earlier versions of this paper.
- ¹ T. W. Adorno, E. Frenkel-Brunswik, D. J. Levinson and N. Sanford, The Authoritarian Personality (New York, 1950); H. McClosky, "Conservatism and Personality," this Review 52 (1958), 27-45, esp. 44-45. See also M. Rokeach, The Open and the Closed Mind, (New York, 1960); and B. Anderson et al., "On Conservative Attitudes," Acta Sociologica, 8 (1965), 189-204.
- ² A. Campbell, P. Converse, W. Miller and D. Stokes, The American Voter (New York, 1960), p. 249; P. Converse, "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics," in D. Apter (ed.), Ideology and Discontent (New York, 1965), pp. 206-261.
- ³ See, e.g., The critiques by R. Christie, H. H. Hyman and P. Sheatsley in R. Christie and M. Jahoda (eds.), Studies in the Scope and Method of 'The Authoritarian Personality' (Glencoe, Ill., 1954); M. Rokeach, op. cit., pp. 3-30; R. Brown, Social Psychology (New York, 1965), pp. 526-546. Campbell et al., op. cit., pp. 209-214, 512-515; W. Kendall, "Comment on McClosky's 'Conservatism and Personality,", this Review 52 (1959), 1111-1112; M. J. Rosenberg, "Images in Relation to the Policy Process: American Public Opinion on Cold-War Issues," in H. Kelman (ed.), International Behavior (New York, 1965), ch. 8.

centric,⁴ or imbued with "...feelings of worthlessness, submissiveness, inferiority, timidity ..., ... hostile and suspicious, ... rigid and compulsive, ... inflexible and unyielding ...,"⁵ he must question the adequacy of the political designation "conservative" both on descriptive and predictive grounds.

Because of these methodological and empirical problems, I suggest that the findings of prior resaerch and hypotheses related to them, be tested in a different manner. For example, if one examines the membership and/or known supporters of organizations which exist to aggregate and channel conservative political demands, the analysis of political ideology and its correlates can be conducted in a definitively political context, with the labels being supplied (or implied) by the actors themselves.⁶

Such an approach, using a criterion of active self-definition, avoids the ambiguities both in abstract, a priori definitions of ideological propensity and in the passive self-definition occasionally employed by pollsters ("Do you consider yourself a conservative, a liberal or a middle-of-the-roader?").

By shifting the focus to the level of conscious, deliberate and specific supportive behavior, comparisons are facilitated both among ideologically-based groups and between aggregates who "know" what they are, ideologically, and those who, operationally, must be told."

- 4 Adorno, et al., op. cit., pp. 265, 179.
- ⁵ McClosky, op. cit., pp. 37-38.
- 6 S. H. Barnes, "Ideology and the Organization of Conflict: On the Relationship Between Political Thought and Behavior," Journal of Politics, 28 (1966), 513-530, esp. 521-524. For relevant, not necessarily deliberate, examples of this approach, see M. Chesler and R. Schmuck, "Participant Observation in a Super-Patriot Discussion Group," Journal of Social Issues, 19 (1963), 18-30; R. Wolfinger et al., "American's Radical Right: Politics and Ideology; in Apter (ed.), op. cit., pp. 262-293; F. Grupp, Jr., "Political Activists: The John Birch Society and the ADA," a paper delivered at the 1966 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, New York City.
- 7 The mere act of joining an ideologically-oriented group or party does not guarantee either

II. SETTING

One major effort to mobilize conservatives for political action has been made in New York state. There in 1961 a group of intellectuals, journalists, business and professional men founded the Conservative Party of New York, with the stated aim of (1) offering a conservative alternative to the relatively liberal programs and candidates of the two major parties and the seemingly influential Liberal Party, and (2) eventually pressuring the state Republican (and conceivably, the Democratic) party to move to a suitably conservative posture.⁸

The Party, a segment of whose membership will be discussed herein, has experienced slow but steady growth since 1962. Its gubernatorial poll increased from 141,877 (2.4%) in 1962 to 510,023 (8.4%) in 1966. Three Conservative Congressional candidates (in 1966) and the Party's candidate for Mayor of New York City (in 1965) have received more than 10% of the total vote in their constituencies. The Party's mean vote percentage in 16 New York State Congressional Districts was 6.4% in 1966.

The core of the Conservative Party's supporters can be readily located from public registration lists. This analysis is based upon the interview responses of a random sample of male Conservative Party members in Munroe County, New York, which comprises the City of Rochester and its suburbs. Interviews (each ideological support or even interest. A discussion and justification of certain analytical exclusions can be found in R. A. Schoenberger, Conservatives and Conservatism (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Rochester, 1966; University Microfilm No. 67-8986), pp 40-44.

8 The key points of the Conservative Party Platform, derived from "... the American tradition of individual liberty, limited constitutional government, and defense of the Republic against its enemies," include belief in balanced budgets. opposition to or curbing of "... centralization of governmental power, monopoly union power, deficit spending and oppressive taxation...", the wish for the confinement of "... the Supreme Court . . . to its proper judicial functions," support for the "Neighborhood School" principle, opposition to state legislative reapportionment, public housing and foreign aid (except for "our friends"), See "Introducing: The Conservative Party of New York State" (New York, 1965), unpaged pamphlet. Available from Conservative Party State Headquarters, 141 E. 44 St., New York, New York 10017.

⁹ Females were excluded primarily because of the need to economize resources, Informal in-

TABLE 1. MISANTHROPY

Per cent who agree that	Conserva- tives (N = 45)	licans
1. "Most people can be trusted."	91%	92%
2. "People are more in- clined to look out for themselves than to help others."	(89)	(75)
3. "Human Nature is fundamentally co- operative."	78	92
4. "No one is going to care much what hap-		02
pens to you, when you get right down to it."	(40)	(35)
5. "If you don't watch yourself, people will take advantage of you."	(58)	(71)

Proportions in parentheses are those giving the misanthropic response.

lasting about 90 minutes) were completed with 45 Conservatives, 10 in a universe of 325, and with a control sample of 48 Republicans, the latter intended to provide a contrast between Conservatives (all but one of whom had been a Republican) and their unchanged, generally less ideological, former fellow partisans.

III. FINDINGS

A. Personality. Conservatives do not appear to differ substantially from Republicans on either of the two psychological measures employed. On specific assertions of social trust and distrust (Morris Rosenberg's "misanthropy" scale"), the results are, at best, ambiguous. Comparing total male sample requires discovered, as one would suspect, that numerous Conservative females registered as they did only at their husband's request.

The 1966 Conservative Congressional candidate in the district dominated by the eastern, and most populous, half of Monroe County polled 6.4% of the vote.

¹⁰ The upper case "C" is used only when referring to registered Conservative Party members or to the Party itself.

¹¹ M. Rosenberg, "Misanthropy and Political Ideology," American Sociological Review, 21 (1956), 690-695; and "Misanthropy and Attitudes Toward International Affairs," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1 (1957), 34-45.

TABLE 2. MISANTHROPY, BY RESPONDENTS WITH AT LEAST SOME COLLEGE

I	er cent who agree that	Conserva- tives (N = 40)	licans
1.	"Most people can be trusted."	93%	95%
2.	"People are more in- clined to look out for themselves than to help others."	85	80
3.	"Human Nature is fundamentally co-
1	operative." "No one is going to	78	90
· .	care much what hap- pens to when you	37	50
5.	get right down to it." "If you don't watch yourself, people will	31	50
	take advantage of you."	58	60

sponses to each of the items (Table 1), it is apparent that the dominant direction of Conservative response is the same as that of the Republican sample. Moreover, the intersample differences are not consistent in direction, Conservatives appearing to be more trusting than the Republicans on item five and notably less so on two and three.

Since there is a long-recognized tendency for poorly educated people to respond uncritically to assertions like these and because of the disporportionate number of Conservatives with relatively high educational achievement, 12 I have isolated this segment of the samples (Table 2). Here, the distances between the resulting sub-samples diminish, with notable but non-significant differences occurring only on two of the five items (3 and 4). Again, the differences are not consistent in direction. 13

This absence of significant¹⁴ differences between samples recurs in an "authoritarian-equalitarian" scale, borrowed from a larger battery employed by the Survey Research Center in 1952 (Table 3). Here, however, Con-

TABLE 3. AUTHORITARIANISM-EQUALITARIANISM

Per cent who agree that	Conserva- tives (N = 45)	licans
1. "Human Nature being what it is, there will always be war and conflict."	73%	77%
 "Most people who don't get ahead, just don't have enough will 	,,
power." 3. "A few strong leaders could make this country better than all the	51	52
laws and talk." 4. "An insult to your honor should not be	22	38
forgotten."	22	33

servatives tend to be less authoritarian on each of the four items, with the largest difference appearing on the sole assertion with overt political content ("a few strong leaders... better than all the laws and talk.").

Comparing the college-educated sub-samples (Table 4), the gaps between samples increase; Conservatives continue to respond in a less authoritarian pattern. The normative differences¹⁵ between Conservatives and Republicans consistently favor the former.¹⁶

B. Civil Liberties. The major politically relevant characteristic imputed to the maladjusted American conservative is his willingness to suppress, or to tolerate the suppression, of the civil liberties of his fellow-citizens. 17 The 14 x², p<.05, df=1. All subsequent references to significance refer to this statistical measure and convention.

¹⁶ The average item-percentage difference between Conservatives and Republicans in Table 4 is +10.75. The range is +5 to +20.

16 Where sample responses are scored and indexed, with education controlled, the number of Conservatives in the high (normatively negative) range does not differ importantly or significantly from the Republicans. The per cent "highly misanthropic" are: Conservatives—12; Republicans—15. The per cent "highly authoritarian" are: Conservatives—17; Republicans—15. The scoring procedure is that used by G. Almond and S. Verba, The Civic Culture (New York, 1963), pp. 262–263.

¹⁷ The concept of authoritarianism is politically empty unless those persons it purports to de-

¹² Eighty-nine per cent had attended college, 62% received the bachelor's degree and 31% had started or completed graduate or professional school requirements.

¹³ The average item-percentage difference between Conservatives and Republicans in Table 2 is -0.8 (sign indicates normative evaluation). The range is +13 to -12 across items.

TABLE 4. AUTHORITARIANISM-EQUALITARIANISM,
BY RESPONDENTS WITH AT LEAST SOME COLLEGE

Per cent who agree that	Conserva- tives (N = 40)	licans
1. "Human Nature being what it is, there will al- ways be war and conflict."	72%	80%
 "Most people who don't get ahead, just don't have enough will 	1270	00 70
power." 3. "A few strong leaders could make this country better than all the	50	60
laws and talk." 4. "An insult to your honor should not be	20	40
forgotten."	20	25

discovery or expectation of such behavior underlies and justifies most analyses of radical right organizations and joins the authoritarian personality to right-extremist, anti-libertarian perspectives. 18

To explore the possibility that Conservatives may not be attached to the standards of American civil liberties, I employed a ten-item measure covering key features of the Bill of Rights, a measure primarily derived from one applied to a 1957 sample of Berkeley college students.¹⁹

Comparison of the responses (Table 5) indicates that Conservatives offer predominant and broad support to libertarian assertions and comparable opposition to anti-libertarian ones. Where this finding does not obtain—on assertions supporting "double jeopardy" (item 8) and opposing academic freedom of belief (item 9)—it is notable that the reservations of scribe are anti-libertarian. See Peter Viereck's phrase "... authoritarian reactionaries..., hypocritically pretending to be devoted to civil liberties," in D. Bell (ed.), The Radical Right (Garden City, N. Y., 1964), p. 196.

¹⁸ See, e.g., S. A. Stouffer, Communism, Conformity and Civil Liberties (Garden City, N. Y., 1955), pp. 94-97; D. Bell, op. cit., pp. 88, 358; R. Wolfinger et al., op. cit., pp. 270-273.

¹⁹ H. C. Selvin and W. O. Hagstrom, "Determinants of Support for Civil Liberties," British Journal of Sociology, 11 (1960) 51-73.

Conservatives are largely shared by Berkeley respondents.

On nine of the ten items, Conservative responses are more libertarian than those of the Republican sample, usually by significant margins.²⁰ Even when only the highly educated respondents are considered, large inter-sample differences remain, with Conservatives demonstrating greater support for civil liberties than Republicans.²¹

Beyond the item analysis, a summary table of libertarianism (Table 6) indicates that a large majority of Conservatives favor most of the libertarian assertions, with an overwhelming difference between Conservatives and Republicans. Moreover, 92% of the Conservatives and only 58% of the Republicans offered more pro-libertarian than anti-libertarian responses.²²

Although the measure is admittedly crude, weighing each item equally, one is able to clearly differentiate Conservatives from Republicans along lines of commitment to or at least acceptance of libertarian assertions. Of most obvious importance is the consistently libertarian attitude complex of both Conservatives and, to a slightly lesser degree, the small group of Goldwater Republicans.

These findings do not permit the inference that Conservatives will be in the forefront of any movement to expand or even protect the generality of civil liberties. Robert Lane has suggested that this fight is usually led by a triumvirate composed of the legal, clerical and teaching professions,²³ none of which is represented among the Conservatives. The latter

²⁰ The average item-percentage difference between Conservatives and Republicans is +17.1; between Conservatives and Goldwater-voting Republicans, +8.4. If any inference is to be drawn, it is that Goldwater Republicans are less anti-libertarian than Johnson-voting Republicans.

²¹ The average distance between college-educated Conservatives and Republicans dimishes to +11.6.

²² The mean Conservative score (defined as the number of prolibertarian responses) is 7.8 of a possible 10; for Republicans it is 6.0. College-educated Republicans have a mean of 6.75 and Goldwater-voting Republicans (8 of whom have not attended college) a mean of 7.1 (!). College-attending Conservatives achieve a score of 7.9.

²³ R. E. Lane, "The Fear of Equality," this Review, 53 (1959), 35-51. See also, S. A. Stouffer, op. cit., J. W. Prothro and C. M. Grigg, "Fundamental Principles of Democracy: Bases of Agreement and Disagreement," Journal of Politics, 22 (1961) 276-294.

TABLE 5. ATTITUDES TOWARD CIVIL LIBERTIES BY ALL RESPONDENTS AND BY RESPONDENTS WITH AT LEAST SOME COLLEGE EDUCATION

	Per cent who agree that	All Conserva- tives (N = 45)	All Republicans (N = 48)	Berkeley Studentsa (N = 894)	College Republicans (N = 20)	College Conserva- tives (N = 40)
1.	"There should be a law to prevent people from making speeches against our form of			440, ———————————————————————————————————
2.	government." "Books which oppose churches and religion should be removed	$2^{ m d}$	27	G	20	2
3.	from local public libraries." "A high school teacher whose	$4^{\mathbf{d}}$	27	b	15	5 loyalty has been questioned before a committee of Congress should be fired, even if he swears under oath that he isn't
4.	a Communist." "State governments should have power to pass laws making public speeches against	7	8	0	10	5
5.	racial and religous groups il- legel." "When the police are looking	7ª	31	10	25	2
6.	for evidence against a sus- pected criminal, they should not have to have a warrant to search a house." "Large-scale roundups of 'un- desirables' are proper as long	13ª	33	11	30	13
7.	as they are restricted to people with known criminal records." "The government is acting	22 ^d	58	19	45	20
	properly when it refuses a passport to a Socialist." "If a man accused of a major	27	44	10	40	22
	crime is acquitted, and apparently incriminating evidence is later discovered, he should be retried."	53ª	79	53	70	50
9.	"Legislative committees should not investigate the political beliefs of university faculty	υ 0 -	. U	JJ	10	UU
10.	members." "It is not reasonable to suspect the loyalty of a lawyer	(44)	(35)	(61)	(40)	(55)
	who represents accused Communists before a Congressional Committee."	(67)	(77)	(79)	(90)	(65)

^a The proportion giving the libertarian response is parenthesized. Data from H. C. Selvin and W. Hagstron, "Determinants of Support for Civil Liberties." British Journal of Sociology, 11 (1960), pp. 52-53. I have reversed one and slightly altered four of their items. Responses are not controlled by sex.

b Question not used by Selvin and Hagstrom.

^o Phrasing employed by Selvin and Hagstrom or Stouffer unsuitable for comparison.

d Differences between Conservatives and Republicans are X^2 significant, p < .05 df = 1.

TABLE 6: RELATIVE SUPPORT FOR CIVIL LIBERTIES^a

	Conservatives $(N=45)$	Republicans (N=48)
Stronger	69%	21%
Weaker	31%	79%
	100%	100%

"The cut is made at the place where the frequency distributions for the two groups of respondents intersect, i.e., at eight pro-libertarian responses.

are nearly all corporation employees working in executive, engineering, accounting, statistical or technical capacities.

C. Extremism. The relationship between conservatism and rightist extremism (or radicalism) has never been clear. It has not been possible to estimate the ratios of conservatives willing and desiring to effectuate policy changes through traditional democratic procedures, including third parties, to those who prefer or abide techniques of personal and group harassment, slanderous or libelous allegations and put forward or support wild—and probably unattainable—policy objectives (e.g. "impeach Earl Warren," "get the U.S. out of the U.N. . . . ," "abolish the 16th Amendment").

In the current context, the extremist style is principally manifested by a perception (presumably common to Birchers, Christian Crusaders—both Hargis and Schwarz versions—. Minutemen, etc.) that the group's enemies are engaged in a generally successful conspiracy against its continued well-being or even survival, having infiltrated and gained significant control over major decision-making and communications centers of American society.24 Specifically, it is charged that the United Nations, the executive and judicial branches of the federal government, the major political parties, the schools, the press, unions, and financiers are all subject to control or major influence by the conspirators (i.e., Communists) or their "pseudo-liberal," "Fabian socialist," fellow-travelling associates.25

²⁴ R. Hofstadter, The Paranoid Style in American Politics and Other Essays (New York, 1965), Ch. 1. See also J. Higham, Strangers in the Land (New Brunswick, N. J., 1955), pp. 81, 85, 180; E. Shils, The Torment of Secrecy (Glencoe, Ill., 1952), ch. 1.

²⁵ J. Stormer, None Dare Call it Treason (Florissant, Mo., 1964); P. Schlafly, A Choice Not an

Regardless of whether such beliefs are pervasive among members and supporters of "radical right" organizations they do not, with rare exceptions, appear to dominate the Weltanschauung of Conservatives. Whatever their various perceptions of the influence of domestic Communism, the subject seldom appears anywhere on their lists of problems confronting the political system. Only two Conservatives mentioned domestic Communism in any form. (One, also a member of the John Birch Society, complained that the government was riddled with "... Reds and security risks"; the other -who claimed that the John Birch Society was "... a collection of neurotics and buffoons"complained about "... the increase of leftist subversion in education . . . and in civil rights groups.")

Conservatives do not rationalize their act of joining the new party as an anti-Communist step. Rather, they view it as either a protest against the liberal policies and leadership of the state Republican Party or a positive identification with the conservative movement or philosophy or both.

When asked if they could think of any organization hurting the conservative cause (only 7 of 45 thought any was helping), 71% named the John Birch Society, with 60% including the members as well as the leadership in their indictments. Their comments were dotted with such epithets as "kooks," "radicals," "bigots," "a WASP front," and other barely printable phrases. Among the far-right groups, only the John Birch Society and the American Council of Christian Churches (led by C. C. McIntyre) received any praise, each from one respondent. Sixteen percent could think of no organization either to praise or to damn.

It would appear, based on their responses to the questions discussed above, that the large majority of Conservatives consciously avoid adopting both the presumed perspective and the group identification of right-wing extremists. A final check on the accuracy of this finding is contained in an analysis of their responses to the items on a "domestic Communist threat" scale (Table 7). Conservative responses to each assertion, covering American society in general, college faculties and each of the Echo (Alton, Ill., 1964); C. Manly, The Twenty Year Revolution (Chicago, 1954). See esp., A. G. Heinsohn (ed.), Anthology of Conservative Writings in the United States: 1932-1960 (Chicago, 1962) and any publication of the John Birch Society or its Western Islands Press.

TABLE 7. PERCEPTIONS OF COMMUNIST DANGER OR INFLUENCE IN AMERICAN SOCIETY

Per cent who agree that	Conservatives ^a (N=45)	Republicans (N = 48)	College Republicans (N=20)
1. "Communist professors do not have very much influence in American colleges and universities."	42	48	45
2. "The danger to the United States from Communists liv- ing here is not as great as the danger from Russia or China." 3. "Communists do not have	56	73	75
very much influence in the Democratic Party."	67	81	75
4. "Communists do not have very much influence in the Republican Party.	84	85	90

a Within arithmetic limitations, the five non-college educated Conservatives, responded exactly as did their colleagues to each of the items.

major political parties, were, in the aggregate, similar to the Republicans but consistently, though not significantly, more threat-perceiving. Only once, with regard to Communist influence in colleges and universities, did even a bare majority of Conservatives reject one of the assertions.

Although the data do not support any inference that most Conservatives are totally devoid of a belief in serious Communist influence in major domestic institutions, only a minority (26%) accepted at least three of these extremist assertions. If the extremist criteria are tightened somewhat, to include either a desire to see the U.S. withdraw from the U.N. or to impeach Earl Warren, the percentage in this category drops to 17 (8 respondents). (Only one, the Bircher, responded negatively to all six items.) No Republicans were found in the latter group of extremists.

IV. THE POLITICS OF CONSERVATIVES

As most Conservatives are quick to acknowledge, it is their political views which separate them importantly from other segments of the population.

In their responses to a series of general openended and specific closed-ended questions, both the most salient political interests of Conservatives and those dimensions on which they stand farthest apart from the sampled Republicans coincide.

²⁶ Fifty-eight per cent accepted no more than one; 31% accepted none. Comparable figures for college-educated Republicans were 65% and 30%; for all Republicans, 72% and 29%.

Analysis of the verbal responses indicates clearly that the major political interest of Conservatives is in the role, direction and/or activities of the federal government in domestic economic affairs, with a concomitant fear for the present and future freedom of the individual in a "government dominated" society. A substantial majority of Conservatives (60%) commented at some length about their dislike of (1) government intervention into the affairs of business and businessmen, (2) the "socialistic" direction in which the nation's economy is moving, or (3) the size and power of the government in general.²⁷

An additional 25% focussed upon the individual rather than the government acting upon him. They expressed the belief that people were becoming dependent upon "gov-

²⁷ The segregation of responses into these, and allied, categories is for the purpose of expository convenience. There is evidence that respondents falling into only one would quickly endorse the remarks of their colleagues in the others. For example, 80% of the Conservatives (36 of 45) agreed that "it seems clear that the United States is on the way to becoming a Socialist country," although only ten mentioned the word "socialism" during the interviews. Seventy-four per cent (34 of 48) of the Republicans disagreed with the assertion.

TABLE 8. ATTITUDES TOWARD FEDERAL SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC ROLES*

Per cent opposed to any federal role in	Conserva- tives (N = 45)	Republicans (N = 48)
1. Financing Education
(building and operatin costs)	g 91	54
2. Financing Public
Housing	78	25
3. War on Poverty	80	31
4. Medical Care for the	;
Aged	60	6
5. a. Combatting Depressions	24
b. Combatting Depressions through public expenditures	58	19
6. Setting Minimum Wage	•
Rates	62	33

^{*} All inter-sample differences in Table 8 are significant, p < .01.

ernment hand-outs," distracted by "bread and circuses," and bewailed the prospective "disappearance" of the individual and "subjugation of his rights."

This general antipathy to the activities, or "consequences" of the activities, of the federal government is illustrated in Table 8. When asked specifically. Conservatives reject every listed federal welfare program enacted since 1932, usually by overwhelming majorities. Only when it comes to combatting depressions do Conservatives indicate a slackening of hostility to a federal economic or welfare role. Yet, even on this issue, no longer a subject of major party controversy in principle, the Conservative majority endorses either a summary statement of the Hooverian approach ("balance the budget, increase tariffs and lower interest rates") or absolute non-interference with the business cycle (the federal government "should not interfere at all except, possibly, to stop regulating business").

While most Conservatives (78%) disagree with the assertion that "this country would be better off if the federal income tax were abolished" (as do 94% of the Republicans), nearly half (47%) would prefer a flat-rate to a graduated structure. Only 15% of the Republicans accept this view.

Conservative opposition to governmental economic and welfare activity is not restricted to the federal branches. Given the choice of a variety of governmental programs which in-

TABLE 9. ATTITUDES TOWARD GOVERNMENTAL SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC ROLES*

Per cent opposed to any governmental role in	Conserva- tives (N = 45)	Republicans (N = 48)
1. Financing Public
Housing	29	4
2. War on Poverty	38	13
3. Medical Care for the
Aged	58	6
4. Combatting Depres-
sions	24
5. Regulating Public
Utilities	49	17

^{*} All inter-sample differences in Table IX are significant, p <.01.

cluded state or national and state participation, substantial numbers of Conservatives opted for neither (Table 9). Whereas no Republican respondent could accept a policy of total government inaction during a depression, one-quarter of the Conservatives had no such inhibition. An equal number were at most localists on all three specific social welfare items, relating to public housing, the anti-poverty program and medical care for the aged. Only one respondent, a follower of Ayn Rand, denied any government any role in any endeavor (except defense of life and property).

Allied to the Conservatives' general probusiness, anti-governmental attitudes is a widespread antipathy toward labor unions. Eighty per cent believed that they "...do more harm than good," compared with 40% of the Republicans.²⁸ No other political dimension, including civil rights and foreign policy, ranked so high on their lists of interests or elicited such near-uniformity of response as did the areas of economic regulation and welfare.

v. discussion

Monroe County Conservatives differ substantially, on the measures employed, in their psychological make-up, attitudes toward civil liberties and in their susceptibility to the doctrines and admiration for the behavior of the "radical right," from other conservatives and rightists examined by social scientists. The large majority of them cannot be classified as authoritarian or misanthropic, anti-civil-libertarian or currently vulnerable to the obsessive anti-Communism of right-wing fringe groups.

²⁸ Forty-five per cent of the Conservatives volunteered anti-union comments.

But there are common political and social denominators by which Conservatives can be distinguished from other political aggregates. The Conservatives examined here are mostly well-educated, well-paid family men, with upper-status occupations and suburban residences.²⁹ They are bound together politically by a consistent and highly salient opposition to the modern welfare and regulatory role of the federal government, combined with a solid hostility to the perceived power and influence of labor unions. While other political dimensions attract their interest and concern they rarely rank as high, occur as frequently or elicit such near-uniformity of attitude.³⁰

In short, Monroe County Conservatives can be characterized by their relatively high average socio-economic position and by their possession of a distinct and coherent ideology which, while limited in breadth, is appropriate (within the American political tradition) to their socio-economic position.

These findings seriously contradict the conclusions of McClosky and the Berkeley group. Most Conservatives do not fit the mold of psychic maladjustment, anomy, alienation and outgroup hostility found jointly or separately by these scholars. There are two possibilities which may account for the strong psychological-political correlations heretofore discovered and their general absence from my sample. One is that the kind of conservatism represented by the New York Conservatives is crucially different, in terms of key issues and social and demographic sources, from the variant(s) manifested by the radical right. Recent research into the background and attitudes of radical right activitists suggests that this is likely.

A large segment of Ira Rohter's sample of Oregon rightists is disproportionately older, rural-born, less well educated, lower in income and occupational status and likely to belong to fundamentalist religious denominations than is my sample. ²¹ His respondents are found to be comparatively maladjusted on eleven of twelve psychological measures. ³² (They were politically ²⁰ The median family income for Conservatives in 1964 was nearly $12,000; 85% earned more than $8,000. Ninety-six per cent were employed in white-collar jobs, 84% in business, managerial, professional or technical capacities.

³⁰ The Party platform, summarized in note 8, is an accurate, if too short and general, summary of the views of the majority of the sample.

³¹ I. S. Rohter, Radical Rightists: An Empirical Study (Unpublished Ph.D. Dissertation, Michigan State University, 1967), pp. 124-144.

32 Ibid., pp. 154-265, passim.

efficacious.) Mark Chesler and Richard Schmuck have found similar, though fewer. such associations in their midwestern samples. but suggest that a political "value strain"—the unhappy perception of the difference between what is (or will be) and what should be-underlie adoption or acceptance of radical right perspectives.33 It must be noted that heavy concentrations of older, less well-trained and economically successful, fundamentalist and ruralborn individuals have been found by all students of the subject except Wolfinger, who believes that San Francisco area Christian Anti-Communist Crusaders, at least, "... are not social and psychological cripples."34

Despite some elements of overlap, it may be in order to hypothesize that two major strains of right-wing attitudes and behavior are distinguishable on the basis of 1) political grounds—one concerned primarily with questions of economic and social policy, the other with a powerful and conspiratorial domestic Communist threat; 2) social differences—one a segment of the young, educated, technologically competent and economically successful middle to upper-middle class, the other older, less competent and less "successful" on these dimensions; and 3) psychological differencesone reasonably well adjusted to their environment and able to cope with, though dissenting from, the major political tendencies of their time, the other hostile toward many of the social forces of the era and less able to keep their

It is urgent to separate analytically the type of conservatism displayed by the New York State Conservative Party and the radical variant(s) which provide support for the John Birch Society. The persistent political warfare between William Buckley's National Review (the major journalistic supporter of New York Conservatives) and the John Birch Society, inter alia, indicate that those differences are strongly reflected in the political arena. The distinction seems to me to be that between reasonable political intelligence and its ab-social-psychological balance when confronting them.

³³ M. Chesler and R. Schmuck, "Social Psychological Characteristics of Super-Patriots" in R. A. Schoenberger (ed.), The American Right Wing (New York, forthcoming, 1969).

³⁴ R. Wolfinger, et. al., "The Radical Right..." op. cit., p. 285. Another recent study, of Dallas rightists, concludes that the availability of rightist organizations may better account for rightist behavior than psychological predispositions. See A. C. Elms, "Psychological Factors in Right-Wing Extremism," in Schoenberger, op. cit., ch. 6.

sence, with their associated causes and correlations.

The second explanation of the discrepancy between my findings and those of McClosky and the Berkeley group is that "conservatives" attitudinally defined and derived from a population cross-section and those surveyed on the basis of overt, politically relevant behavior are actually two distinct empirical universes sharing the same label. The former group of inactive, inefficacious, alienated and largely illeducated individuals may be psychologically conservative but no evidence has been offered to demonstrate a consistent relationship to any broad variant of political conservatism. (That many radical rightists are recruited from McClosky's universe of "extreme conservatives" appears probable, however.)

McClosky himself found that the correlations "... between classical conservatism ... and ... party affiliation, attitude on economic issues and liberal-conservative self-designation . . . tend to be fairly low . . ."²⁵

It is clear, on the evidence presented here, that some people who identify, register and vote as Conservatives do not possess the personality attributes assigned to "conservatives" selected on other bases. For this group, at least, politics is primarily a legitimate means to express political and economic dissatisfactions and desires, one which dominates, if not supercedes, its utility as a political outlet for clinical and social psychological maladjustments.

²⁵ H. McClosky, "Conservatism and Personality," op. cit., pp. 44-45.

A SALIENCE DIMENSION OF POLITICS FOR THE STUDY OF POLITICAL CULTURE

Moshe M. Czudnowski The Hebrew University, Jerusalem

The present trend in the comparative study of politics is a departure from the country-by-country approach and a search for analytical models based on dimensions common to all political systems. This trend is in part based on the assumption that the construction of new concepts and conceptual frameworks for comparative politics would provide the starting point for a general empirical theory of political systems. One of the new concepts which has become common currency is "political culture." Originally proposed by Almond in 19562 and developed by Almond and Verba in The Civic Culture, the concept of political culture

¹ For a discussion of the problems and trends in the comparative study of politics see Roy C. Macridis, The Study of Comparative Government (New York: Random House Inc., 1955); Roy C. Macridis and Bernard E. Brown (eds.), Comparative Politics (Rev. ed.; Homewood, Ill.: The Dorsey Press, 1964), pp. 1-11; Harry Eckstein, "A Perspective on Comparative Politics, Past and Present," in Harry Eckstein and David E. Apter (eds.), Comparative Politics (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1963), pp. 3-33. Models for the comparative study of political systems have been proposed in David E. Apter, "A Comparative Method for the Study of Politics," The American Journal of Sociology, 64 (1958), 221-237; David E. Apter, The Politics of Modernization (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1965), esp. pp. 1-42 and 223-265; Gabriel A. Almond, Introduction to G. Almond and J. Coleman, The Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1960); Gabriel A. Almond, "A Developmental Approach to Political Systems," World Politics, 17 (1965), 183-214; G. A. Almond and B. G. Powell, Comparative Politics (Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 1966). A model for the comparative study of political participation has been proposed by Stein Rokkan in "The Comparative Study of Political Participation: Notes towards a Perspective on Current Research," in Austin Ranney (ed.), Essays on the Behavioral Study of Politics (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1962), pp. 47-80.

² Gabriel A. Almond, "Comparative Political Systems," Journal of Politics, 18 (1956), 391-409.

³ Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1963).

refers to patterns of politically relevant orientations of a cognitive, evaluative and expressive sort. It is intended to provide a researchable connecting link between the psychological tendencies of individuals and groups and the structural-functional characteristics of political systems, and to translate such concepts as "historical heritage" or "national character" into sets of cultural components more amenable to measurement and comparison across nations.

The study of political culture thus involves comparisons between the orientations of social groups towards specific political objects, between those of particular groups towards different objects, and between patterns of orientations and patterns of behavior. From a methodological viewpoint, all empirical political research is comparative research; we must therefore expect to encounter the problem of the comparability of political data, and in particular, the problem of equivalence of meaning, in all areas of political study. In the comparison of cultural data across nations the requirements of equivalence of meaning are probably more difficult to meet than in any other area. Generally speaking, there are two possible sources of differences in meaning in cross-cultural data: (a) cultural differences of a non-political nature, such as language, education or the degree of frankness or "openness" of personal opinions, and (b) cultural differences of a political nature.

The problems involved in the interpretation of these differences have been encountered in political survey research; some of their implications for the study of political cultures have been discussed in The Civic Culture and elsewhere. The present paper deals with one of the problems of cultural differences of a political nature. It suggests that one of the significant variables in political cultures is the salience of politics in social action, attitudes and behavior, and that it is possible to measure the magnitude of salience for different individuals, groups or nations. The resulting scores on this dimension may be used as a filter variable capable of increasing the equivalence of meaning of cross-cultural data. The concept of salience is also proposed as an element for a general theory of political behavior

'Some of the major problem-areas in cross-national political survey research have been examined in: Sidney Verba, "Survey Research and the Study of Comparative Politics," (Center for Advanced Study in The Behavioral Sciences, 1963); and Erwin Scheuch, "Progress in The Cross-Cultural Use of Surveys," (Paper submitted to the International Social Science Council, Round Table on Comparative Research, 1965). For a review of current efforts in cross-national research, including survey research, see Stein Rokkan, "Comparative Cross-National Research:

I. "OBJECTIVE" AND "SUBJECTIVE" POLITICAL RELEVANCE

Most contemporary definitions of politics in some fashion associate the political system with legitimate coercion or with the authoritative allocation of values. Although the emphasis has shifted from the legal and institutional aspects of government towards a more comprehensive view including all politicallyoriented social action, the "political nature" of an act is considered as determined by its relationship to the process of authoritative rule-making and enforcement. This definition centers on the authoritative facet of political decision-making, and not on the contents of decisions. It implies that whatever the goals of human behavior, such behavior becomes politically relevant if it affects the use of authority. The term "affects," however ambiguous, can be interpreted as referring to those components of authoritative decisions, allocations, etc., which an observer would impute to social action preceding the decision, on the basis of his "objective" interpretation of observable data.

The cultural dimension in political analysis, however, refers to the personal, subjective meaning ascribed by individuals and groups to behavior which has been "objectively" defined as politically relevant. It is concerned with orientations towards political actors or roles, towards political actions or structures. Such orientations are unlikely to be directed towards an abstract concept of authority: most will be directed towards the "who" and "what" of politics, associating authorityrightly or wrongly—with a particular actor, policy-goal or decision. In the evaluation of cultural data one is therefore confronted with the interpretation of the private, subjective meanings attributed by different individuals to given political objects. These cognitive orientations, and the evaluations associated with them, may differ because of differences in the psychological attributes of individuals. or because of differences in socio-cultural characteristics of a non-political nature, such as language,5 education, religion or ethnic origin.6 They may also vary because of differences in the way in which even individuals with similar socio-cultural characteristics perceive the relevance of a given political object to their goals and goal-oriented action.7 It has been shown

The Context of Current Efforts," in Merritt and Rokkan (eds.), Comparing Nations (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966). The problems of equivalence of meaning encountered in intranational survey research also apply to cross-national research; they are discussed in the literature on methods in survey research. For recent contributions in this area see Philip E. Converse, "New dimensions of meaning for cross-section sample surveys in politics," International Social Science Journal, 16 (1964), 19-34; Adam Przeworski and Henry Teune, "Equivalence in Cross-National Research," Public Opinion Quarterly, 30 (1966), 551-568.

⁵ With respect to semantic differences, see, for example, C. E. Osgood, G. J. Suci and P. H. Tannenbaum, The Measurement of Meaning (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1957); C. E. Osgood, "Cross-cultural comparability in attitude measurement via multilingual semantic differentials" in I. D. Steiner and M. Fishbein (eds.), Current Studies in Social Psychology (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston Inc., 1965), p. 95

⁶ The most comprehensive presentation and analysis of the psychological and social factors affecting political involvement is Robert E. Lane's Political Life (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1959). Since this study is based almost exclusively on data from the United States, where the politicization of life is relatively low, the salience of politics is not treated as a separate dimension. Its expression in political life is discussed as an aspect of ethnic—or economic—group politics, or in terms of the "conscious needs served by participation in political life."

⁷ Attitude research has shown that attitudes vary as a function of the perceived importance of the attitude-object in leading to or blocking the attainment of values, and as a function of the rated importance of the values associated with that object; see Milton J. Rosenberg, "Cognitive Structure and Attitudinal Affect," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 53 (1956), 367–372. See also S. M. Lipset's distinction between social "characteristics" and social "factors" affecting the rates of voting turnout. Among the "factors" Lipset includes "the relevance of government policies to the individual": Seymour recently that opinions and non-verbal behavior are based on attitudes towards objects and attitudes towards situations. Hence, the subjective relevance of a political object to the goal-oriented action of an individual can be seen as such a situational component of political behavior.

In cross-cultural, in contradistinction to intra-cultural, comparisons, one evaluates orientations towards different political objects. It is assumed that the objects are equivalent, but this assumption rests on the researcher's "objective" evaluation of the objects' structural and functional characteristics in the political systems concerned, whereas orientations towards these objects are based on the subjective perceptions of the respective populations. Since, by definition, one is dealing with different objects, indicators of their equivalence of meaning for the populations concerned are required. One such indicator is the equivalence in the subjective relevance of these objects to the goal-oriented action of the individuals or groups concerned, i.e., an indicator of an equivalent perception of the "objectin-situation," according to some common criterion of measurement.

Subjective relevance may or may not coincide with the objective relevance of a political object to an individual; it is the relevance as the individual perceives it. The concept of relevance, however, must be operationalized if one wishes to assign to a given political object different magnitudes of relevance for various individuals or groups. For this purpose it is useful to inquire into the way in which the political system is articulated with the goal-oriented actions of individuals and groups, and with the values attached to these goals.

II. GOAL-ORIENTED ACTIONS AND THE POLITICAL SYSTEM

One may conceive of all social action as directed towards the attainment of goals. Some goals are shared by groups, or even by the entire community, others are personal goals. The attainment of community goals may be sought by a great number of the community's members, or by a smaller number on their behalf. It is assumed that the individual participating in action oriented towards community goals is aware of the fact that he cannot attain these goals by himself. From the viewpoint of his own goal-orientation (i.e., motivation), his action is expressive: the act of participating in the attainment of community goals is considered as a goal per se. Goals not shared with others may also lead to expressive action, although most personal goals lead to an instrumental orientation towards action.

Martin Lipset, Political Man (New York: Doubleday & Co., 1960), pp. 186-190. On the relevance of government policies to business and industry, as a factor affecting the political interest and involvement of members of these sectors of the economy, see Lane, op. cit., pp. 321-326.

⁸ Milton Rokeach, "Attitude Change and Behavioral Change," Public Opinion Quarterly, 30 (1966), 529-550. "Attitude" is defined by Rokeach as "a relatively enduring organization of beliefs about an object or situation predisposing one to respond in some preferential manner."

The attainment of community goals is generally sought through action channelled into the political system; group goals and personal goals may or may not be sought through political action. Some areas of social life are regulated by authoritative decisions; in those which are not, individuals and groups seek to attain some of their goals without having recourse to the political system, while seeking other goals by addressing demands (and providing supports) to governmental structures, or to political parties and other political elites. This distinction between goal-oriented action channelled through the political system and action which takes place within and between the various sub-systems of society but does not affect the process of authoritative decisionmaking, can serve as a starting point for the construction of an operational concept of the relevance of politics. It is perhaps necessary to add that the validity of this distinction is not impaired by the fact that even social action which does not affect the political system may be affected by political decisions. One may argue that a good deal of our roles in social subsystems are structured by the expectations of other actors and that these expectations are partly based on legal norms. The consequences of a contract, the requirements of corporation law, motor traffic regulations and innumerable other norms are part of the web of "complementary expectations" that impose limitations on the actor, and such legal norms are, of course, a regulatory output of the political system. Nevertheless, most of these norms do not prescribe any action, but merely define the conditions regulating certain types of behavior, if and when it occurs. Such rules must be considered as parts of the systems within and between which social action is taking place. This is implied in Parsons' definition of a social system as a system of interaction, oriented by complexes of complementary expectations concerning roles and sanctions.

It is now possible to return to the concept of the personal relevance of politics. Let us suppose that citizens A and B have expressed equal support for candidate X or have been equally involved in the election campaign supporting him; but whereas A seeks to attain some of his personal goals through political action, B does not have recourse to the political system in his endeavours to attain equivalent goals. If A expects to attain his goals with the help of the office for which X is competing, the relevance of the success or defeat of X is much higher for A than for B. It appears, therefore, that without knowing the subjective personal relevance of the political object "electoral success of candidate X" to A and to B, one would ascribe equivalent scores of partisanship or participation to their opinions or behavior. But if the differences in relevance are known. the apparent equivalence in partisanship. participation, etc., is no equivalence at all. Without the expectation of personal goalattainment, A would not support X, or would not support him to the same extent. Assuming that B does not expect equivalent "rewards" from the electoral success of X, the difference between input and expected reward, i.e., the net propensity to support X, is—ceteris paribus—greater for B than for A.

This hypothetical example suggests that "objective" differences in political opinions and behavior must be interpreted in terms of subjective personal relevance in order to assess net differences in partisanship, participation, etc. The importance of an indicator of equivalent perceptions of the "object-in-situation" in cross-cultural comparisons, where not only the situations, but also the objects of orientation are different, has already been mentioned.

Although the comparison of political orientations or behavior is a step preceding theory building, the heuristic value of comparative analysis lies precisely in the use of a conceptual framework for identifying and classifying data which lends itself to the formulation of statements about the relationship between variables. Political opinions and voting behavior have often been analyzed in terms of sociocultural variables, but, as Bendix and Lipset pointed out some time ago, social attributes are merely shorthand indicators of group-determined interests, and "the effort to relate voting trends to various sub-groups of the population has a rationale only if it is assumed that these groupings are also interest constellations of a certain if varying cohesiveness." Without subscribing to a monistic "self-interest theory" of political behavior, "I the present analysis suggests a "personal relevance" dimension for the interpretation of data in the comparative study of political culture and as an element for a conceptual framework of a theory of political behavior.

III. MEASURING MAGNITUDES OF RELEVANCE

Assuming that orientations towards political objects can be viewed as structured by particular situations in which the political object is perceived as more or less relevant in terms of goal-oriented social action, the next problem is to find a unit capable of measuring magnitudes of relevance in different situations. Confronted with the problem of evaluating attitudes towards the output of local government in different countries, the authors of The Civic Culture admit that they "shall have to keep in mind . . . that the structure of government and community organization changes from one nation to another." They claim, however, that this does not make the attitudinal data any less significant, because "the norms to which an individual adheres are largely determined by the role that the system allows him to play ... [and] these norms in turn have a feedback effect on the structure": furthermore. attitudes towards government depend also on certain social and attitudinal characteristics of individuals. 12 Without questioning the validity of these assumptions, it seems that rather than drawing conclusions about the impact of structural differences on cultural patterns from 11 On the "self-interest axiom" in social action see Anthony Downs, An Economic Theory of Democracy (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1957), pp. 27ff. According to Bendix and Lipset, "cultural, socio-psychological and situational determinants . . . intervene between the economic position of individuals and their collective actions, . . . these intervening conditions modifythough they do not nullify-the impact of economic self-interest on conduct " ("Political Sociology," op. cit. p. 88). On economic interest and political involvement see Lane, op. cit. pp. 102-108, 321-334; an example of a recent study is Frank Lindenfeld, "Economic Interest and Political Involvement," Public Opinion Quarterly, 28 (1964), 104-111.

¹² Almond and Verba, op, cit. p. 168.

⁹ See Arthur L. Kalleberg, "The Logic of Comparison: A Methodological Note on the Comparative Study of Political Systems," World Politics, 19 (1966), 69-82.

¹⁰ Reinhard Bendix and Seymour M. Lipset, "Political Sociology," Current Sociology, 6 (1957), 79-99.

structure-bound orientations. one ought to interpret such orientations by means of comparable indicators of the relevant aspects of structural differences.

One way of overcoming this difficulty is to compute an index reflecting the ratio between social action addressed to the political system and other goal-oriented action, in terms of the preference rank-order assigned by individuals, groups or nations to their goals of social action. I propose to call this index the salience of politics. The concept of salience is based on the assumption that at any given time, individuals and groups view the goals towards which their action is oriented as ranking in a certain order of preference, in terms of the values attached to these goals. Goals in different areas of life may be assigned to the same rank, and ranks may be classified as broader or narrower in range; but it is assumed that there is always a certain order of preference, however limited the number of goals.

The salience of politics can be measured at the orientational and at the non-verbal behavioral level. At the orientational level, the salience will be lowest when an individual sees no relationship whatsoever between a given political object and his goal-oriented behavior, which is channelled entirely towards nonpolitical objects. And salience will be highest when he expects to attain the goals he values most through the given political object rather than through non-political action. Between these points of minimum and maximum salience, the magnitude of salience is computed from the ratio between the rank-order of goals which are sought through the given political object and that of goals sought through nonpolitical channels.

A distinction can be made between the salience of a given political object and the salience of "politics in general." An individual may expect goal-attainment with the help of a candidate for the state legislature without relating this expectation to his orientations towards the party's candidate for the mayoralty. Demands addressed at one level of the political system are not necessarily related to demands at other levels; it is even likely that at any given time, demands will not be expressed at more than one level. Yet, on the support side of the "interaction of expectations," there can be-and seems to be in many political systems-some degree of coordination between orientations (and behavior) at different levels of the political system, due mainly to the organizational efforts of activists, factions or parties. These efforts are probably more successful at any particular level when there is some expectation of "rewards" at any other level of the system. It is therefore possible to conceive of a salience of "politics in general" For the study of orientations towards a given political object, the salience of "politics in general" can be regarded as indirect salience, the magnitude of which can be assessed from the preference rank-order of the goals associated with demands at other levels of the political system.

At the level of non-verbal behavior, the salience of politics is the relative frequency of action aimed at the attainment of highly valued goals and directed at the political system, as compared to non-political action for the attainment of equivalent goals. At the micropolitical level, the magnitude of "behavioral" salience can be computed only from past behavior. At the macro-level of analysis, the relative frequency of political action for the attainment of highly valued goals can be measured either at any given moment or for a given period of time. In the first instance, frequency refers to the number of cases in specific groups or in the total population; in the second, to the number of cases at successive times of measurement. The latter type of measurement can also be used to indicate successive stages of a process through which the attainment of highly valued goals by political action has become-or has ceased to be-a component of the political culture of specific groups of society.13

By measuring the salience of politics it is possible to determine the preference-level of goals at which the political system is articulated with social action. Anchored in value-orientations towards goals as well as in externalized social action, the salience of politics is a dimension of the "bridge" linking macro-and micro-political analysis, which Almond and Verba set out to construct in their operational concept of political culture.

Used as a filter variable, the salience dimension is capable of increasing the equivalence of meaning in the evaluation of cultural data. This refers to the procedure which consists in calculating relationships within nations and comparing them across nations. It is used, for example, in the comparison of income groups across nations, when respondents are matched according to their position on the scale of income-distribution (e.g., the top X per cent of earners in each nation), rather than according to the equivalence of their incomes in each other's currency. One could add that-mutatis mutandis—the salience dimension of politics also attempts to equalize differences in the purchasing power of the respective currencies and differences in culturally-determined consumer habits or saving propensities.

¹³ The correlation between salience at the orientational and at the behavioral level is a researchable variable. One may assume that for any given individual the present perception and evaluation of politics in terms of goal-attainment will be related to his past experience with goal-seeking through political action. At the macro-level of analysis, one would expect a high positive correlation between the orientational and the behavioral magnitude of salience, except in periods of rapid change.

Political orientations do not refer to objects in their objective structural setting, but to subjectively perceived "objects-in-situations." To increase cross-national (or cross-cultural) equivalence of meaning, one has to evaluate differences in the meanings ascribed to "objects-in-situations," rather than objective structural differences. It has been suggested that this can be done through the use of the relational concept of relevance. Objects O1, O2, \dots O_n will have equivalent meanings for actors $A_1, A_2, \ldots A_n$, if their salience for these actors is of the same magnitude. Obviously, this equivalence of meaning is expressed only in terms of the preference-level of goals, for the attainment of which the given political object is perceived as instrumental. This does not imply, however, that the equivalence of meaning refers only to cases of an instrumental orientation towards politics. Goals have been defined so as to include expressive orientations. both towards unshared personal goals and towards participation in the attainment of group or community goals. Furthermore, equivalence of meaning is also obtained in cases where the given political object is not perceived as relevant to the attainment of any goal. Classification of data according to the magnitude of salience is not necessarily the only procedure through which equivalent subjective meanings can be assigned to political objects,14 but it is a procedure consistent with the assumption that all social action, including political action, is goal-oriented, and that at any given time goals can be considered as ranking in a specific order of preference. The ¹⁴ A method for the measurement of the crossnational validity of political concepts through a differentiation between identical and equivalent indicators has been proposed by Adam Przeworski and Henry Teune, op. cit. operational advantage of the concept of salience consists in its ability to translate objective structural differences into a dimension on which comparable scores can be plotted.

IV. POLITICAL "SALIENCE" AND RELATED CONCEPTS

However, the measurement of the personal relevance of politics is not merely a device for increasing the equivalence of data in comparative analysis. The magnitude of the salience of politics is a characteristic of the political cultures of groups or nations. It is also associated with specific structural and functional characteristics of both the political and the social systems, or of important sub-systems of each. One cannot expect a high frequency of personal goal-seeking through political action unless political groups, parties or office-holders can command sufficient resources (including material resources, as well as positions of power or prestige) to meet a substantial part of the demand: and citizens will not seek highlyvalued goals through political action if such goals can be attained at lesser cost through non-political channels. These structural and functional characteristics are reflected at the cultural level of politics. If highly-valued goals are sought more frequently through political action in nation A than in nation B, one may expect the stakes of politics to be higher in A than in B, and this difference to be expressed in the intensity of political competition and conflict and in the patterns of political conflict resolution. Where the salience of politics is highest, as, for example, in totalitarian dictatorships in which most areas of social life are subjected to governmental or political decisionmaking, no overt competition and conflict can be tolerated, and conflict resolution is authoritarian and repressive. Examples of a high salience of politics, for specific political subcultures, can also be found in non-totalitarian systems.15

The concept of salience is related to La Palombara's "magnitude" of politics, which he proposes as a dimension of political change. Magnitude is "the ratio of political activity, however institutionalized, to all of the other activity that takes place in society." This formulation seems to imply the possibility of quantifying the total function performance of the political system and assumes all social goals to be of equal or equivalent value. The concept of salience is based on the very assumption that goals are given different values, and relates the performance of political and government functions to the value-orientations towards the goals that are sought by means of political action. It thereby circumvents the difficulty of quantification at the total-performance level and plots relative frequencies of performance on a scale of value-orientations towards goals.

¹⁵ See infra.

¹⁶ J. La Palombara, "Notes, Queries, and Dilemmas," in J. La Palombara (ed.), Bureaucracy and Political Development (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1963), pp. 42-43.

In considering the salience of politics as a dimension of political culture, I use the term "political culture" in a sense which goes beyond the meaning Almond originally ascribed to it. Almond has consistently defined political culture as a pattern of orientations—cognitive, affective and evaluative—and Verba has adopted the same definition.¹⁷ Yet, the salience of politics also refers to a particular type of non-verbal behavior: social action addressed to the political system for the attainment of highly-valued goals. This implies a concept of political culture which includes both orientations and non-verbal behavior. This interpretation rests on the assumption that the interest in political culture centers on the impact of beliefs and values on political behavior, and not on belief-systems or value-systems as such. Furthermore, the extent to which beliefs, affects and values are externalized in political behavior is in itself a very relevant dimension of political culture. This was recognized by the authors of The Civic Culture when they emphasized the importance of the divergence between orientations and actual behavior in a civic culture: "A citizen within the civic culture has . . . a reserve of influence . . . he is not the active citizen; he is the potentially active citizen . . . the inconsistencies within attitudes and inconsistencies between attitudes and behavior . . . can maintain the tension between citizen activity and citizen passivity."18

This interpretation of culture is not restricted to political culture alone. We have the support of two leading anthropologists for a "behavioral concept" of culture. According to Kroeber, "everyone is agreed that culture at least contains channelled or selected forms, norms and values, a stream of related ideas and expressible patterns. Some would stop ¹⁷ Sidney Verba, "Comparative Political Culture," in L. Pye and S. Verba (eds.), Political Culture and Political Development (Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1965), p. 549.

¹⁸ Almond and Verba, op. cit., pp. 481-482.

there; but most anthropologists would include in culture also human behavior—at any rate such human behavior as is influenced or conditioned by ideas or forms and in turn is engaged in producing, maintaining or modifying them";19 and Kluckhohn adds that most social scientists would agree that "culture consists of patterns, explicit and implicit, of and for behavior "20 "The explicit culture consists in those regularities in word and deed which may be generalized straight from the evidence of the ear and eye."21 No less significant is the fact that Parsons has found it necessary to revise his original position on the status of cultural systems, which he has come to consider as "systems of action in the direct sense."22

The origins of the micro-analytical concept of salience can be found in attitude research, though without special reference to politics. Duijker, quoting Chein, includes the "degree of salience of object in personal life space" as one of ten dimensions of all attitudes.²³ Rosenberg has shown that attitudes vary as a function of the perceived importance of the object in leading to or blocking the attainment of values.24 Himmelstrand defines salience "in terms of the kind of stimuli required to call into action the dispositions which make up the attitude" and constructs a salience scale for the measurement of attitude salience which he applies to a study of political knowledge.25 An earlier application of the concept in the study of political attitudes is reported by Rokkan and his associates in the study of

- ¹⁹ A. Kroeber, The Nature of Culture (Chicago, 1952), p. 107.
- ²⁰ C. Kluckhohn, "Culture and Behavior" in G. Lindzey (ed.), Handbook of Social Psychology (Cambridge, Mass., 1954), II, pp. 923-924. The emphasis is mine.
- ²¹ C. Kluckhohn, "The Study of Culture," in D. Lerner and H. D. Laswell (eds.), The Policy Sciences (Stanford, 1951), p. 88. The emphasis is mine.
- ²² Talcott Parsons, "Culture and the Social System," Introduction to Part IV of Talcott Parsons, Edward Shils, Kaspar Naegele and Jesse Pitts (eds.), Theories of Society (Glencoe, Ill., The Free Press, 1961), p. 964.
- ²³ H. C. J. Duijker, "Comparative Research in Social Science with special reference to Attitude Research," International Social Science Bulletin, 4 (1955), p. 560.
 - 24 See note 7.
- ²⁵ Ulf Himmelstrand, Social Pressures, Attitudes and Democratic Processess (Stockholm: Almquist and Wiksell, 1960), pp. 157, 166, 181.

teachers' attitudes.20 By correlating attitudes with elements of the social and political structural setting and with political issues, a number of theoretical propositions have emerged from the growing body of voting studies and the comparative studies of citizen participation in which the micro-analytical concept of salience must be considered as implicitly assumed. The elementary finding that the ratio of party members to party supporters (voters) in Western Europe is relatively higher in the Labor parties than in other political parties implies that politics has a higher degree of salience for wage-earners and other Labor voters than for the supporters of other parties. even if party membership cannot be considered a reliable indicator of salience. In voting studies, the salience of political issues is assumed to be one of the determinants of voting decisions. Thus, according to The American Voter, which is probably, so far, the voting study with the most sophisticated theoretical orientation, issue familiarity is defined in terms of awareness of the issue and awareness of its political relevance, and one of the determinants of the intensity of issue opinion is the relevance of the issue to the values of the opinion holder.27 This, however, refers only to the salience of political issues: i.e., it is assumed that the issue has already been channelled into the political process and is recognized as such by the opinion holder. Furthermore, the political issue is assumed to be related to the values of the opinion holder without inquiring into goal attainment through non-political action. When the nature of the issue excludes non-political goal attainment, the perceived salience of politics in terms of issues is in fact merely the perceived salience of the issue. It is possible that for the study of voting decisions one need not go beyond the salience of the issue, but for the study of political culture it seems necessary to measure frequencies of political and non-political goal-seeking.

Studies of political interest and apathy

²⁵ Aubert, Fisher, Rokkan, "A Comparative Study of Teachers' Attitudes to International Problems and Policies," Journal of Social Issues, 4 (1954), 25-39; S. Rokkan, "Party Preference and Opinion Patterns in Western Europe," International Social Science Bulletin, 4. (1956), 587-588. See also S. Rokkan, "Citizen Participation in Political Life," International Social Science Journal, 12 (1960), pp. 12-13.

²⁷ A. Campbell, P. Converse, W. Miller, D. Stokes, The American Voter (N.Y.: John Wiley & Sons, 1960), pp. 177-178.

come somewhat closer to a micro-analytical conceptualization of salience. An interesting typology of attitudes towards politics in terms of salience, constructed from a survey of attitudes of a sample of students at the University of Frankfort, has been proposed by Habermas and his associates in Student und Politik.28 Campbell, in discussing the determinants of political interest,29 introduces the concept of the "expected differential" likely to result from the choice of one rather than another of the available alternatives, and the concept of the "relative psychological cost" which the electorate must pay for participation in the electoral process. Transcending electoral behavior, Almond and Verba have inquired into "subjective competence" as an orientation towards political action in the area of feedback to government performance.30 Furthermore, they consider salience as determining the balance between activity and passivity, but it is not clear whether salience refers to affective, to instrumental or to both affective and instrumental orientations towards politics.31 In his discussion of the aspects of "political style," Verba mentions "the extent to which a differentiation is made between the political and other spheres of life," i.e., "the degree of politicization of private life."32 This is precisely the area in which the operational concept of salience proposed in this paper is capable of making some useful distinctions between the "levels" at which the political is articulated with the non-political sphere of life. The use of structural criteria and of the concept of "cumulativeness of social activity" enables Allardt to construct a typology of political activity in terms of cumulativeness with other social activity and of expressive or instrumental goal-orientation.33 This combination of goal orientation and structural approaches should be conducive to a more elaborate framework for a theory of political action, of which the "interest theory" pro-

²⁸ Habermas, Friedeburg, Oehler, Weltz, Student und Politik (Frankfurt: Neuwied, 1961), pp. 71-123.

²³ A. Campbell, "The Passive Citizen," Acta Sociologica, 6, (1962), 9-21.

³⁰ Almond and Verba, op. cit., pp. 180-261.

³¹ Ibid., pp. 481-482.

³² S. Verba, "Comparative Political Culture," op. cit., pp 544-550.

³³ E. Allardt, "Community Activity, Leisure and Social Structure," Acta Sociologica, 6 (1962), 67-82.

pounded by Bendix and Lipset is an example.34

It is not unlikely that the earlier over-concentration of empirical studies on voting behavior and political socialization in terms of attitude formation is partly responsible for the fact that few political scientists have so far attempted to construct a framework for a theory of political action. Electoral behavior sheds little light on the components of political action, because in the act of voting there is no interaction. Voting may be the outcome of previous interactions, but the act of voting is a terminal point, and whatever its relevance at the macro-political level, there is no political action of other actors than can be considered as complementary to any specific individual act of voting (wherever the vote is secret). Furthermore, voting sometimes reflects group conformity rather than orientations towards specific political issues, candidates or parties. In Parsons' typology voting is either an expressive or a responsible action;35 since the expected goal-attainment is "shared" with many other actors, it could be, at best, an imperfect instrumental action. Many political actions, however, are predominantly instrumen-

In Downs' "Economic Theory of Democracy"36 an attempt has been made to view voting as a quasi-instrumental action. In this "economic" model of political action, voting is the link between two sets of goal-pursuing processes: voters seek to maximize their "utility income" from government action by electing the party most responsive to their wants, and party leaders seek the rewards of office (power, prestige or income) by strategies devised to maximize voting support on election day. This is a model of rational decision making but rationality is defined as action efficiently designed to achieve consciously selected political ends. Hence only "political rationality" is considered, and it is admitted that individually rational but politically irrational mechanisms can be employed to decide for whom to vote (party loyalty, family socialization, the attractive personality of a leader, etc.). Thus, "personal rationality" in voting decisions may contradict the assumptions of the model. Yet. even the politically rational voter cannot vote rationally, because he lacks the necessary information about the voting intentions of other voters. Furthermore, in a two-party system rationality leads parties to becloud their policies in a fog of ambiguity, thus discouraging rational behavior by voters; and in a multiparty system, where there is uncertainty about the composition of the government coalition. voting is, at best, a preference poll. Whatever the other merits of "An Economic Theory of Democracy," it has provided an excellent demonstration of the fact that voting behavior is not a useful starting point for a micro-analytical conceptualization of political action.

³⁴ Bendix and Lipset, op. cit. Neil J. Smelser has used these elements for his macro-political theory of collective behavior: see his Theory of Collective Behavior (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1962).

³⁵ This refers to the typology in T. Parsons and E. Shils (eds.), Towards a General Theory of Action (New York: Harper and Row, 1951, 1962), p. 75. ³⁶ Anthony Downs, op. cit.

V. THE UTILITY OF THE SALIENCE CONCEPT

The operational concept of the salience of politics has been presented in this paper within the framework of comparative cultural analysis and no assumptions have been made about the relationship between magnitudes of salience and specific types of orientations of forms of behavior. And yet, if the usefulness of the concept in comparative analysis can be demonstrated, it should find its place in the conceptual framework for an empirical theory of political behavior.

For the purpose of increasing the comparability of different situations in the interpretation of cultural data, attention has been focused on the magnitude of salience in terms of goal preference. For a theory of political behavior, however, it is necessary to consider not only the preference level of expected goal attainment, but also the costs involved in seeking these goals through political rather than non-political channels. Furthermore, it may be necessary to inquire into what Parsons has called the "cathectic meaning" of an object, "in respect of which its significance in terms of goal-attainment or of blockage of such attainment is paramount."37 This will be referred to here as the "role" of the political object in the perceived or actual process of goalattainment.

There are four possible "roles" in which a political object can be perceived in this process:

(a) It may be a goal, as in the expressive type of political action, either in the "consummatory" or in the "inclusion-membership" sense of the term.²⁸

³⁷ Talcott Parsons, "Culture and the Social System," op. cit., p. 967.

38 Ibid. Parsons admits that "in one sense inclusion is also a category of reward, the reward of

TABLE 7. INTERRELATIONS OF PREDICTORS AND ATTITUDES

Developed	Long Distance fro USSR and Chir		ensity	Authoritarian	High Growth Rate
High		· .			High
	Low	Low		Low
Underdeveloped	Close to USSR a	nd High	Densit y	Non-authoritarian .	Low Growth Rate
High UN Pay	One Party and Mobilized	Close U.S. Relations	Bigness	Close to U.S. and Low Ratio People to School	Racially Heterogeneous
	High	High	High	High	High
Low					_
Low UN Pay	Multiple to No Party and Non- Moblized	Far U.S. Relations	Smallness	Long Distance fro U.S. and High Ra People to Schoo	tio Homogeneous

Babaa also sees a number of reasons (i.e., protection, dignity) why the "non-aligned" should view the United Nations in favorable terms.24 J. Karefo-Smart has maintained, "... even though the Charter was written and adopted while most of the African states were still colonial territories, the Africans nonetheless hold the Charter of the United Nations in the highest esteem."25 In regard to the General Assembly in particular, Robert Keohane has pointed out, "Yet it cannot be properly said that the actions of the General Assembly merely reflect the power realities of international politics. On the contrary, the quasiparliamentary nature of the organization gives the small and poor states, over thirty of which have become independent only since 1960, arithmetical advantage in its internal political process."²⁶ Related themes are stressed by Catherine Senf Manno:

Nations, (New York: Foreign Policy Association, 1962), p. 54.

Here we describe more definitely the nature and extent of imbalance in actual voting results, in order to document the conclusion that 'great powers' of East and West have not succeeded-in terms of voting victories-in offsetting their small share of formal voting strength by informal sources of influence decision power in the General Assembly is inversely related to power in an economic or military sense . . . As between the underdeveloped and the advanced countries, the newly independent countries and those still administering or recently divested of colonial possession, there is not a balance of winnings and losses, but rather a constant pressure through massive majorities of the former for redistribution in their favor.27

²⁴ Khalid I. Babaa, "The 'Third Force' and the United Nations," The Annals, 362 (November, 1965), 81-91.

²⁵ John Karefa-Smart, "Africa and the United Nations," International Organization, 19 (1965), p. 766.

²⁶ Robert Owens Keohane, "Political Influence in the General Assembly," International Conciliation, No. 557 (1966), p. 5.

²⁷ Catherine Senf Manno, "Majority Decisions and Minority Responses in the UN General Assembly," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 10 (1966), pp. 7-9.

Thus, underdeveloped states frequently seem to "get more" out of the UN than developed states. In view of this, it may be possible to formulate a theoretical basis for this in a "formal" set of statements. Thus, "causal" reasons for a lack of enthusiasm with the United Nations by delegates from developed states and positive orientation by the underdeveloped states might be postulated as follows:

States differ in their economic development. States with higher economic development generally have high capabilities to supply human needs, regardless of international organizational affiliation, than states with lower economic development. International organizations may be considered devices which augment, in a limited way, the capabilities of states. Because the capabilities of developed states are already high, the contributions of international organizations to their capabilities are generally less significant, as a fraction of total capabilities, than in the case of states with lower development. Because statesmen may value an augmentation of capabilities to the extent that it is a "significant increment" representatives from underdeveloped states may generally value international organizations more than developed states. This may be particularly true if representatives from underdeveloped states are in a position to have a considerable voice in the organization (i.e., have a majority where majority rule is used). Thus, attitudinal differences might be expected among statesmen, toward the United Nations, related to their home states' economic development. One might expect, for example, that representatives from economically underdeveloped states would be more satisfied, see things in more dynamic terms. and be more inclined to bolster the organization than representatives from developed states.

Unfortunately, if high development is causally linked to negative delegate attitudes, the likely permanence of a developed-under-developed split in the world may indicate long-run negativism by delegates from developed states. Also, delegates from underdeveloped states, because of their possibly "weaker" position, 28 do not seem to possess many levers to bring (if this is possible) their colleagues from more developed states to a more positive and dynamic outlook. Kenneth Boulding has pointed out, "One does not negotiate from strength; one may dictate from strength, but one does not negotiate."²⁹ Lloyd Jensen comes to a similar conclusion when he argues, "Thus there appears to be considerable evidence to reject the theory that nations [people?] negotiate most seriously from positions of strength."³⁰ Thus, if the present study can be assumed to have tapped some of the attitudinal propensities in the existing situation, regardless of its ultimate basis, possible "position" inflexibilities on the part of the delegates from developed nations, because of their relatively "strong" position, might be suggested.

The relevance and interpretation of other predictors seem somewhat less clear. The importance of "Distance" may indicate a kind of negative/static "attitudinal sphere of influence" emanating from the USSR and China, or it may simply provide a geographic reference that helps "locate" less positive delegate attitudes, the reasons for which are obscure. Generally speaking, this predictor seems to indicate that African and South American delegates are frequently more "positive" and "dynamic" in their outlooks than delegates closer to the USSR and Communist China.

The predictor of "Density" and the remaining predictors appear even harder to grapple with and, at this point, it seems unwise to attempt to formulate possible "causal explanations" without replication and additional evidence.

A question that might arise in connection with these findings is—what possible difference can it make what delegates think about the UN? Are not delegates simply "mouthpieces" of their respective state governments without an important shaping role in the institutions in which they operate?

I do not accept this view of the role of delegates because of the character of the United Nations diplomatic process. The difference between "traditional" diplomacy and United Nations diplomacy, the latter sometimes called "parliamentary diplomacy," has been frequently discussed. Parliamentary diplomacy, ²⁹ Kenneth Boulding, Conflict and Defense (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1963), p. 323.

²⁰ Lloyd Jensen, "Military Capabilities and Bargaining Behavior," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 9 (1965), p. 163.

³¹ See: H. G. Nicholas, The Evolution of the Diplomatic Method (New York: Macmillan, 1954), p. 84; H. G. Nicholas, The United Nations as a Political Institution (London: Oxford University Press, 1961), pp. 88-122; Sydney D. Bailey, The General Assembly of the United Nations (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1960), pp. 8-18; Gary Best, Diplomacy in the United Na-

²⁸ That is, such delegates have less, in the way of state capabilities, standing "behind" their wishes, desires and demands.

in contrast to traditional diplomacy, is characterized by public debate and voting. Traditional diplomacy, on the other hand, tends to be characterized by secret or semi-secret bargaining. The various activities connected with parliamentary diplomacy, in addition to bargaining, seem to open avenues of possible state agent impact upon the international political process not present in the traditional situation.

It is not enough, then, to understand the formal policy positions of states, interacting in the UN parliamentary situation, although this is important. Attention must also be directed to tendencies and biases of those participating in that process.

To illustrate potential delegate impact, it has been pointed out that former United Nations Ambassador, Henry Cabot Lodge "frequently got his instructions changed and 'usually wins his point' in differences with the State Department. . . 'Sometimes the 'instructions' he gets from Washington are verbatim playbacks of what he wrote himself' in part because developments 'happen too fast to rely upon specific instruction.'"32 Richard F. Pederson, in discussing the variegated functions of the United Nations Missions, which include: "(1) negotiation and parliamentary action; (2) the formulation of policy and tactics; (3) influencing opinion; (4) information gathering; (5) representation; and (6) public relations,"33 has also stressed the freedom of and potential impact of individual delegates:

Other characteristics of the UN which uniquely influence negotiations include the fact that all UN negotiation is, in effect, multilateral as is also the "openness" of UN activity, e.g., the fact that at any moment any one of the negotiators may make a public test of negotiating strengths by taking an issue out of private talks and into the public forum... they [the delegates] have a large measure of discretion in tactics... There are exceptional cases when issues must be decided immediately and UN delegations are compelled to vote without instructions from their governments; such votes may establish governmental policy... a UN delegation in its advisory capacity may exert significant influence on national policy... Some delegations, in fact, receive only general instructions, allowing them the latitude to make many decisions themselves.... Information and the consequent assessment of it by delegations are often crucial elements in final governmental policy decisions.³⁴

This being the case, the delegate orientations implied by the analysis in this study suggest that developed-state representatives may provide a kind of check or "resistance" to developments in the United Nations to augment its role in world affairs. This would be the expected effect of those who appear less satisfied with things, particularly the general role and performance of most of the organs; tend to view many organs decreasing now and in the future; express a desire to decrease the role and powers of certain organs; and do not expect much change in respect to present Charter membership arrangements and gentlemen's agreements.

To summarize, United Nations delegates' responses to a questionnaire were found to be related to eleven predictors generated from a factor analysis of 48 variables relating to the respondents' home states. In all, 98 "significant" correlations were found. Of all of the predictors considered, economic development was the best in the sense of generating numerous correlations. High "Development Factor" scores were found, for the most part, to be related to negative and/or static attitudes. Because of the important organizational role of delegates, attitudinal negativism by delegates from developed states is likely to have considerable relevance for patterns of present and future support, development, and use of the United Nations.

tions (Northwestern University, 1960, unpublished dissertation).

³² Cecil B. Crabb, Jr., American Foreign Policy in the Nuclear Age (Elmsford, N.Y.: Row, Peterson & Co., 1960), p. 442 f.

³³ Richard F. Pederson, "National Representation in the United Nations," International Organization, 15 (1961), p. 258.

³⁴ Ibid., pp. 258-264.

NATIONAL POLITICAL UNITS IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY: A STANDARDIZED LIST*

Bruce M. Russet Yale University

J. DAVID SINGER University of Michigan

MELVIN SMALL Wayne State University

When a field of study begins to develop more rigorous methods, well-defined concepts, and greater emphasis on systematic comparison, it is well on the way to becoming a science. In the past decade or so, these traits have become increasingly evident in the study of comparative politics and international politics. But the development of sharper methodology and conceptual sophistication on the part of individual researchers is not quite sufficient. One of the earmarks of a healthy scientific discipline is the extent to which each set of findings may be compared to and combined with the results of earlier investigations; in short, research must become cumulative. Certain obstacles still inhibit us, among which might be counted: disagreement as to the precise boundaries of comparative and international politics; highly disparate theoretical frameworks; lack of consensus regarding the specification and measurement of key variables; and insufficient data storage and retrieval arrangements. Another difficulty has been in the absence of a generally agreed delineation of our empirical domains: What are the political entities whose attributes and relationships must concern us? More simply, we have not yet defined our population, and until the population is defined, we know neither the domain about which we seek to generalize, nor the criteria for selecting a sample from that population.

* The early stages of this enterprise occurred while the first author was a visiting scholar at Michigan. We are grateful to Susan Jones, Barbara Milsten, and Wendy Hoag for assistance in the preparation of earlier lists, and to William Foltz, Michael Hudson, and Robert Tilman for their comments on later drafts. This list of national political units has been agreed to by representatives of a group of quantitatively-oriented international politics scholars and the Inter-University Consortium for Political Research in the hope that such standardization will contribute to greater comparability and cumulativeness in international and cross-national research. For specification of sub-national groups or regions, a supplementary two-column code is being worked out and may soon be available through the Consortium.

Although this is hardly the most pressing issue facing our two fields, and while a successful delineation of our population is far from a sufficient condition for the growth of a scientific discipline, it does strike us as a necessary precondition. In earlier works, each of us has indeed defined his population of political entities, but both of those efforts were of a particular nature, tailored to the needs of rather specific research enterprises.1 Neither list would suffice for the widely varying research enterprises already under way, or for those that are bound to follow in the years ahead. In the present paper, therefore, we attempt to remedy those shortcomings and propose a list of all those units which might be included in these two closely related fields. More particularly, we offer here a population of those national or quasi-national political entities which should serve the needs of most comparative and/or international politics scholars concerned with such entities, or a sample thereof, ¹ One is Singer's Correlates of War Study, examining a range of systemic and national attributes which are associated with the onset of all international war above a given magnitude since 1815: the population is defined in J. David Singer and Melvin Small, "The Composition and Status Ordering of the International System, 1815-1940," World Politics, 18 (January 1966), 236-282, and it includes all independent entities since 1815 with populations exceeding 500,000. The other is Bruce M. Russett, and Hayward R. Alker, Karl W. Deutsch, and Harold D. Lasswell, World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964), now undergoing substantial expansion and updating at Yale by Michael Hudson, Charles Taylor, and Robert Hefner. The new version deals with U.N. members and all other independent states or colonies with populations exceeding one million.

- (b) It may be a means, (i.e., a sufficient condition) towards achieving political or non-political goals; in this sense most political actions are instrumental.
- (c) It may be a necessary condition: when political or non-political goals cannot be achieved unless the actor acts in a specific way towards a given political object.
- (d) It may be an obstacle: when action directed at a given political object prevents the attainment of a goal.

A theory of political behavior would have to consider the structural conditions, both psychological and environmental (social and cultural), which are likely to be conducive to one rather than another of these four possible ways of perceiving the role of politics in the process of goal attainment.

The concept of salience does not imply that all political actions are instrumental, or are perceived to be instrumental, for the achievement of non-political goals. Expressive action, in which a political object is highly valued as a goal per se, or action in which a political object is instrumental for the attainment of another political goal, can also be assessed according to the rank-order of the value attached to the goal. The concept of salience is also useful for the distinction between mere instrumentality (type (b)) and "politics as a condition" (type (c)).

Examples of political action as a (necessary) condition for the attainment of non-political goals can be found in totalitarian systems. where certain educational or occupational goals cannot be attained without membership in one of the organizations of the ruling party or clique. In these cases the salience of politics is very high, but this condition need not necessarily apply—to the same extent—to all groups of a given society. An example of "politics as a condition" in a non-totalitarian system is party patronage in societies open to rapid and large-scale immigration, where important sectors of the economy are highly politicized. In Israel, a country of mass immigration, all political parties have performed, or are still performing, distributive and allocating functions. When immigrants have no financial means of their own, the supply of services, credit and occupational opportunities by political parties becomes an important factor in political mobilization among immigrants. Other groups, such as the more firmly established or wealthier veteran settlers, can attain their highly valued goals without channeling their action through the political process, although the pattern of what had previously been "politics as a condition" and has now become an instrumental orientation towards political parties, has survived among many veteran settler groups. An instrumental orientation towards politics can come very close to "politics as a condition" even in democratic systems which do not face problems similar to that of immigrant absorption. This happens when one political party has a quasi-monopoly of influence in a particular geographic area, causing the development of special relationships such as the parentela between certain associational groups and the politically dominant Christian-Democratic party in the traditional South of Italy.39

In a different perspective, it may prove useful to inquire into the correlation between the magnitude of salience and the stage of economic, social and political development. Is what one may assume to be the relatively low salience of politics in the United States determined by the homogeneity of the political culture or by factors pertaining to the economic system? Furthermore, is a low salience of politics in terms of goal attainment a prerequisite of stable democracy?

Is it possible to measure political development-in terms of integration and mobilization or distribution and regulation—through measurements of changes in the magnitude of salience? Presumably, in developing countries the salience of politics will increase up to a certain stage in the processes of development: thereafter, however, the different patterns of adaptation and integration through which the political system meets the impact of change along different and sometimes contrasting dimensions, may accelerate or slow down the further increase of salience; and we know that at a relatively late stage in the development of the Western political systems there was a clear tendency for a decrease in the salience of politics, particularly in the area of economic activity.40

³⁹ J. La Palombara, Interest Groups in Italian Politics (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1964), pp. 306-348.

⁴⁰ Peter Nettl has recently discussed the status, of the political "subsystem" within society in terms of two variables: (a) the range of the political subsystem, which refers to the area of goals drawn into the process of collective goal-attainment; and (b) the salience of the political subsys-

[&]quot;acceptance" (p. 968). The distinction between rewards and facilities is parallel to that between consummatory and instrumental action.

The use of the proposed operational concept of salience in empirical research may suggest the need for modifications or additional refinements of the concept. There is little doubt, however, that empirical political theory retem, which is its weight relative to other subsystems, i.e., the relative priority assigned to politics. The historical examples of shifts in range and salience cited by this author (Guizot's "enrichissez-vous!," the shift towards the welfare-state in the last fifty years, the depoliticization in Sweden, America and other countries, and Nkrumah's "Seek ye first the Kingdom of Politics") point towards a macro-political concept of salience similar to that presented in this paper, particularly with reference to the problems of develquires operational concepts capable of comparing the "functional quality" of politics in different cultures and subcultures and of measuring the politicization of social life.

opment or change. See Peter Nettl, Political Mobilization (London: Faber and Faber Ltd., 1967), pp. 56-102. Although it is possible to distinguish analytically between "range" and "weight," it seems that the priorities implied in the concept of "weight" are a function of the specific range of goals sought through political action and of the priorities assigned to these goals.

⁴¹ This term has been proposed in Heinz Eulau and David Koff, "Occupational Mobility and Political Career," Western Political Quarterly, 11 (1962), p. 508.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT AND SOCIOECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT: THE CASE OF LATIN AMERICA*

MARTIN C. NEEDLER University of New Mexico

One way of acquiring insight into the processes of political development in Latin America is to compare the countries of the area systematically in terms of the "degree of development" which each can be said to have attained. Ideally, such an enterprise can lead to the understanding of the past history of the "more developed" countries by reference to the present problems of the "less developed" while an understanding of the problems confronting the more developed countries can make possible a glimpse into the future of those now less developed. Isolation of the factors responsible for a state's being more or less developed can moreover prove instructive for the understanding of the relations between political and socioeconomic phenomena.

Perhaps most important, such comparisons provide the means for holding constant effects attributable to characteristics shared by all, or nearly all, of the Latin American countries. Thus it can be argued with much plausibility that military intervention in politics, say, derives from elements in the Hispanic tradition. Yet it is clear that the frequency of military intervention varies from country to country, even where they share equally in that tradidition. Thus one is forced to go beyond the "Hispanic tradition" thesis with which the investigation might otherwise have come to rest.

In the present article I will be concerned with the problem of the relation of political development to socio-economic development in the Latin American context. For reasons that will become apparent below, I will not at this point attempt a rigorous analysis of the concept of political development, which has already been the subject of a large and rapidly growing literature.

* The author wishes to thank the Harvard Center for International Affairs and the University of Michigan Faculty Research Fellowship Committee for providing him with the necessary time free of other duties. He also wishes to thank Walter C. Soderlund, a doctoral candidate at the University of Michigan, whose research is reflected in the data on constitutional stability, and Richard Loebl of Harvard College, who performed the statistical calculations.

I. MEASURING POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The most common assumption about the relation of political development-typically understood as "stable democracy"-and socioeconomic development is that the two are positively correlated. The most notable early attempts to demonstrate this relation were those of Seymour Martin Lipset and Gabriel Almond and James S. Coleman: Lipset showed that in indices of wealth, the countries of Latin America he classified as "democracies and unstable dictatorships" ranked higher on the whole than those he called "stable dictatorships;" Almond and Coleman demonstrated a similar correlation between indices of wealth and the degree of "competitiveness" of the countries of the area.2 Unfortunately, in both cases the assignment of countries to the different political categories was quite subjective, and borderline cases appear to have been handled so as to strengthen the perceived relationship, which thus becomes questionable.

Russell Fitzgibbon has attempted to eliminate at least individual subjectivity in his periodic pollings of his colleagues on their judgment of how democratic the countries of Latin America are in relation to each other.3 A great many difficulties of definition and weighting limit the value of the Fitzgibbon rankings, however. For our present purpose they cannot be used in any case since Professor Fitzgibbon defines democracy so as to include several social and economic variables; his rankings, accordingly, do not represent a purely political dimension and cannot be used as a basis of comparison with rankings on an independent socioeconomic dimension.4 This same criticism vitiates the otherwise well-conceived attempt in this direction by Charles Wolf, Jr. The prob-

- ¹ Political Man: The Social Basis of Politics (New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1963), pp. 27-63.
- ² Gabriel Almond and James S. Coleman, The Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1960), p. 541.
- ³ See Russell H. Fitzgibbon and Kenneth F. Johnson, "Measurement of Latin American Political Change," this REVIEW, 55 (September, 1961), 515-526.
 - ⁴ As Lipset points out, op. cit., p. 31n.
 - ⁵ "The Political Effects of Economic Programs:

lem thus remains one of finding a "hard" measure of political development to match against measurements of social and economic development.

Several scholars have attempted to develop such indices, but all too often have failed to ensure that the data used, especially given Latin American circumstances, actually relate to the dimension in question; alternatively, they have tried to combine several sets of data into composite indices but have assigned relative weight to the different sets arbitrarily.

Some Indications from Latin America," Economic Development and Cultural Change, (October, 1965).

⁶ A good example of the distortions introduced by these two failings is provided in the otherwise interesting and provocative article by Phillips Cutright, "National Political Development: Its Measurement and Social Correlates," American Sociological Review (April, 1963), reprinted in Nelson W. Polsby, Robert A. Dentler, and Paul A. Smith (eds.), Politics and Social Life: An Introduction to Political Behavior (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1963). Cutright constructed an index of political development, understood in a democratic sense, based on such acknowledged criteria of democracy as freedom of elections and respect for their results, and the existence and size of opposition representation in the legislature. The index was formed by assigning to each country one point for every year in which it was ruled by a chief executive chosen in free elections, one point for every year in which more than one party was represented in the legislature, and one point for every year a minority party held more than thirty per cent of the legislative seats. This represents a substantial contribution in several respects. Using number of years as a criterion creates the possibility of plotting positions along a dimension which has a more than purely notional meaning. Moreover, assigning one point for each year in which a chief executive chosen in free elections actually remained in office reflects not only the number of free elections that were held, a la Lipset, but also the degree of respect for their results which existed; this is an important variable in the Latin American context. However, taking the existence of a legislative opposition into account in constructing the index drastically distorts the results obtained. This is so, among other reasons, because of the common practice in Latin America of providing for the mandatory representation of opposition parties in the legislature. During the period since the end of World War I used by Cutright, at least six Latin American countries operated under constitutional or legal provisions earThe present writer has attempted to avoid at least the grossest errors of this type by mea-marking legislative seats for an opposition party. The irony of the situation, and the reason why use of this criterion distorts Cutright's index so greatly, is that the provision for guaranteed opposition representation is particularly favored by the dictatorships, since it serves to take in foreign democrats with the illusion of a tolerated opposition. The opposition members, however, even holding the up to thirty-three per cent of the legislative seats legally guaranteed them, are of course powerless to oppose legislation passed by a disciplined majority loyal to the president. It is generally recognized, accordingly, that provisions for guaranteed legislative seats for the opposition frequently met with in the more dictatorial countries constitute no more than democratic window-dressing, and legitimate democratic opposition parties normally boycott elections that they feel will be conducted so as to favor the president's party. At the same time, however, there is never a lack of opportunists, sometimes renegades from the democratic opposition, who will organize a spurious opposition party to contest the elections in order to enjoy the privileges and emoluments of the opposition legislative seats, which are really sinecures.

The distortion introduced by considering the existence of a formal legislative opposition as a factor in determining a country's political development can clearly be seen in the case of Nicaragua. During most of the period covered by Cutright's article, Nicaragua was a notorious dictatorship under the Somoza family, easily one of the two or three most stable dictatorships in Latin America. And yet on Cutright's scale of political development, which embraces all the independent countries in the world, Nicaragua scores the same number of points as the Netherlands, substantially more than Israel or Austria, and enjoys the fifth highest place among the Latin American countries.

Deane Neubauer has recently devoted an article to a critique of Cutright, along rather similar lines. "Some Conditions of Democracy," this Review, 61 (December, 1967), 1002–1009. Unfortunately, he then goes on to construct his own index, which is liable to some of the criticisms applied to Cutright. Neubauer implicitly acknowledges this, explaining that he constructed his index "in a manner analogous to that used by Cutright... to enhance overall comparability between the two studies...," op. cit., p. 1006, footnote 8. This means that the value of Neubauer's index is limited to its use in criticizing Cutright. It cannot validly be used to draw con-suring political development by means of a radically simplified non-composite index, based on the number of years during a given period in which a country has been ruled constitutionally.

A "constitutional" year has been defined operationally as one in at least six months of which the country was ruled by a government chosen in (more or less) free elections, and in which that government on the whole respected constitutional procedures and individual civil liberties, and in which no extra-constitutional changes of government took place. This captures the two aspects of a government's democratic legitimacy, its origin and its performance. It should be noted that this index is designed to discriminate among the Latin American countries, for which it provides an appropriate degree of "spread." It would probably not be usable in the same form in other contexts.

Table 1 gives, in Column I, the number of years over the period from 1935 to 1964 inclusive (approximately the length of time in which democratic practices have begun to take hold widely in Latin America) which qualified as "constitutional and democratic" on the basis of the criteria stipulated above. Clearly, coding problems arise here, and there are a great many borderline cases. To take this into account, Column II gives the number of years not spent under governments which were unequivocally dictatorial; that is, it includes, in addition to the years totalled in Column I, years spent under provisional governments and under other governments not democratically elected which nevertheless ruled constitutionally. Column I thus reflects exacting, Column II permissive, criteria of constitutionality. Column III gives the means between the two sets of figures, thus providing a rather rough index of constitutionality, but one which is probably as authentic as any that can be devised. The rank ordering in Column IV is based on the mean figures of Column III.

If we return to the question of the correlation of degree of stable democracy with level of economic wellbeing, now on the basis of rather "harder" data, some relation, but a rather weak one, is found to exist. The coefficient of correlation between the constitutionality index figures of Column III and life expectancy at birth (which, following Russett,⁷ table 1. Years of constitutional government, 1935-1964*

	I	II	III	IV
	Strictly defined	Loosely defined	Mean of I and II	Rank order based on III
Chile	30	30	30	1
Uruguay	27	27	27	2
Costa Rica	24	30	27	2
Mexico	24	30	27	2
Panama	20	29	24.5	5
Colombia	20	22	21	6
Brazil	16	19	17.5	7
Ecuador	13	22	17.5	7
Bolivia	11	18	14.5	9
Peru	9	18	13.5	10
Guatemala	10	14	12	11
Cuba	8	15	11.5	12
Honduras	5	14	9.5	13
Argentina	4	13	8.5	14
Venezuela	6	9	7.5	15
El Salvador	0	13	6.5	16
Nicaragua	1	9	5	17
Paraguay	1	4	2.5	18
Dominican
Republic	0	4	2	19
Haiti	0	1	.5	20

^{*} The data were compiled, from a variety of sources, by Walter C. Soderlund, and classified by Mr. Soderlund and the author.

can be regarded as a "naturally composite" index of socioeconomic wellbeing) is .37.

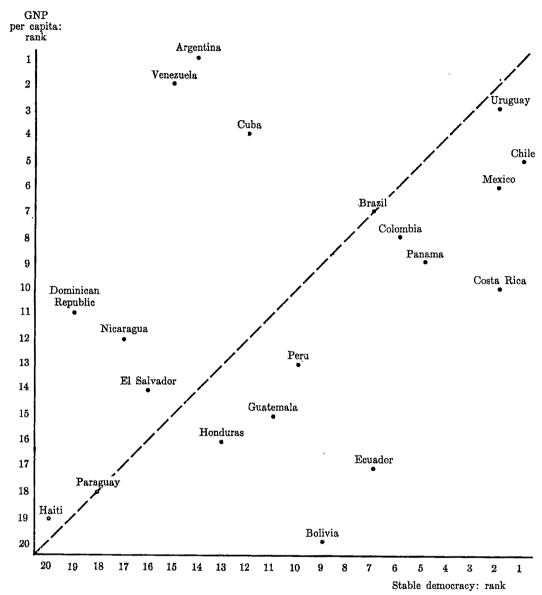

Figure 1, which is a "scattergram" plotting rank order on the constitutionality index against that on GNP per capita, indicates these relations graphically. The hypothesis that political development correlates with economic development can be regarded as being weakly confirmed, in the sense that the top right and bottom left quadrants are fuller than those at top left and bottom right. Deviations from the center line appear greater than would be expected in terms of the Lipset or Almond and Coleman theses, however. If one thinks in terms of an undifferentiated process of socioclusions about the process of political development, which Neubauer then attempts to do.

⁸ Using figures from P. N. Rosenstein-Rodan, "International Aid for Underdeveloped Countries," The Review of Economics and Statistics (May, 1961). Figures are estimates for 1961 in real terms. Slight changes in rank-orderings, but not differing consistently in any one direction, are obtained by using other sets of GNP figures or other economic development indices.

⁷ Bruce M. Russett, et al., World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964), pp. 320-321.

Fig. 1. Wealth and stable democracy

Note: Broken line indicates positions that would be occupied if the two characteristics were perfectly correlated. See text for sources of rankings.

economic development, or "social mobilization," of which GNP per capita is simply one indicator, then clearly social mobilization stands in some causal relation to political development defined as the attainment of stable constitutional functioning, but is modified by, or mediated through, other social-system characteristics which make its effects not wholly determining.

⁹ See Karl W. Deutsch, "Social Mobilization and Political Development," this Review, 55 (September, 1961), 493-514.

II. THE PARTICIPATION DIMENSION

But this result was only to be expected; the attainment of stable constitutional functioning is, after all, only one dimension in which political development takes place. To specify adequately the concept of political development for our era, one has surely also to stipulate another dimension, which is that of the extent of participation in the polity on terms of equality. 10 Otherwise one would run the risk of accepting as authentic a constitutional facade masking an undemocratic reality. Many commentators have fallen into this trap, which Latin American circumstances bait rather well.

That is, the attainment of constitutional stability can be regarded as only one aspect of political development, the other being extent of participation on terms of equality. If one wishes, accordingly, to perform a more adequate test of the proposition that stable democracy is correlated with wealth—or, in more general terms, that political development in a democratic era accompanies economic development—it is necessary to take into account not only the formal following of constitutional procedures, but also a measure of participation that can reflect the substantive as well as the purely formal nature of a country's pretensions to democracy.

If political development has two aspects, one the maintenance of constitutional integrity, the other the extent of participation, then a country's degree of political development could in principle be represented by a single score which combined its separate scores on constitutionality and on participation. The political development score would then be a middle term between the scores on constitutionality and on participation.

Now if political development and economic development are closely correlated, then a country's economic development score should, likewise, represent a mean between its constitutionality and its participation scores. This proposition may be subjected to a rough test. As a rather crude index of political participation, we use the percentage of the population voting in general elections around 1960, using figures referring to relatively fair elections where available. These electoral participation figures are of course not wholly satisfactory for several reasons. Apart from the point that electoral participation is after all only approximately related to political participation in general, it is clear that electoral participation may be affected by transitory circumstances peculiar only to the election in question and not reflecting long-term regularities. It is also true that the freest elections for which figures

¹⁰ This appears to be essentially the same dimension referred to by Frederick Frey as the "distribution and reciprocity of power." "Political Development, Power, and Communications in Turkey," in Lucian W. Pye (ed.), Communications and Political Development (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1963), p. 301

TABLE 2. COMPARISON OF RANK ORDERINGS ON CONSTITUTIONALITY, ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, AND PARTICIPATION

	Constitu- tionality	Life Ex- pectancy	Electoral Participa- tion
Argentina	14	2	1
Bolivia	9	20	8
Brazil	7	8	14
Chile	1	7	15
Colombia	6	13	17
Costa Rica	2	3	6
Cuba	12	3	10
Dominican
Republic	19	16	4
Ecuador	7	17	18
El Salvador	16	14	16
Guatemala	11	18	19
Haiti	20	19	7
Honduras	13	15	13
Mexico	2	10	11
Nicaragua	17	11	5
Panama	5	5	11
Paraguay	18	8	10
Peru	10	12	20
Uruguay	2	1	3
Venezuela	15	6	2

Sources: Constitutionality index, see Table I; life expectancy, Russett, op. cit., pp. 197-198; electoral participation, Yvan Labelle and Adriana Estrada, Latin America in Maps, Charts, Tables, CIF Study 1 (Cuernavaca: Center of Inter-Cultural Formation, 1963), except for figures on Cuba, Nicaragua, Paraguay, and the Dominican Republic, which are calculated by the author from population figures given by Russett, op. cit., p. 18-20, and election results given in the Hispanic American Report for February 1963 (Dominican Republic) and April 1963 (Nicaragua and Paraguay). The figure for Cuba is from the Statistical Abstract for Latin America, 1956 (University of California Press: Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1957).

are available were sometimes not very free. The figure for Cuba is especially unsatisfactory on this score; Cuba has not had a free election for over twenty years, and a good case could be made for leaving Cuba out of the reckoning entirely; but instead the figure for the less-than-free presidential election of 1954 has been used.

If the hypothesis we are testing is correct, then the indicator of economic development (again, life expectancy) should appear as a mean term between the constitutionality indicator and the participation indicator. If the hypothesis is incorrect, then the economic development indicator should appear as a mean term in slightly less than one-third of the cases, that is, about six times out of twenty. Table 2 gives the rank orders for the twenty Latin American countries with respect to the three indicators.

As can be seen from the table, the hypothesis is confirmed in 13 of the 20 cases, or about twice the frequency that one could expect if the relationship hypothesized did not hold.¹¹

¹¹ It is worthy of note that of the seven cases in which the economic development index, that is, the rank ordering on life expectancy, falls outside the range between the constitutionality and the participation rank orderings in Table 2, only one of these cases, that of Bolivia, seems to constitute a genuine exception to the hypothesis posited. The seven cases will be examined in turn.

One of them is, of course, Cuba, where the rank orderings on constitutionality, economic development, and participation respectively are 12-3-10. Here the participation ranking is much lower than the hypothesis would predict; however, this is only to be expected, since the ranking given, in the absence of a free election having been held, is that of the most recent election, that of 1954, which was notoriously rigged and the outcome (that of the "election" of the incumbent Batista) was known beforehand. If Fidel Castro were overthrown tomorrow and free elections held, I would anticipate a high turnout figure comparable to those shown in Venezuela or the Dominican Republic.

In the case of Paraguay, where the rank orderings run 18-8-10, it is clearly the middle figure, that for life expectancy, which must be suspect. Paraguayan statistics may be the worst in Latin America, but in any case if Paraguay is indeed eighth in life expectancy among the Latin American countries, that is the only social or economic indicator on which it reaches eighth place; on other economic indicators, Paraguay ranges between 12th and 18th place.

In four of the remaining five cases the economic development indicator falls only slightly outside of the predicted range: on Panama the rank orderings are 5-5-11; on Honduras 13-15-13; on El Salvador 16-14-16; and on Uruguay 2-1-3.

Only the case of Bolivia, with rank orderings of 9-20-8, constitutes an unequivocal exception to the hypothesis postulated. The problem can be stated clearly: the participation and constitutionality indices indicate that Bolivia is politically a relatively developed country, yet at the same

In order to make sure that this result was not an accident due to some peculiar property of one of the indices used, I checked the test several times, substituting rank ordering on other indices which also could be regarded as representative of the dimension in question. Thus when the 1960 Fitzgibbon and Johnson rank orderings on constitutional democracy were substituted for my constitutionality index, the relationship hypothesized again held good in thirteen cases. When GNP figures were substituted for life expectancy as an index of economic development, the relationship held in twelve cases.

It proved more difficult to find an index of participation that could be regarded as an alternative to the electoral participation figures used here. An index of equality in income distribution might be used as a rough reflector of the same dimension, but such an index is not available for all the twenty countries or anything close to that. Other sets of figures on electoral participation are available than the one given by Labelle and Estrada on which my rankings are based, but these have been peculiarly susceptible to computation errors and acceptance of propagandistic figures.¹² time it remains economically extremely backward. Clearly Bolivia has been mobilized politically by some means other than economic change. The explanation for this is presumably that in Bolivia the Indians were mobilized, and were given a sense of personal efficacy usually found among occupants of higher-status positions in more developed societies, by having been enlisted into combat during the Chaco War. It is thus likely that 30 years ago, before the Mexican economy had developed to its present point, the rank orderings for Mexico would have shown a similar inconsistency, since the processes of change at work in Mexico resemble those operating more recently in Bolivia.

12 Thus the table given in the Statistical Abstract of Latin America for 1964 (Los Angeles and Berkeley: University of California Press, 1965), on electoral participation is incomplete; I have not checked all of the figures which it gives, and many agree with those given by Labelle and Estrada and used here, but two of them are patently false: the Nicaraguan figure of an electoral participation of 80% of the population is surely extraordinary in that only some 50% of the population are of voting age; and, apparently due to an error in computation, the Chilean turnout was reported as 55%, when the correct figure should have been about one-third of that. Russett's electoral participation table gives turnout as a percentage of voting age population, rather than Strong confirmation of the hypothesis is provided, however, by computation of coefficients of correlation among the three sets of raw scores. The correlation between the economic development indicator (life expectancy) on the one hand, and the political development indicators (the constitutionality index and electoral participation) on the other, is .69, which is significant at the .01 level. If per capita GNP (Russett's figures) is substituted for life expectancy as the indicator of economic level, the correlation actually rises to .72.

The necessity of taking both aspects of political development into account is demonstrated by the smaller size of the correlation of the economic development indicator with the indicators of either aspect of political development alone. The correlation of life expectancy with the constitutionality score is .37, significant at the .1 level, and with the electoral participation figure is .49, significant at the .05 level.

It can be stated with a considerable degree of assurance, therefore, that political development, conceived of as the heightening of both observance of constitutional norms and popular participation in politics, is indeed commensurate with economic development.¹³ This has not appeared clearly from the literature so far because, among other things, authors have relied on conceptions of political development which stress either the constitutional stability factor or the participation factor but not both.

III. RELATIONS BETWEEN STABILITY AND PARTICIPATION

Yet one interesting aspect of the relationships described above is that—for the intermediate stages of political development, at least; that is, before the attainment of completely stable functioning and maximum participation—there is a partially inverse relation between stability and participation.¹⁴ In other the whole population; the raw figures are not given, so the computations cannot be checked, but at least one figure, that given for Paraguay, is patently false, and other computation errors may have crept in, as they have in other of the tables Russett gives.

¹³ This may also be formulated as the principle that political development and economic development are aspects of a single process, the position taken by Hélio Jaguaribe in his Desenvolvimento Econômico e Desenvolvimento Político (Rio de Janeiro: Editôra Fundo de Cultura, 1962).

¹⁴ This conclusion appears to be confirmed by attitude survey data from Chile and Argentina turned up by the project headed by Alex Inkeles words, a country developing economically develops politically, but this heightened level of political development can appear either as a greater fidelity to constitutional norms or as a higher degree of participation in political processes; whether one or the other direction is taken depends in large part (as the author hopes to demonstrate elsewhere) on the degree of egalitarianism in the social structure.

This formulation appears to confirm the scattered impressionistic insights of previous observers; for example, it can be regarded as an alternative formulation of Bagehot's principle, re-emphasized in recent years by Harry Eckstein, that the stability of the British constitutional order has been due to the deference showed by the British lower class to its social superiors. The deference premise is equivalent to saying that constitutional stability increases in proportion to social inequality, or in proportion as possible participants refrain from active political participation.¹⁵

One might also transpose the argument into the following terms: any stable political order needs to embody the principle of authority and, to some extent, that of hierarchy. In a democratic political order, however, these principles necessarily conflict with the principle of equality. As one reaches higher levels of economic and social development, however, the resources are created which enable a society embodying both types of principle to survive—resources, that is, of private satisfactions, of governmental budgetary capability, and of education and political sophistication.

Conclusions of interest can be drawn by contemplating the implications of change in the various components of this set of relationships. If participation is treated as the independent variable, then if participation increases greatly, constitutional integrity will tend to deteriorate unless the country's economy develops at the same time, providing a higher level of welfare to match the higher level of participation.

Chile provides a recent case of the working out of this set of relationships in Latin America. Constitutional stability has always been high—in the Latin American context—except for an interlude during the Depression. Chile's eco-and still in progress at the time of writing: that as the propensity to participate in politics increases, support for the existing political order tends to decrease. See also the very interesting formulation of the problem in Deutsch, op. cit., p. 39.

¹⁵ The conclusion of Claude Ake on this point appears similar. See A Theory of Political Integration (Homewood, Ill.: Dorsey Press, 1967), p. 15.

nomic level has been relatively rather low, however, and, as the theory outlined here would predict, participation has also been extremely low, the turnout of 17.9% of the population in the Presidential election of 1958 representing the high point reached by electoral participation to that time. Politicization advanced. however, as Christian Democrats and the Socialist-Communist alliance, FRAP, competed in organizing the masses, even including the hitherto neglected rural population, and as secrecy of the ballot became guaranteed. Thus electoral participation rose to 26.76% of the population for the 1963 municipal elections and finally to 31.83% for the climactic Presidential election of 1964.16 It was generally thought by observers that this election was crucial for deciding whether Chile's future path would be democratic or not. With the victory of the Christian Democratic candidate, the probability grew that Chile could make the "breakthrough" into a political order that would allow for both constitutional stability and high participation, on the Uruguayan pattern—that is, in which democracy could be strong both formally and substantively.¹⁷ The Christian Democratic government moved in the direction of fulfilling its historical task in this sense by attempting to remove the last barriers to total participation by abolishing the literacy requirement for voting, and organizing peasant unions. At the time of writing the voting reform had not been consummated. although the odds were in its favor. Clearly, however, the new political order could only persist if it were underpinned by the higher level of economic well-being that would be demanded by the newly participant groups, who would be likely otherwise to reject the established system and turn to anti-constitutional alternatives. This was clearly understood by the Christian Democratic administration, whose "Revolution in Liberty" aimed at the maintenance of constitutional norms while reaching new heights not only of participation and equality, but also of production and welfare.

On the other hand, a high order of constitutional integrity can be maintained while economic conditions are deteriorating only by politically restrictive policies which lead to a reduction in participation. This is demonstrated by developments in Colombia under the presidency of Guillermo León Valencia (1962–1966); constitutional stability was guaranteed by the bi-partisan National Front agreement, the economy stagnated, and the already low electoral participation showed a drop. If participation in Colombia increases substantially, therefore, constitutional stability can only be maintained by a resumption of economic growth.

¹⁶ These figures are given on page 2 of The Chilean Presidential Election of September 4, 1964, Part II (Washington: Institute for the Comparative Study of Political Systems, 1965).

17 The author does not mean to imply that "nothing is wrong" in Uruguayan politics. The point is that no extra-constitutional changes in the holders of power have taken place, at the same time as there is mass participation in politics and respect for civil liberties.

Some superficially paradoxical but extremely interesting conclusions for the understanding of dictatorship also follow. A low order of constitutional integrity, that is, a state of anarchy or dictatorship, is compatible with a low order of political participation only where the degree of social and economic development is also low. For higher levels of economic development, however, the imposition of dictatorship should tend to increase participation. This apparent paradox can be understood in the sense that under a dictatorship aspects of life which were formerly not politicized become so, and individuals apathetic towards politics need to start paying attention to political factors.

The politicization of the population of an economically developing country by a dictatorship has effects which surprise outside observers. One of these is the "unexpectedly" high electoral participation in the free elections held after the overthrow of the dictator: the extremely high turnout figures in Venezuela after Pérez Jiménez and in the Dominican Republic after Trujillo are well known. Thus also parties whose success depends on the politicization of marginal members of the society. such as the Communists and other extremist parties, typically do much better after the overthrow of the dictator than they did before his assumption of power. It hardly needs to be mentioned that this point has policy implications for the United States. It should also be pointed out that in a fairly well-developed society the dictatorship itself finds that it has to encourage mass participation in its own subsidiary organs in order to maintain itself in power.18

We are now in a position to see what was wrong with the standard formulations, of which Lipset's is the best known, which correlate "stable democracy" and "wealth." Stable democracy, or "political development," is usually defined solely in terms of the observance of constitutional norms—but this is a purely formal criterion which does not take into account the difference between countries where constitutional forms are a façade masking an undemocratic reality and those in which observance of constitutional forms is accompanied by general political participation and a democratic spirit.

¹⁸ This point is discussed in my Latin American Politics in Perspective (Princeton: Van Nostrand, 1963), p. 18.

It is understandable that those especially concerned with social justice in Latin America should become impatient with traditional formulations of this type and, conscious of the realities of social inequality that lie behind the constitutional façade, become cynical about constitutional forms and espouse revolutionary ideology.

The problem is genuine. At any level of development between those of the completely undeveloped and the completely developed societies19 (the latter represented in Latin America, if at all, only by Uruguay) there is an inverse relationship between mass participation and constitutional stability. One is thus presented with a dialectical tension: if mass participation rises faster than the level of economic development, then constitutional functioning breaks down, usually with the imposition of a military regime, as conservative forces in the society react against the attempts of constitutional governments to gratify desires of the newly participant masses through drastic social change.20

It is thus possible to explain on the basis of the foregoing principles some of the major apparent failures of the hypothesis that stable democracy and wealth are correlated. Three of the wealthiest countries in Latin America by ¹⁹ In other words, one should not expect that the relationships discussed here will be of help in comparing countries like Britain and the United States, for example, in which mass participation and constitutional stability can be taken for granted.

²⁰ This was demonstrated empirically in my article "Political Development and Military Intervention in Latin America," this Review, 60 (September, 1966), 616-626.

GNP per capita figures-Argentina, Cuba, and Venezuela—have at the same time extremely poor records of constitutional integrity (these are the countries in the top left quadrant of Figure 1). This, however, is not surprising in view of the formulation developed here that for any intermediate level of development there is an inverse relation between mass participation and constitutional stability, in that these are three countries with extremely high orders of mass participation. This cannot be shown in terms of electoral participation for Cuba since there have been no free Cuban elections recently, but Argentina and Venezuela rank first and second respectively in electoral turnout, as Table 2 shows. The high order of participation in all three is suggested by the figures on the proportion of the population unionized; in 1955 over 25% of the population was unionized in each of these three countries, while in no other Latin American country for which figures were available was the proportion higher than 10%.21

IV. CONCLUSION

A series of cautionary points should be made. In the first place, the correlations observed should be taken only as more or less approximate pointers to the underlying social processes, not as a complete summary of those processes, which are doubtless too complex to be exhaustively described by a statement about the relationship among three variables. At the same time, there are clearly important aspects of politics altogether outside the processes to which these data relate. Finally, it is altogether likely that the most satisfactory summary of the relations involved would take account not only of states of the key variables at a given moment of time but also of rates of change, "thresholds," and "breakthroughs." Such a more complete formulation ought then to be comprehensive enough to be applicable to Africa and Asia, to Western Europe and North America, and I hope that other scholars will make attempts in this direction.

²¹ Calculated from data given in Harold E. Davis (ed.), Government and Politics in Latin America (New York: Ronald Press, 1958), pp. 68-69.

LOCKE'S STATE OF NATURE: HISTORICAL FACT OR MORAL FICTION?

RICHARD ASHCRAFT

University of California, Los Angeles

For nearly two centuries, the mere mention of the "state of nature" was sufficient to provoke a controversy. Did the writer intend an historical reference or was he employing a fictional concept as a means of presenting an a priori ethical argument? The question, at least in so far as it applies to John Locke, has never been satisfactorily answered—although it has frequently been brushed aside as unimportant. Yet, many of the "contradictions" which seem to characterize Locke's political thought might be resolved if only we could be certain of the meaning he attributed to the state of nature.

Lacking that certainty, we are left to choose from among the various meanings others have associated with Locke's use of the concept. First, it is charged that, if Locke did intend his portrait of the state of nature to serve as an historical account of the origins of government. it is bad history. Most political societies did not begin as Locke suggests. As one writer puts it, "history and sociology lend but little support to this theory of free men entering into a compact and so creating a political group."1 Secondly, if the state of nature is but a fiction abstracted from history, that in itself may be grounds for rejecting its usefulness as a concept. Marx, for example, is critical of the 'state of nature' approach to politics because it assumes in an abstract fashion precisely what must be proven by reference to concrete historical facts.2 Thirdly, in addition to these general methodological objections raised against the state of nature concept, there are special defects charged to Locke's use of that concept. Assuming that Locke means to present us with a logical construct, what initially appears to be the peaceful, idyllic natural condition of man is quickly transformed into a hostile, war-like state as the argument proceeds in the Second Treatise. Thus, in supplying two different descriptions of the state of nature, Locke is censured for involving himself in a logical contradiction which renders useless the key to understanding the framework of his political thought. Alternatively, supposing the Lockean state of nature to be a description of the historical existence of men, it is difficult to see how their actions in that state can be meaningfully related to the Law of Nature, as Locke contends, since a rational understanding of the precepts of natural law is not likely to be the possession of individuals living in a rude and primitive state. Without such an understanding, what reasons have we for imagining that their relations with each other are not as Hobbes describes them? In short, we are led to believe that Locke is either a superficial, inconsistent thinker or a recondite Hobbesian.³

According to the critics, therefore, (1) Locke is a poor historian and sociologist: (2) Locke is neither an historian nor a sociologist, though he should be: (3) Locke is an illogical and contradictory theorist; and (4) Locke is a deceptive thinker concealing his true moral beliefs behind the facade of history. Before defending Locke against these criticisms, let me state positively the thesis of this essay. It is that Locke regards the state of nature as both an historical and a moral description of human existence. Obviously, this proposition will prove a helpful tool of analysis only if we are able to demonstrate when, in a specific instance, Locke is refering to one or the other condition. In order to make that determination, it is necessary to understand some of the reasons for the two-sided nature of this Lockean concept.

Politics—and hence, a political theory—is for Locke comprised of two parts, "very different the one from the other." The primary objective of a political theory is to explain the origin of political society, "and the rise and extent of political power." That is, the "foundation" of politics is laid in an "inquiry into the ground and nature of civil society, and how it is formed into different models of government." In considering these matters, which constitute "a part of moral philosophy," one's aim is to discover "the natural rights of men, the origins and foundations of society, and the

¹ Richard Aaron, John Locke (Oxford, 1955), p. 273.

² Karl Marx, The German Ideology (International Publishers, 1960), p. 17.

³ Leo Strauss, Natural Right and History (Chicago, 1952), pp. 203-214.

⁴ The Works of John Locke (12th edition, London, 1824), vol. II, p. 408. (Hereafter cited as Works.)

duties resulting from thence." The second ingredient of politics is prudence, by which Locke usually means the art of governing men within an already established political society.

It is worth noting that Locke clearly commits himself to the genetic approach to politics. A political theory is a theory of origins. Now, an historical account of the beginnings of government is one possible genetic explanation. However, this approach can be rejected for purely technical reasons since, Locke observes. "government is everywhere antecedent to records." Moreover, history records that governments have diverse origins, and so provides us with no unequivocal guidance for assessing the 'lawfulness' of political power.8 Even if this were not the case. Locke is prepared to argue that history is not merely an inadequate but also an improper source for supplying the foundations of a political theory. Historical precedents are not "sufficient to establish a rule." For, "at best, an argument from what has been to what should of right be

⁵ Thoughts on Education (Works, vol. VIII), sec. 186; Locke to Reverend King, August 25, 1703, Works, Vol. IX, pp. 305-306; Locke to Cary Mordaunt, 1697, MS c. 24, ff. 196-197. (Manuscript references are cited according to their shelf mark in the Bodleian Library, Oxford University, where they are housed.)

⁶ The Second Treatise is described on the title page as "An Essay Concerning the True Original, Extent, and End of Civil Government." In the First Treatise, Locke writes: "We must know how the first ruler, from whom any one claims, came by his authority, upon what ground any one has empire, what his title is to it, before we can know who has a right to succeed him in it..." par. 94. cf. par. 83. Two Treatises of Government (ed)., Peter Laslett (second edition, Cambridge, 1967). (Spelling and punctuation have been modernized.)

7 Second Treatise, par. 101.

8 The first argument does not quite apply to Filmer, however, since he does attempt to support his position with citations from an historical record that antedates government, i.e., the Bible. Locke himself refers to Filmer's "History out of Scripture on which he pretends wholly to build his government." First Treatise, par. 128; cf. par. 154. The statement does make sense, though, assuming, as Locke did, that this so-called historical argument had been refuted in the First Treatise and that once divine history was discounted, no reference to human history could possibly take its place. The second argument is used against Filmer by showing that even Scripture records that men lived under different forms of government.

has no great force." It is true that history is the chief source of man's prudential information, but this information is secondary and supplemental to a clear understanding of true moral principles. The "great question" of government, as it is phrased by Locke, is not "whether there be power in the world, nor whence it came, but who should have it." Consequently, the study of history is useful only "to one who hath well settled in his mind the principles of morality and knows how to make a judgment on the actions of men." Or, conversely, the "doubts" arising from a study of ⁹ First Treatise, pars. 58, 59; Second Treatise, par. 103. The point is also stated in an unpublished manuscript: "For that which was very fit and reasonable to be done at one time may be very unfit and unreasonable at another." MS c. 34, f. 89.

10 In matters of prudence, "a man is principally helped" by "the history of matter of fact." Journal, June 26, 1681, MS f.5. From history "one may learn great and useful instructions of prudence." Ibid, April 6-10, 1677, MS f.2. In fact, "history teaches this (prudence) best, next to experience." Locke to Reverend King, August 25, 1703, Works, vol. IX, pp. 305-306; cf. Essay Concerning Human Understanding (ed.) Alexander Fraser (Dover, 1959), Bk. 4, ch. 16, #11. (Hereafter cited by Book, chapter, and article numbers.) The study of history, however, is only instrumentally important to an understanding of morality. Locke writes: "I do not deny but history is very useful and very instructive of human life, but if it be studied only for the reputation of being an historian, it is a very empty thing." Journal, March 29, 1677, MS f.2. Thus, while the "great end" of history "is to give an account of the actions of men as embodied in society . . . with the reading of history, I think the study of morality should be joined. I mean not the ethics of the Schools . . . but such as . . . above all the New Testament teaches, wherein a man may learn how to live, which is the business of ethics." Locke to Cary Mordaunt, 1697, MS c.24, ff. 196-7; cf. note 12 below.

in First Treatise, par. 106 (italies added); cf. par. 122. In light of this, the question of origins should be rephrased. The purpose of political theory is not really to provide a narrative account of the origins of government, but rather, to relate the proper origins of government. Obviously, Filmer's Patriarcha did offer a genetic explanation of political society; in that sense it was a political theory. But Locke refutes it because it is a "false" political theory. And, being false, it is more like a "fiction" than a political theory. First Treatise, pars. 34, 147. See notes 74 and 105 below.

12 Journal, April 6-10, 1677, MS f.2.

history can be resolved only through a reference to "the Law of Nature, or the revealed Law of God." ¹³

A proper political theory, then, should present a moral position relatable to the record of human history without blurring the distinction between the two "very different" kinds of statements incorporated into the general argument. I suggest that Locke's political thought, as it is expressed in the Two Treatises on Government, attempts precisely this, and that, in light of what Locke conceives a political theory to be, the traditional interpretations of Locke's particular substantive recommendations are either erroneous or seriously inadequate accounts of his political theory. I am also hopeful that an exploration of the manner in which Locke is able to bring together the two components of politics, the moral and the prudential, will provide some illumination for the student interested in the techniques and the pitfalls of constructing a theory of political action.

If, as Locke did, one regards the Bible as an historical document, the First Treatise represents an effort by Locke to meet Filmer on his own ground, and to refute the latter's principles using the very historical record offered in support of them. Yet, having shown that history will not support "the false principles and foundation of Sir Robert Filmer," Locke immediately shifts the ground of his argument. He does not attempt, as he might have, to provide another historical description of the origins of government to stand alongside Filmer's account. Rather, he offers a definition of political power, and asserts that "to understand political power right, and derive it from its original," one must consider what is meant by the state of nature. Only after one has clearly in his mind the meaning of this moral 'fiction' is he free to consult history for supporting evidence. ¹⁴ Locke, therefore, begins the Second Treatise with a legal-moral definition of the state of nature. ¹⁵

13 First Treatise, par. 124; cf. par. 153. Hence, the telling argument against Filmer's theory is that for all of its reliance upon "Scripture history," it cannot "be accommodated to the nature of things" nor can it "be made to agree with that constitution and order which God had settled in the world." Ibid, par. 137. And, in the opening sentences of the Second Treatise, Locke repeats the point, "it having been shown in the foregoing discourse" that "there being no Law of Nature nor positive Law of God" to support Filmer's arguments, we "must of necessity find out another use of government, another original of political power," e.g., one which does conform to the Law of Nature. Second Treatise, par. 1; cf. par. 143.

I. THE MORAL STATE OF MAN

What is that "state all men are naturally in?" Until recently, it was assumed that Lockean man resided in a tranquil community of friends, living together under the "law of reason." According to this view, Locke's description of the state of nature is appealing, but one can discover no satisfactory reason for man's abandonment of that state for political society.16

14 To avoid any confusion, I would like to make it clear that I accept Laslett's evidence that the Second Treatise was written, or at least begun, before the First Treatise. Cf. Laslett, op. cit., Introduction, pp. 45–66. Indeed, given Locke's belief that one's moral principles should be "well settled" in his mind prior to consulting history, we should expect this to be the case. Nevertheless, the sequential remarks in the text above are appropriate, refering to the order of the two treatises as the work was published.

In a way, the use of the term 'fiction' here and in the title of this article is somewhat misleading, since it would not have been acceptable to Locke. For him, a 'fiction' was a creation of one's "fancy," a poetic construction bearing no relationship to reality. For that reason, he was prepared to label it "false." First Treatise, par. 147. Filmer maintained that any theory which presupposed a state of nature was just such a "fiction." Ibid, par. 34. Locke, of course, did not agree. Or, to put it another way, Locke believed it possible to use the state of nature as a 'truth-concept,' not only because it referred to actual human history, but also because, properly stated, it set forth the logical and moral conditions of human existence. And, because it described the "nature of things," it was true. Having said this for Locke's benefit, I retain the word 'fiction,' to be understood as most contemporary readers would understand it: namely, as a logical construct independent of but relatable to a body of factual information. In this sense, it is very close to Locke's own understanding of the 'state of nature.'

15 "since a definition is the only way whereby the precise meaning of moral words can be known." Bk. 3, ch. 11, #17.

¹⁶ William A. Dunning, A History of Political Theories (New York, 1921), p. 345; Alfred Cobban, In Search of Humanity (New York, 1960), p. 93; Basil Wiley, The Seventeenth Century Background (New York, 1955), p. 265; Richard Goldwin, "Locke," in Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey

An alternative interpretation, responding to this point, suggests that while Locke does begin with a description of a peaceful state of nature, his argument in the Second Treatise gradually moves away from that description and toward a replica of the Hobbesian state of war. Since political society actually emerges from the latter state, reasons for its origins are plentiful and clear. But this answer begets another question: why did Locke begin his work with an account of man's natural state which he rejected but a few pages later? The answer is a paradox advanced with firm conviction. Once the shadow of doubt has been cast upon Locke's character and his essential honesty, all other doubts resolve themselves. All queries and contradictions may be put to rest, we are assured, by reading the Two Treatises on Government as a superb exercise in deception. Locke is really Hobbes in disguise.17

A variation of this theory is advanced by Sheldon Wolin, who does not, however, subscribe to the notion that Locke's real intentions and beliefs are purposely masked from the reader. Rather, he maintains that after positing a peaceful state of nature, Locke places man in a "fallen state of nature." Political society arises out of the latter, and represents, in intent at least, a restoration of the ideal state of nature.¹⁸

Now, all three theories share the assumption that Locke begins the Second Treatise with an idealistic portrayal of the natural condition of man. However, a careful examination of Locke's words will not support this assumption. More important, a denial of this commonly-held belief will lead us to the formulation of another interpretation of the Lockean state of nature. We will begin by delineating and considering in order the three possible states of nature, i.e., as seen from the legal, moral, and historical perspectives.

What "puts men out of a state of nature," Locke explains, is their agreement to establish "a judge on earth, with authority to determine all the controversies" between them. Locke adds a further qualification, that for the maintenance of a legal order, the judge must be "indifferent" and he must execute the law "impartially." Whenever these conditions are not met, men exist in a state of nature. But while the legal statement of the state of nature may be viewed as independent of the other two definitions—for important reasons to be mentioned later—it should be noted that Locke frequently merges 'legal' with 'moral.' This is hardly surprising, since he grants the status of law to his standard of morality, the will of God. Special care, therefore, must be taken to distinguish between these two uses of a term so crucial to Locke's argument. As a negative example of the importance of noting this distinction, we may cite Richard Cox's treatment of Locke.

In his portrayal of Locke as a Hobbesian. Cox equates the former's legalistic characterization of the state of nature as a state of "anarchy," with the latter's description of the "nasty" and "brutish" struggle among men. Cox does this by insisting that Locke means by anarchy not merely "the absence of government in a formal or technical sense, but literally a condition of chaos, enmity, confusion, misery, and destruction."20 When the passages in the Second Treatise cited to support this assertion are consulted, it will be discovered that only "confusion" actually appears in the text.21 The other terms are Cox's. The reader will easily perceive the difference in meaning when words like "misery, enmity, and destruction" are omitted from the argument. Those are precisely the words which do characterize Hobbes' state of nature.22 It is not surprising, therefore, that they are offered to us by Cox, and not by Locke.

All that Locke says concerning anarchy is that it is "to have no form of government at all." It is a state "where laws cannot be executed," and where, as a consequence, there is no government. "Instead of government and ⁽eds.), History of Political Philosophy (Chicago, 1963).

¹⁷ Richard Cox, Locke on War and Peace (Oxford, 1960); Leo Strauss, op. cit., p. 224; William T. Bluhm, Theories of the Political System (Englewood Cliffs, 1965), pp. 303ff.; Richard Goldwin, in Strauss and Cropsey, op. cit., pp. 435ff.

¹⁸ Sheldon Wolin, Politics and Vision, (Boston, 1960), p. 307.

¹⁹ Second Treatise, pars. 89 (italics added), 125, 131; First Letter on Toleration (Works, vol. V), p. 10.

²⁰ Cox, op. cit., pp. 75-76.

²¹ The citations by Cox from the Second Treatise are pars. 94, 198, 203, 219, 225.

²² Because of the "general inclination of all mankind, a perpetual and restless desire of power after power that ceases only in death," men, according to Hobbes, are naturally "inclined" to "contention, enmity, and war." Leviathan, Library of Liberal Arts, New York, 1958, Part I, chapters 11, 13, 15; Part II, chapter 17. Locke agrees that "the state of war is a state of enmity and destruction," but he nowhere describes the state of nature in those terms. Second Treatise, par. 16. Also, see note 49 below.

order," there is "anarchy and confusion."²³ This is simply Locke's technical, legal way of defining the state of nature, and nothing more. It does not differ from his initial declaration that where "there is no common superior on earth" to act as judge, men are in a state of nature.

Cox compounds the confusion of his interpretation when, in order to bolster his thesis that the state of nature and the state of war are identical, he asserts that "Locke says that the dissolution of government will always 'bring back again the state of war.'"24 But Locke makes no such statement. What he says is that "those who set up force again in opposition to the laws do rebellare—that is, bring back again the state of war."25 Because Locke means to state this as a special condition attached to the dissolution of government, "always" is the key word missing from Locke's argument, a word conveniently supplied by Cox. The dissolution of government returns men to a state of anarchy in the legalistic sense. Whether or not a state of war then ensues, depends upon whether or not men resort to force. Even the dissolution of society only returns the individual "to the state he was in before, with a liberty to shift for himself and provide for his own safety, as he thinks fit."26 There is no assertion that with the collapse of society itself men are necessarily returned to a state of war. The fact is, for Locke, the natural condition of man is one of uncertain peace.

Cox's objective is to identify Locke with Hobbes, and consequently he ignored the three categorical descriptions of the state of nature. Locke's aim, however, is to demonstrate that although "some men have confounded" the two states, there are important differences between the state of nature and the state of war. These differences relate almost entirely to a

²³ Second Treatise, pars. 198, 219, 203. (Where there are multiple references in a note, they will be listed according to the order in which they appear in the text of the article rather than by the chronological numbering of the paragraphs.)

- ²⁴ Cox, op. cit., p. 79.
- 25 Second Treatise, par. 226.
- ²⁶ Ibid, par. 211. The point is that there are circumstances not dependent upon the use of force by some men—which does institute the state of war—whereby men are returned to the state of nature. See Locke's statement that when a government is "dissolved" by a "calamity" men are returned to the state of nature. Ibid, par. 121. This return may also be the result of a neglect of duty or an abdication by the executive. Ibid, par. 219.

single issue, namely, the extent to which men in the state of nature are able to obey the commands of natural law. In other words, if the state of nature is identical to the state of war, it must follow that men in their natural state are necessarily unable to prove themselves obedient to the Law of Nature. That is precisely the point Locke is unwilling to concede.

Without a "law truly governing nature," Locke argues, "there would be no religion, no fellowship among men, no fidelity, and countless other such things." If, instead of a 'law,' men depended upon prudential maxims to direct their social relations, the "common life of man" would be marked by "fraud, violence, hatred, robbery, murder, and such like."27 These transparent paraphrases of the Hobbesian description of the state of nature reveal the extent to which, in Locke's view, Hobbes had denied the natural ability of men to obey the will of God. He knows, of course, that Hobbes speaks of natural laws. But the real question for Locke was, "what does it mean to speak of a 'natural' law when the 'nature' of man makes it impossible for a rule to function as a 'law' until civil society is established?"

What is really at issue is a matter which we cannot enter into here; viz., what kind of being is the Author of the Law of Nature? Since Hobbes denies to man any knowledge of the moral character of the Deity, it suffices for his notion of natural law that we know God to be the possessor of "irresistible power."28 In refusing to accept this position, Locke is drawn into asserting that God is both reasonable and good, and hence men are able to adhere to the precepts of natural law not only as respectors of power but also as moral agents. Locke's account of the state of nature and his differences with Hobbes on this point are thus grounded in the theological conviction that God cannot have issued rules for men to obey and then have created beings who, in their most 27 Essays on the Law of Nature, (ed.) W. Von Leyden (Oxford, 1958), Essay VII, p. 201; Essay I, p. 119; Essay VI, p. 189. To claim absolute liberty, as Locke believed that Hobbesian man did, is to "negate the law of nature." Essay II, p. 123. Locke specifically rejects this claim in Essay VIII, pp. 207, 211, 213. (Hereafter this work will be cited as Essays.) Also, Locke argues, "were there no law (of nature), there would be no moral good or evil, but man would be left to a most entire liberty in all his actions." First Tract on Government in Two Tracts on Government, (ed.) Philip Abrams (Cambridge, 1967), p. 124.

28 Hobbes, Leviathan, Part II, chapter 31.

natural state, are necessarily unable to follow those rules.²⁹ Therefore, it must be possible for men in the state of nature to obey natural law.

Now, it cannot be stressed too much that Locke, in developing this position, does not have to prove that the state of nature is at every moment either peaceful or warlike. All that he feels compelled to demonstrate is that, Hobbes to the contrary notwithstanding, the state of nature need not be warlike, and that, in following the command of natural law which urges us to preserve ourselves and to do "all reasonable things" we can to preserve mankind, we are not automatically brought into conflict with others. Indeed, it is only because some men, in exercising their freedom, "miscite" the law that we are faced with violent conflict. What draws Locke's censure is not so much his disagreement with Hobbes about the actions of specific men as it is his unwillingness to accept the latter's denial of man's free will.30 In the state of nature, a state of freedom, it is possible for men to behave both well and 29 In fact, God "cannot choose what is not good." Bk. 2, ch. 21, #50, 51 (italics given). "Wisdom and goodness must be ingredients of that perfect or super excellent being which we call God." Journal, August 1, 1680, MS f.4 (italics added). Also, see Essays, Essay VI, p. 183ff. Locke recognized, however, that he had not actually resolved the controversy over man's free will versus God's omnipotence. He confesses in a letter to a friend: "I own freely to you the weakness of my understanding—that though it be unquestionable that there is omnipotence and omniscience in God our Maker, yet I cannot make freedom in man consistent with omnipotence or omniscience in God; though I am as fully persuaded of both as of any truths I must freely assent to." Locke to William Molyneaux, January 20, 1693, Some Familiar Letters Between Mr. Locke and Several of his Friends (London, 1708), pp. 26-27. In the First Treatise, Locke argues that God cannot be supposed to have created man and placed him in a natural condition where he would "perish again, presently after a few moments continuance." par. 86. cf. Second Treatise, par. 6.

30 Referring to those who view the universe in mechanistic terms, as Hobbes certainly did, Locke declares that "by denying freedom to mankind, and thereby making men no other than bare machines, they take away not only innate, but all moral rules whatsoever, and leave not a possibility to believe any such, to those who cannot conceive how anything can be capable of a law that is not a free agent." Hence, "morality and mechanism... are not very easy to be reconciled or made consistent." Bk. 1, ch. 2, #14 (italics added).

badly. As a state extended over a period of time, the state of nature will be both tranquil and violent, though at any given moment, and always because of specific social circumstances, it will be either one or the other.

Locke develops this argument in two ways. through the use of definitions by which he sets his position apart from the theories of Filmer and Hobbes, and through the citation of historical examples to support his assertions, again as an implicit refutation of those two theorists. Having attacked throughout the First Treatise Filmer's contention that men are not by nature free, Locke turns in the Second Treatise to a defense of his conception of man's natural freedom. But Hobbes, too, granted men perfect freedom in the state of nature. Locke therefore must advance an argument which refutes Filmer's position without. at the same time, accepting the Hobbesian alternative, if, as we have suggested, he intends to distinguish his viewpoint from that of his two adversaries.31

The "natural liberty of man," according to Locke, "is to be free from any superior power on earth" and "to have only the law of nature for his rule." It is "a liberty to follow my own will in all things where the rule prescribes not." Locke makes it perfectly clear that he is not speaking of "a liberty for every man to do what he lists." Rather, freedom exists only when the individual's actions are "within the allowance of those laws under which he is." The "end of law," Locke maintains, is to "preserve and enlarge freedom." For, "where there is no law, there is no freedom."32 Thus, in Locke's view, no man could be called "free" in the state of nature who was not, on most occasions, an obedient subject of natural law. In other words, Locke defines freedom in such a way as to deny that Hobbesian man is "free."

Men cannot be free in the state of war, Locke argues, because the relations between them are governed by force, not by law. "There are two sorts of contests amongst men, the one managed by law, the other by force." The former men share with God, the latter with the beasts. Hence, in making force his guide, a man declares himself to live "by another rule" at These, of course, were not Locke's only adversaries. From letters to his father and friends, Locke seems very early in life to have staked out a position for himself somewhere between the "glorious Oceana" of Harrington and the "goblins of war and blood" of Hobbes. MS c.24, ff.49, 173-4.

³² Second Treatise, pars. 22, 57.

than the one established by God.33 He becomes "degenerate," and, in fact, shows that he has "quit the principles of human nature." Such an individual must be looked upon as a "noxious creature" or a "wild savage beast," and may be treated accordingly by other men.34 This is precisely the 'brutish' state of Hobbesian man. It is a state of "unrestrained liberty" which Locke explicitly equates with the natural condition of the "brutes," and not with that of man.35 And since he further describes this departure from the human condition as a state of "declared war against all mankind," there can be little doubt that Locke read the Hobbesian state of nature as a description of unrestrained liberty and brute violence, and. consequently, as a "lawless" condition of human existence.36

Perhaps at this point I should introduce the paragraph in the Second Treatise which has been responsible for considerable confusion, and especially for the assumption that Locke initially presents an idyllic portrait of the state of nature. Locke writes:

And here we have the plain difference between the state of nature and the state of war which, however some men have confounded, are as far distant as a state of peace, good-will, mutual assistance, and preservation, and a state of enmity, malice, violence, and mutual destruction are one from another. 37

Most commentators have concentrated upon the comparison contained in the last part of the sentence, but a careful reading indicates that Locke places his emphasis upon the opening part of the statement. Since it is the initial sentence of section nineteen of the Second Treatise, the "here" is obviously intended to link the discussion just concluded in the previous sections with what follows. A knowledge of the context in which the above statement is made is therefore crucial to any interpretation of its meaning.

The sentence cited appears midway in the chapter entitled, "Of the State of War." The general topic discussed in that chapter is the use of force by one man against another, and the conditions under which force may or may not be "lawfully" employed. The point that Locke is trying to make is that while it may be necessary to resort to the use of force in the state of nature, this does not necessarily convert that state into a state of war, because of certain limitations placed upon the use of force by the Law of Nature. Or, to put it another way, he insists that there is a distinction between the lawful and "unlawful" exercise of force even in the state of nature. According to Locke, it is unlawful for one man to employ force as a means of enslaving another, while it is lawful to resist with force such an attempted encroachment upon one's liberty. It is the immediately following sentence which begins. "And here we have the plain difference" between the state of nature and the state of war. If the latter were accepted as a general description of man's natural state, it would mean that every man employed "force without authority," i.e., without a notion of limitations derived from natural law. Whereas, in the former state, force is generally employed only in self-defense.

Admittedly, most men cannot act in selfdefense unless there are some men who use force aggressively. Yet, Locke feels that the distinction he accepts is important because it indicates that most men are willing to keep their actions within the bounds of natural law. There is, he suggests, a "natural community" of men in the state of nature to which a-social individuals, following the "brutes" in relying upon the principle of force to direct their social relations, constitute the exceptions.38 In other words, for Locke, the state of war describes a particular incident between an "aggressor" and an "innocent party" occuring within the context of a relatively peaceful state of nature. Since it is not a generalized condition of man. Locke cannot accept the Hobbesian meaning of the term, viz., "a general war and a perpetual and deadly hatred among men."39

This point is restated in several ways by Locke throughout the chapter on the state of war. In the opening sentence of that chapter the circumstances under which men encounter the use of force are listed. A particular action may be the result of "a passionate and hasty" use of force. Or, force may be the means of expressing a "sedate, settled design upon another man's life." Only in the latter instance can the term "state of war" properly be applied. Why should Locke bother to make this ²³ First Letter on Toleration, p. 45; Second Treatise, par. 8.

³⁴ Second Treatise, pars. 10, 11, 16, 172, 181.

³⁵ Ibid, par. 63.

³⁶ Essays, Essay V, p. 163: Second Treatise, par. 11. For a more extensive discussion of Locke and Hobbes on natural law, see my paper, "Natural Law and Political Obligation," presented to a Conference on the Thought of John Locke, York University, Toronto, December 2-3, 1966.

³⁷ Second Treatise, par. 19 (italics added).

³⁸ Ibid, par. 128.

³⁸ Essays, Essay V, p. 163.

⁴⁰ Second Treatise, par. 16. "Every imprudent action does not make a man culpable in foro con-point? Hobbes, for example, makes no such distinction. Because every action of the individual is traceable to his passions, the Hobbesian state of war is always the expression of a passionate design upon another man's life. Locke rejects this view, contending that while it may be true that men sometimes allow themselves to be guided by their passions, and, as a consequence, resort to force, this in itself is not sufficient to place one man in a state of war with all others. Mistakes in judgment are allowable.41 It is only when the individual "declares himself to live by another rule than that of reason and common equity" that he places himself in a state of war with other men. In consciously employing force against others. he indicates that he has "revolted" from the level of "his own kind to that of beasts by making force, which is theirs, to be his rule of right."42 That is, an individual must adopt, in principle, the rule of force as an alternative to the principles dictated by natural law. Locke maintains that one cannot assume a priori that men are in a state of war with each other, as Hobbes does. Rather, an incident of war is an expressly "declared" action. It must be the result of "a declaration of a design" to commit injury, because men are presumed by Locke not to harbor attitudes of "enmity and destrucscientiae," Locke to Reverend King, August 25, 1703, Works, vol. IX, pp. 305-306.

41 Not surprisingly, Locke's argument regarding revolution, which is a state of war between the ruler and the people, restates the same limitations. Thus, he maintains, "revolutions happen not upon every little mismanagement in public affairs." Mistakes are permitted the ruler, so long as "the main of (his) conduct" is directed toward "nothing but the care of the public." Locke is willing to go even further. "Great mistakes" and "many wrong and inconvenient laws" will be tolerated by the people "without mutiny or murmur." In other words, a state of war must be a "declaration of a design" revealing moral corruption, and not simply human fallibility. Consequently, the "ill designs of the rulers" must be easily visible to members of society. The people must hold "strong suspicions of the evil intentions of their governors," suspicions based upon "manifest evidence" and "the general course and tendency of things." There must be, Locke concludes, "a long train of abuses, prevarications, and artifaces, all tending the same way" as a prelude to a state of war. Second Treatise, pars. 20, 165, 205, 210, 225, 230 (italics added).

42 Ibid. pars. 8, 172, 181. The individual must separate himself from "the ties of the common law of reason." par. 16.

tion" toward each other.43

Moreover, each person must decide, according to his own "conscience," whether "another hath put himself into a state of war" with him, and what course of action he should then take to defend himself. Locke warns that the individual must answer to God for the correctness of this judgment. If every man is naturally in a state of war, what do "conscience" and "judgment" have to do with the matter? Such a stipulation makes sense only if one knows that there is a difference between the "hasty" use of force by an otherwise reasonable man and the "declared" use of force by one who has in some fashion renounced the rules of "common equity."

Since, in Hobbes' view, everyone is engaged in the state of war, there can be no grounds for moral distinctions between individuals existing in that state. Yet, this is obviously not true for Locke. Throughout his chapter on the state of war, he is careful to draw a distinction between the "aggressor" and the "innocent party" whose grievances ought to be redressed. Men may be foolish in the Hobbesian state of nature if they do not contest with others, but who is "innocent?" In sum, if all men are naturally in a state of war, there can be no "lawful" and "unlawful" use of force, no important distinction between a "hasty" and a "sedate" resort to violence, no appeal to "conscience" or "judgment" to decide something which could not be otherwise, and no moral separation between the "innocent" and the "aggressor."

Suppose we approach this conclusion from another direction. Both the state of nature and the state of war are without a "common superior" to act as judge, and thus, according to Locke's legalistic definition, both are states of "anarchy." In each state one may expect controversies between individuals to occur. 45 These contests may assume two forms, "one managed by law, the other by force." Keeping in mind Locke's intention and his view of the structure of a political theory—i.e., one begins with a clear statement of moral principles—the difference between the state of nature and the state of war must be a moral difference. Yet, the morality of the comparison cannot turn upon the absence of a common judge, the existence of conflict, or specific incidents of force, ⁴³ Ibid, pars. 16, 17; Thoughts on Education, sec.

⁴⁴ Second Treatise, pars. 21, 241, 242.

⁴⁵ For, "in all collections of men," there are bound to be a "variety of opinions, and contrariety of interests." Ibid, par. 98; First Letter on Toleration, p. 53.

for all of these are common to both states. What, then, is the distinguishing factor?

To answer that question, let us recall the manner by which moral evaluations are made, outlined in Book Two, chapter twenty-eight of the Essay Concerning Human Understanding. There Locke explains that moral judgments are premised upon "the conformity or disagreement of our voluntary actions to some law."46 Methodologically speaking, all that is necessary is a comparison of a particular voluntary action with a general rule, "whether the rule be true or false." This neutral definition will not do, however, since in "measuring an action" by a wrong rule, we may be led into "judging amiss of its moral rectitude."47 One is therefore obliged to determine what is the "true" rule of morality. For Locke, the Law of Nature is that "rule prescribed by God, which is the true and only measure of virtue."48 The state of nature, in so far as it is Locke's picture of the moral state of man, is one "truly governed" by natural law. The state of war is governed "by another rule" (force) which men have voluntarily adopted as the standard for "measuring" their actions. It is the "plain difference" between these two laws, one premised upon "peace, goodwill, mutual assistance, and preservation," and the other upon "enmity, malice, violence, and mutual destruction" that permits us the moral separation of the state of nature from the state of war. The state of nature "governed" by the Law of Nature is the only acceptable moral description of man, regardless of whether or not, in any particular instance, he succeeds in living in perfect obedience to the commands of that law. "Men living together according to reason, without a common superior on earth with authority to judge between them, is properly the state of nature." But the "declared design of force upon the person of another, where there is no common superior on earth to appeal to for relief, is the state of war." What is decisive is that in one state there is a "law of reason" which men make an effort to obey-and they are generally successful in that effort—while in the other state, the effort is not made because of a predisposition of hostility toward others.⁴⁹ So it would require an unusual employment of language to say that the latter state was 'governed' by the Law of Nature. What actually governs men in their relations with each other is the alternative rule of force.

If the purely ideal state of nature (i.e., the periect fulfillment of natural law commands) is the expression of God's vision, the validity of the Law of Nature cannot be challenged on the basis of what men do.50 At the same time, Locke insists that natural law is "a fixed and permanent rule of morals" which is "firmly rooted in the soil of human nature." Hence, "a manner of acting" has been prescribed for man "that is suitable to his nature." Natural law not only discloses "the eternal order of things" it also establishes "immutable" duties for men, duties which "cannot be other than they are."51 Locke asserts that it is "every man's duty to be just, whether there be any such thing as a just man in the world or not."52

The framework of the universe, being the workmanship of God, is indeed of an ideal nature, one expressing reason, harmony, and peace. When Locke makes reference to these qualities in his discussion of the state of nature, he does so in the context of qualifying language which reveals that he is speaking of what conditions would be like if men lived "according to the law of nature"-because, it is under that law that "all men alike are friends of one another and are bound together by common interests."53 Locke is offering us a definitional statement characterizing the law "whereby" men are "united into one fellowship and society."54 His supposed description of the peaceful state of nature refers not to the state but to the law of nature, to that which ought to exist, according to God's will. It is the law that "teaches" that "no one ought to harm another in his life, health, liberty, or possessions." Or, it is the law "which wills the peace and preservation of all mankind." The "peace and safety" of men are "provided for by the law of nature."55 In short, Locke is not de-

⁴⁶ Bk. 2, ch. 28, #5.

⁴⁷ Bk. 2, ch. 28, #20.

⁴⁸ Bk. 1, ch. 2, #6, 18; Bk. 2, ch. 28, #8; Bk. 4, ch. 3, #18; Bk. 4, ch. 10, #7; Epistle to the Reader, pp. 18-19

⁴⁹ Second Treatise, par. 19 (italics given). Thus, Locke argues, "the state of war (does not consist) in the number of partisans, but the enmity of the parties." First Treatise, par. 131. See note 22 above.

⁵³ The Law of Nature cannot be "altered to comply with (man's) ill-ordered choice." Bk. 2, ch. 21, #57. "The nature of good and evil is eternal and certain, and their value cannot be determined either by the public ordinances of men or by any private opinion." Essays, Essay I, p. 121; Essay VII, p. 199.

⁶¹ Essays, Essay VII, pp. 199, 201; cf. Essay I, p. 117.

⁵² Journal, June 26, 1681, MS f. 5.

⁵³ Essays, Essay V, p. 163; Second Treatise, par. 19.

⁵⁴ Second Treatise, pars. 128, 172.

⁵⁵ Ibid, pars. 6, 7, 8.

scribing the "peace and safety" of the state of nature, but rather the purpose of natural law.

From the outset, Locke is fully cognizant of the violence and conflict present in the state of nature. How else could one explain the fact that a major portion of his discussion in the chapter, "Of the State of Nature," is concerned with the "punishment" of "transgressors" and "criminals" in that natural state? Locke mentions the "offenses" committed against natural law. He grants to every man the power to kill a "murderer" or to punish the "criminal" for the "unjust violence and slaughter he has committed." Locke concedes that there are "inconveniences" attached to man's natural condition which "must certainly be great."56 Whence arise these criminals, transgressors, murderers, offenses, unjust violence and slaughter, and great inconveniences if the state of nature is so peaceful?

The fact is, Locke is a great deal more subtle than he has been portrayed by most of his interpreters. He is aware that if men could live in an ideal state of nature, they would cease to be men and become gods. But if, on the other hand, men could not live according to the Law of Nature in their natural condition, they could not distinguish themselves from the beasts. Locke's objective is limited: to prove that it is possible for men to live in obedience to natural law, and, on that basis, to show that they are moral beings.⁵⁷

It is in support of this assertion that Locke is led to consult history. He raises the question, "where are or ever were there any men in such a state of nature?" near the end of his chapter on the subject. First, he observes that "princes and rulers... all through the world are in a state of nature." The example is instructive for the confirmation it provides of the interpretation of the Lockean state of nature I have presented. For, while it is true that the history of any country would disclose its engagement in a state of war with other countries, such incidents have been the exceptions to the rule of an uncertain peace. There are periods during which most nations do not openly violate the precepts enjoined by natural law. Thus, from a panoramic historical perspective, one would conclude that the state of nature (between princes and rulers) is generally peaceful, though at times there are outbreaks of violence. Does Locke intend this example to serve as a macrocosmic description of individual relationships in the state of nature? His second example, stated in the same passage, indicates that he does.

Locke alludes to "the promises and bargains for truck, etc., between the two men in the desert island, mentioned by Garcilasso de la Vega in his history of Peru" as transactions conducted between men "in a state of nature in reference to one another." The example concerns two shipwrecked sailors who discover each other in Robinson Crusoe fashion and who, for a period of three or four years, live together, parting now and then in disagreement, until they are finally rescued. These men do not live in perfect tranquility, anymore than do states with respect to each other: but most of the time they do live reasonably well together. And, in their existence, a state of war is a particular exception to the general rule. That, it must be stressed, is all that Locke has to demonstrate in order to establish his point. The Lockean state of nature is one in which men can, but sometimes do not, live according to the rules of "common equity."

Locke illustrates the positive aspects of his position, pointing out that "not every compact" between men in the state of nature leads to the creation of political society. "Other promises and compacts men may make with one another and yet still be in the state of nature." Such agreements are binding because "truth and keeping of faith belongs to men as men, and not as members of society." Locke speaks of "men living in neighborhood without the bounds of a commonwealth."59 And, he adds, those who "liked one another so well" as to constitute themselves into a body politic must "be supposed to have some acquaintance and friendship together and some trust in one another."60

We might summarize Locke's position by citing an observation recorded in his Journal. "Our state here in this world," he wrote, "is a state of mediocrity." It is a state wherein "we are not capable of living together exactly by a rule, not altogether without it." That is Locke's picture of life in the state of nature.

⁵⁶ Ibid, pars. 6-13.

⁶⁷ In the context of speaking of the inhabitants of the West Indies, who reside under state of nature conditions, Locke records in his Journal that the individual can improve his lot if he cultivates that knowledge which will "shorten or ease" his labor and increase his "stock of riches." And, he adds, "another use of his knowledge is to live in peace with his fellow men, and this also he is capable of." Journal, February 8, 1677, MSf. 2 (italics added).

⁵⁸ Second Treatise, pars. 14, 145, 183, 184.

⁵⁹ Ibid., par. 14; Third Letter on Toleration (Works, vol. V), p. 212.

⁶⁰ Second Treatise, par. 107 (italics added).

⁶¹ Journal, March 20, 1678, MS f.3 (italics added).

The natural human condition is one in which agreements are both kept and violated, where peace and violence intermingle, where men good and bad, and in varying degrees, reside. The moral state of Lockean man is one of capabilities. It is not necessary that an individual be "actually endowed with" certain general qualities or abstract characteristics, only that he be "at least susceptible of these specific qualities."62 Thus, men are "equipped" with the "faculties" for reasoning. Every man is born "with a title to perfect freedom."63 It is in this sense that all men are by nature rational and free, in that they possess the capacity to be so. "Thus we are born free as we are born rational, not that we have actually the exercise of either."64 Similarly, Locke speaks of men as "beings capable of laws." And a few sentences later, he asks, "is a man under the law of nature?" His reply is that men in the state of nature are under the law because they are "supposed capable to know that law." Not that the individual actually does know it in every instance, but only that "he is presumed to know how far that law is to be his guide."65 Therefore. Locke concludes men possess "the same relative capacity of being ranked among moral, social creatures, and of being treated accordingly."66 These assumptions and conclusions about men are necessary to a moral perspective. As a view of human nature, they are meant to provide the individual with the proper guidelines for his relationships with others, although particular persons may in fact "declare" themselves by a consistency in their actions to be of another nature. The Lockean state of nature thus serves as a useful illustration of this moral "fiction."

II. THE HISTORICAL STATE OF MAN

Since Locke's references to man as a rational and moral being refer to his capacities, it is possible that, those capacities may not be fulfilled. Specifically, this means that historical and social conditions now enter into the argument, as aids or hindrances to man's development. So, for example, explaining why some men may not possess a knowledge of natural law, Locke cites the "barbarous habits" or "evil customs" under which they might have been raised. He observes that men may be "brought up in vice" in some societies, indicating the extent to which social conditions can prevent the realization of a natural capacity.67 The question is, under what kinds of social conditions can men gain a knowledge of their moral duties? It is a commonly accepted notion that the primitive conditions of life in the state of nature could not have been conducive to an awareness of natural law. The fault in this critique lies in its failure to appreciate that Locke's conception of the state of nature is not static, but developmental. Men may reside in different social surroundings and still be in the state of nature. Hence, we cannot omit the historical dimensions of the concept from a discussion of its place in Locke's political theory.

At first glance, it is surprising how much Locke is willing to concede to Filmer's argument. He grants that the first form of government was the political projection of the father's authority over the family. Nevertheless, Locke insists, the "foundations" and "ends" of paternal and political power "are so perfectly distinct and separate" that "there is no way to identify them"—though, of course, that is exactly what Filmer does. Es There is no way to identify them, that is, if the moral "foundations" and "ends" of political power are kept separate from the historical fact of patriarchical authority and government.

Having made this point, Locke then proceeds to employ the paternal metaphor throughout his discussion of history and the first form of government. He observes:

It is with commonwealths as with particular persons, they are commonly ignorant of their own births and infancies.

67 Essays, Essay I, p. 115, First Treatise, par 58. Men may be "cooped in close by the laws of their countries," and so prevented from acting in accordance with the precepts of natural law. Bk. 4, ch. 20, #4. "Fashion, discipline, and education have put eminent differences in the ages of several countries and made one generation much different from another in arts and sciences." Conduct of the Understanding (Works, vol. II) sec. 24; Bk. 2, ch. 21, #71. Locke observes that "men's tempers commonly [grow] good or bad with the conditions and circumstances they are in." MS c.34, f.25; Bk. 1, ch. 3, #12. More specifically, the "great difference and contrariety of opinions" amongst men are generally traceable to their "worldly interests" and the inequalities arising from certain "temporal advantages." Journal, April 6-10, 1677, MS f.2.

⁶² Works, vol. II, p. 309.

⁶³ Second Treatise, par. 87 (italies added).

⁶⁴ Ibid., par. 61, "We are born with faculties and powers capable of almost anything." Works, vol. II, p. 331.

⁸⁵ Ibid., pars. 57, 59, 60 (italics added).

⁶⁶ Works, vol II, p. 312.

⁶⁸ Second Treatise, pars. 71, 173, 174.

And a few paragraphs later, Locke refers to "the infancies of commonwealths," and to "young societies" which require "nursing fathers" to guide them through "the weakness and infirmities of their infancy." Still later in the Second Treatise, he returns to his characterization of "the infancy of governments" and the consequent need for governors to act "as the fathers of them, watching over them for their good."69

"Perhaps at first," Locke admits, "some one good and excellent man" had a certain "deference paid to his goodness" by being granted "a kind of natural authority" over other men. Even this conjectural language is all but abandoned a few paragraphs later when Locke declares:

I will not deny that, if we look back as far as history will direct us toward the original of commonwealths, we shall generally find them under the government and administration of one man.⁷⁰

There is no mistaking the portrait we are offered of the ruler as a father-figure, since, "as it often happens where there is much land and few people, the government commonly began in the father." He "in effect" became "the lawmaker and governor" because of the childlike trust men in the early state of nature evinced for the father's ability to govern wisely.71 Moreover, the institution of monarchy appeared "simple" and "obvious" to individuals without a knowledge of the various "forms of government" men might devise. They were ignorant of the "inconveniences of absolute power." Besides, monarchy was "best suited" to the conditions of men in the earliest historical state of nature since what they most needed was protection against foreign invasion. Monarchy provides men with such protection, and therefore, Locke concludes it was "natural" for men "to put themselves under a frame of government which might best serve to that end."72

It is true that a consultation of history lends considerable support to the argument that the earliest form of government was a patriarchical monarchy. But, Locke insists, this admission "destroys not that which I affirm," although some men have made the mistake of concluding from their reading of history that all government is "by nature" patriarchical or monarchical. Rejecting that viewpoint, Locke states that "it may not be amiss here to consider why people in the beginning generally pitched upon this form" of government. The explanation offered for their action must be placed within the context of an historical reading of the state of nature. One must visualize men passing through several stages of economic and social development. Also, what Locke says retains the status of an explanation; it is not a justification of the historical origins of government. The political society envisioned by Locke is justified on grounds other than those supplied by history. The political society envisioned by Locke is justified on grounds other than those Locke refuses to grant that any inevitability is attached to the origins of government. He takes pains to point out that even the institution of a monarchy is the result of man's exercising his "natural freedom." And, he adds. there are some historical examples of men using their freedom to institute a different form of government.75 It is not necessary to deny that monarchy was the earliest form of government; Locke simply wants to show that men might have acted otherwise. Hence, an admission that monarchy was a "likely," "easier," or "natural" solution to the problems faced by men in "the first ages" should not be taken to mean that monarchy was the only possible solution to those problems, a viewpoint he probably—but inaccurately—attributed to both Hobbes and Filmer. History tells us the prudential reasons why men established governments; we have yet to learn from Locke the proper moral foundations of the political order.

Monarchy arose, Locke suggests, because men were "accustomed" by experience "to the rule of one man." Individuals "grew up" within a family, "acquiescing" by degrees to the exercise of authority by a single person. To However, this reliance upon custom, tradition, and utility proved in time to be a poor foundation for government. At some definite point in history, men were forced "to examine more carefully the original and rights of government, ⁶⁹ Ibid, pars. 101, 110, 162.

⁷⁰ Ibid, pars. 94, 105, 110.

⁷¹ Ibid, pars. 74, 75, 76, 94, 107, 110, 111, 117. Locke also reverses the metaphor, labelling the natural relationship of the father to the child "a temporary government," par. 67.

⁷² Ibid, pars. 107, 110.

⁷³ Ibid, par. 106 (italics added).

⁷⁴ The dichotomy is not as sharp as this sentence implies, because Locke merges several propositions together. Thus, all 'governments' are the products of consent, and consent is a necessary—though not a sufficient—prerequisite of the proper political society. Given this view, the historical origins of government does supply at least a part of the justification for the "true extent and end of government." See note 98 below.

⁷⁵ Second Treatise, pars. 105, 112; cf. par. 103.

⁷⁶ Ibid, pars. 107, 110, 112.

and to find out ways to restrain the exorbitancies and prevent the abuses of that power" which the people had "intrusted in another's hands only for their own good."⁷⁷ Why should Locke suppose that such an examination, in fact, ever occured? The answer to that question is to be found in Locke's discussion of the various forms of property associated with certain historical stages of the state of nature.

Although history may be divided into an infinite number of chronological periods. Locke stresses the importance of dividing history into two periods according to the specific stage of development of property within a society. The earliest phase of history he names "the first ages of the world." It is a time of "innocence," a "poor but virtuous" period in history.78 It is "innocent" and "virtuous," be it noted, not because men are at one point in history innately different in character from men in some other age. Rather, Locke makes it clear that men are shaped by their social circumstances. and especially by their attitudes toward and their possession of property. Locke is well aware of the ability of political and social institutions to restrict or develop men's capacities to be rational, moral beings.

In the earliest stage of the state of nature, there were "few trespasses" against the Law of Nature because men had "no reason" to invade the rights of others or engage in quarrels.⁷⁹ The lack of "reasons" refers to the fact that men's "possessions" were not very large.⁸⁰ The "first age" is a time "before the appropriation of land," when men merely "gathered" such goods as were supplied by nature. Locke tells us that "men, at first, for the most part contented themselves with what unassisted nature offered to their necessities." In general, the population was nomadic; men "wandered" freely "up and down"; consequently, land as such was not of real value to them. What we are presented with, then, is a picture of "the equality of a simple, poor way of living" where men are able to confine "their desires within the narrow bounds of each man's small property." ¹⁸¹

Concomitant with this economic description. Locke observes that during this first period, men had need of few laws and few "officers" to "look after the execution of justice." Since they "stood more in need of defense against foreign invasions and injuries than of multiplicity of laws," Locke remarks that "a few established laws served the turn." In short, men resided in a society with a subsistence standard of living where the form of government was simple, and the laws were few. It was a "golden age" before "vain ambition ... corrupted men's minds into a mistake of true power and honor." At this time, there were "no contests betwixt rulers and people about governors or government."82

This situation changed dramatically "when ambition and luxury in future ages" succeeded in corrupting men. These vices "taught princes to have distinct and separate interests from their people," leading to the aforementioned re-examination of the foundations of government. Locke observes that "a long continuation" of society develops those "necessary arts" by which individuals are able to provide "for their safety, ease, and plenty." In effect, the institution of monarchy at an early age in history produced the conditions which led to its downfall by introducing men to "ambition and luxury." sa

Locke provides a rather clear account of the social and economic factors responsible for the changes in the life of man during what we have labelled the "second phase" of history. The most important of the events which brought to an end the first era of man's existence was the invention of money. But why was money invented? Although it may, in fact, have been true that in some parts of the world land was scarce, Locke refuses to accept this as an explanation. Instead, he suggests that the appearance of money is traceable to "the desire ⁷⁷ Ibid. pars. 111, 162.

⁷⁸ Ibid, pars. 110.

⁷⁹ Ibid, pars. 31, 51, 75, 108, 109.

⁸⁰ Ibid, pars. 36, 37, 38. Beneath this veil of "history," of course, is the Christian view of man's fall from grace. Elsewhere, Locke writes that when man was created by God, he was "put into a possession of the whole world" in a state where "there was scarce room for any irregular desires. But instinct and reason carried him the same way, and being neither capable of covetousness or ambition when he had already the free use of all things . . . [the fall of Adam is then explicitly mentioned and when private possessions and labor which now the curse on the earth had made necessary, by degrees made a definition of conditions, it gave room for covetousness, pride, and ambition, which by fashion and example spread the corruption which has so prevailed over mankind." A note entitled, "Homo Ante Et Post Lapsum," 1693, MS c. 28, f. 113 v. See also Second Treatise, pars. 56, 57.

⁸¹ Ibid, pars. 45, 36, 38, 107; cf. Bk. 2, ch. 16, ⁸² Ibid, pars. 107, 111, 162.

⁸³ Ibid, par. 101.

⁸⁴ Ibid, par. 45; cf. par. 36.

of having more than man needed." With its introduction into the world, "the intrinsic value of things which depends only on their usefulness to the life of man," was transformed. 5 Objects now took on an "imaginary value," fed by the appetites of men's imagination in pursuit of luxury and power. The love of power and property, Locke argues, are the "two roots of almost all the injustice and contention that so disturb human life." 5

In conjunction with this psychological explanation for the changed form of property, Locke offers a sociological account of the transformation. "Fixed property in the ground," he maintains, is associated with the founding of cities. "Families increased and industry enlarged their stocks" until they "incorporated" themselves and "built cities."87 It is only at this point that money makes its appearance. For, once men settled in cities, they began to engage in commercial trade with each other in order to increase their wealth. Trade, Locke notes, is "the foundation of riches." And, money is "necessary to the carrying on the trade."88 It is "commerce with other parts of the world" that "draws money" to the individual.89 Moreover, the "want of people and money" go together as do "riches and multitudes."90

We have already hinted at what happened when men began to "enlarge" their possessions, engage in trade, and by tacit consent accept money as a universal commodity of exchange. These complicated economic transactions gave rise to disputes and controversies among men. Now laws were needed to "settle the properties of those of the same society." "In all collections of men," Locke observes, a "variety of opinions and contrariety of inter-

85 Ibid, par. 37. Money is "little useful to the life of man in proportion to food, raiment, and carriage," par. 50. The "intrinsic value" of money is not "natural," but is, rather, "a barren thing and produces nothing." MS e. 8, ff. 11, 20.

- 86 Thoughts on Education, secs. 105, 110.
- 87 Second Treatise, par. 38.
- 88 Works, vol. IV, pp. 5, 7, 12–14, 16, 148; MS e. 8, ff. 7, 10.
 - 89 Second Treatise, par. 48.
- or Ibid, par. 108; cf. pars. 74, 162; First Letter on Toleration, p. 42. "A multitude of strong, healthy people being the riches of every country and that which makes it flourish." Journal, July 15, 1678, MS f. 3. In the First Treatise, Locke argues that absolute monarchy is a barrier to and is incompatible with the growth of population and riches. pars. 33, 41.
 - 91 Second Treatise, pars. 38, 45.

ests" emerge. ⁹² The need for some "common superior" to act as "judge" in deciding these "controversies" obviously grew in proportion to the frequency with which men interacted with each other within the same city and between cities.

With the accrual of material wealth, the Lockean state emerges, with its division of political power, its impartial judges, and a multiplicity of laws. For, within civil society, "the laws regulate the right of property, and the possession of land is determined by positive constitutions." The "great art of government," according to Locke, is manifest in "the increase of lands and the right employing of them." The Lockean state is an institution designed to secure "protection and encouragement to the honest industry of mankind."93 That the creation of political society is responsive to the new economic needs of men living under the 'second phase' of monarchy is evident. We cannot suppose, Locke argues, that "anyone entered into civil society for the procuring, securing, or advancing the salvation of his soul, when he, for that end, needed not the force of civil society." But the individual does enter political society "for the procuring, preserving, and advancing" of his "civil interests." These include "life, liberty, health, and indolency of body; and the possession of outward things, such as money, lands, houses, furniture, and the like." Locke goes so far as to assert that "the temporal good and outward prosperity of the society" is "the sole reason of men's entering into [civil] society."94

In a state of nature in which the exchange of commodities is simple, where peoples are nomadic, where there is no "fixed property," a simple form of government will suffice to preserve the minimum of order that enables men, generally speaking, to obey the precepts of natural law. However, in a state of nature in which complicated economic transactions take place within and between groups of men, where land is valuable, where the economy has developed beyond the subsistence level, and where quarrels and contentions among men over property rights are frequent, it becomes necessary "to examine more carefully the original and rights of government, and to find out ways to restrain the exorbitancies and prevent the abuses" of the power granted the monarch.

⁹² Ibid, par. 98; cf. First Letter on Toleration, p. 53.

⁹³ Ibid, pars. 50, 120, 42 (italics added).

⁹⁴ Second Letter on Toleration, p. 119; First Letter on Toleration, pp. 10, 43.

It may be objected that what we have labelled the "second phase" of the state of nature is not that "natural condition" of man, but the "early stages" of civil society. 55 But Locke is quite explicit regarding the conditions under which political society comes into being. It is precisely at this point that his argument shifts from historical description to moral prescription. 96 And, in order to make clear the full 95 This is the view of Sterling Lamprecht, The Moral and Political Philosophy of John Locke (New York, 1962), p. 127, and Peter Laslett. See Laslett's note to par. 111, op. cit. p. 360. Sheldon Wolin's distinction between the "ideal" and the "fallen" states of nature parallels in many respects the argument offered here. Wolin, op. cit., pp. 306-309. However, there is no attempt by Wolin to portray the two different stages of the state of nature as descriptions of man's actual historical development. Also, I cannot accept Wolin's conclusion that the effect of Locke's dichotomous view of the state of nature "was to obscure the political character of civil society." On the contrary, Locke's separation of the early from the later stage of man's development in his natural condition provides us with precisely the information and rationale we need in order to understand Locke's commitment to political institutions of a particular form.

96 The shift occurs at this point in Locke's argument as we have presented it. The actual order of discussion in the Second Treatise employs several such shifts and is considerably more difficult for the reader to follow. This is due less to Locke's devious nature or to his indifference as to the distinctive nature of the arguments themselves than it is to the fact the Second Treatise was pieced together and revised over a ten year period. as Laslett has shown. The breakdown of the chapters of most interest to us seems to be as follows: The first four chapters of the Second Treatise essentially set down the moral framework for the discussion of government. Chapter five. "Of Property," is much more historically-oriented. Chapter six, "Of Paternal Power," is a rather balanced mixture of historical and moral arguments. Chapter seven, "Of Political or Civil Society," returns to the level of ethics, laying down the criteria for distinguishing between the various forms of government. This discussion is summarized and carried over into the first part of Chapter eight, "Of the Beginning of Political Societies." But, beginning with paragraph 100 of that chapter, Locke returns to history to account for the origins of government. It will be seen, therefore, that in our presentation of Locke's historical view of the state of nature, we have cited almost exclusively from Chapters five and eight, while the shift to which reference is made in the text above returns force of Locke's meaning of political society, it will be helpful to comment briefly on a notion which has become the subject of the most confused and tortuous reasoning practiced upon Lockean political theory by two centuries of scholars. I refer to the idea of consent. As this subject has recently been reexamined elsewhere, ⁹⁷ I will limit my remarks to those aspects of Locke's discussion of consent which bear directly on the argument of this essay.

Very early in his life. Locke came to the conclusion that any justification for political authority had to be traceable to one of two sources: the direct appointment of God, or the consent of the people. Throughout the First Treatise, he insists that if Filmer's view of divine appointment is rejected, we must fall back upon the notion of consent. However, unlike his critics. Locke does not stop there. In fact, that is merely the beginning point of his argument. For, in Locke's view, all governments are the product of consent.98 Yet, an indiscriminate acceptance of consent as the source of legitimacy of political power would hardly provide him with any grounds for distinguishing his position from that of Hobbes. Thus, against Filmer, Locke argues that consent is a necessary condition of political society, but, against Hobbes, he maintains that it is not a sufficient condition.

In developing the latter point, Locke refuses to follow Hobbes in equating consent with coercion. He therefore denies that a legitimate government can be the product of conquest. 99 In addition, there are certain things to which an individual cannot freely consent and still retain his standing as a "rational" being. He carnot, for instance, consent to his own slavery, i.e., put himself under us to the arguments Locke advances in Chapter seven.

⁹⁷ See Hanna Pitkin, "Obligation and Consent," this Review, 59 (Dec. 1965), 990-999; and John Dunn, "Consent in the Political Theory of John Locke," The Historical Journal, 10 (1967), 153-182.

^{98 &}quot;All government, whether monarchical or other, is only from the consent of the people." Notes on Samuel Parker's Discourse of Ecclesiastical Polity, MS c. 39. Governments cannot "be founded on anything but the consent of the people." Second Treatise, par. 175; cf. pars. 102, 104, 105, 106, 112, 119, 198. Also, there is a relevant historical note by Locke ("Politia," 1682, MS c. 42) cited by Lasletz in his note to par. 106, op. cit., p. 356.

⁹⁹ Second Treatise, pars. 175, 176, 186.

the arbitrary will of another.100 Moreover, "no rational creature can be supposed to change his condition with an intention to be worse."101 And since individuals living under an absolute monarchy are in a "far worse condition" than those living in the state of nature, no reasonable person could give his consent to such a government.102 Clearly, Locke is not making descriptive statements about reality. He was well aware of the existence of absolute governments, past and present, and of the theoretical defense provided for them by Hobbes.103 Rather, he is proscribing a particular form of government, and he does so, not by denying that it is a government and hence the product of men's consent, but by denying that it is a legitimate or "lawful" government. In a purely de facto sense, a government or a "commonwealth" is "any independent community," regardless of its particular form.104 Even a tyranny is a "form of government," although the tyrant "has no right to be obeyed" since his subjects owe their allegiance not to individual rulers but to lawful forms of government.105 Political society refers to the latter, $^{100}\ Ibid,$ pars. 23, 135, 137, 149, 164, 171, 172.

103 The Turkish government is specifically mentioned as an absolutist state. Ibid, par. 192; First Treatise, par. 33. Also, there seems to be an obvious reference to Russia ('Czar') in the Second Treatise, par. 91. Explicit mention is made of Ceylon in par. 92.

104 Ibid, par. 133.

105 Ibid, par. 201; cf. pars. 93, 192, 198, 202, Hence, Locke is not entirely clear in his argument. He wants to maintain that, as an historical description, all government-even Filmer's patriarchical and absolute monarchy-is the product of consent (see note 98 above). At the same time, he wants to argue, against both Hobbes and Filmer, that no "rational" man could consent to live under an absolute monarchy as a part of his moral conception of human nature (see notes 100-103 above). And, finally, he grants that tyrannyeven without consent—is a de facto, though not a de jure, form of government. Either consent is an inherent part of the meaning of "government," and history records the actions of irrational men in consenting to a tyranny, or consent is only a necessary ingredient of "lawful" governments, and his statement about the origins of government is a case of history ideologized. The latter seems to be the most accurate reading of Locke's view. In the First Treatise, he contrasts "lawful government" with "tyranny" or "usurpation": pars. 72, 81. Later, he contrasts "tyranny and usurpation" with "elections and consent": ibid.

and therefore there is a specific distinction to be made between "government" in general based upon consent, and the additional special features Locke incorporates into his concept of a legitimate political order. "The only way," he declares, "whereby any one . . . puts on the bonds of civil society is by agreeing with other men to join and unite into a community."106 "There only is political society where everyone of the members has quitted his natural power" and "resigned it up into the hands of the community." Thus, whenever "any number of men" give up their natural power and "resign it to the public, there and there only is a political or civil society."107 In other words, the terms laid down by Locke for the creation of political society do not correspond with his description of absolute monarchy; for individuals did not resign their power to the "public" or the "community," but placed it in the hands of one man. Yet, "that which begins and actually constitutes any political society is nothing but the consent of any number of freemen capable of a majority to unite and incorporate into such a society." 108 Locke could hardly be more emphatic in his choice of words. The "only" way that political society can be created is in the manner outlined in the Second Treatise. Locke's meaning becomes perfectly clear once we realize that absolute monarchy does not qualify as a "political" society, and that those who live under such a government are still residents of the state of nature. Mere consent to absolute monarchy or a general submission to a conqueror, does not remove men from the state of nature.109 What does put men into a "political" society is the consent of the majority establishing a law-making authority which acts for the common good, and which, in particular, does not "raise taxes on the property of the people without the consent of the people . . . or their deputies."110

In stating that men give up their political

¹⁰¹ Ibid, par. 131.

¹⁰² Ibid, pars. 137, 91, 93, 135, 163, 164.

par. 148. Thus, Locke's point is that even if tyranny is the product of consent, it is not legitimate, although, as a matter of historical fact, it is usually not instituted by consent but by force.

¹⁰⁶ Second Treatise, par. 95 (italics added).

¹⁰⁷ Ibid, pars. 87, 89 (italics added).

¹⁰⁸ Ibid, par. 99 (italics added).

¹⁰⁹ Moreover, "general submission" and "general consent" are not the same. The latter seems to be tied to some system of elections, whereas the former is merely the product of force. Notes on William Sherlock's The Case of the Allegiance due to Sovereign Powers Stated and Resolved..., MS c. 28, f. 96.

¹¹⁰ Second Treatise, pars. 142, 87, 89, 141.

power to the community, Locke explains that "in all cases" the individual "has given up to the legislative" the power to punish offenses against the Law of Nature. After repeating that this authorization is a definitional component of political society, Locke declares:

and this puts men out of a state of into that of a commonwealth by setting up a judge on earth... which judge is the legislative, or magistrates appointed by it.¹¹¹

Thus, "whenever there are any number of men, however associated, that have no such decisive power to appeal to, they are still in the state of nature." It is the immediately following sentence that begins:

Hence it is evident that absolute monarchy, which by some men is counted the only government in the world, is indeed inconsistent with civil society, and so can be no form of civil government at all.

Those living under the rule of an absolute monarch "are still in the state of nature." For, the monarch having "both legislative and executive power in himself alone," the people can have no "judge" who can render "fair" and "indifferent" decisions. The ruler "is as much in the state of nature with all under his dominion as he is with the rest of mankind." This means that the people are also in the state of nature.

Now one understands the importance of Locke's legalistic definition of the state of nature, which he repeats at this point in his argument.

Wherever any two men are who have no standing rule and common judge to appeal to on earth for the determination of controversies of right betwixt them, there they are still in the state of nature. 112

That is precisely the relationship between the absolute monarch and any individual member of society, since they have no common judge to decide controversies between them. Consequently, men in such a society "are apt to think themselves in the state of nature in respect of him (absolute monarch) who they find to be so." In any event, they could never "think themselves in civil society till the legislature was placed in collective bodies of men." For.

in well-ordered commonwealths... the legislative power is put into the hands of diverse persons who, duly assembled, have by themselves, or jointly with others, a power to make laws; which... they are themselves subject to...¹¹⁴

Clearly, Locke is replying to the Hobbesian contention that the ruler is not a party to the formation of civil society, but remains in the state of nature. According to Locke, however, if the ruler remains in the state of nature vis-avis the people, they likewise stand in the same relationship to him. The result is that no political society has been constituted at all. Because, "no man in civil society can be exempted from the laws of it." To say otherwise, Locke argues, is to claim that "the state of nature and civil society are one and the same thing." The conclusion forced upon us is that there is only one way for men to leave the state of nature. and that is by ceding their power to the community, with the assurance that some form of legislative body will be established to act as judge, deciding issues on behalf of the common good. In all other instances, and especially in the case of absolute monarchy, men are still in the state of nature.

III. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

Beginning with a conception of human nature, and drawing upon history, Locke uses both moral criteria and historical information to formulate his conception of political society. If, as Locke suggests, a knowledge of our "rights" and "duties" follows from a knowledge of the "foundations" and "original" of political society, then a proper understanding of what Locke means by the state of nature, from which political society emerges, is crucial to any explication of other Lockean notions, e.g., "property," "natural rights," political obligation, etc. Moreover, since the state of nature functions as a critique of existing society by indicating the legal and moral boundaries of political relationships, a clear idea of when men are or are not returned to their natural state 'with a liberty to shift for themselves as they see fit,' is essential to an appreciation of the Two Treatises as a practical, revolutionary document. Finally, Locke was writing within a particular intellectual climate. one in which a portrayal of "natural man' was certain to draw theological and political criticism. Earlier, we mentioned Locke's efforts to separate his political theory from that of Filmer and Hobbes, in order to indicate the intellectual context of his argument. Locke's interpretation of the state-of-nature concept discloses some of the reasons for and the de-¹¹¹ Ibid, pars. 88, 89 (italics added).

¹¹² Ibid, pars. 90, 91, 174 (italics added).

¹¹⁸ Ibid, par. 94 (italics added).

¹¹⁴ Ibid, par. 143.

tails of that separation. In short, the state of nature is the cornerstone of Lockean political thought; it is important for its political implications; and it was a focal point of intellectual controversy in the seventeenth century.

What all these comments share in common is their prefatory importance. I began this essay with a statement of the standard intellectual accusations made against Locke, viz., that he is a superficial, abstract, inconsistent, and deceptive thinker. And, with an allowance for his human failings, I have attempted, using his discussion of the state of nature as an illustration of his general approach to political problems, to indicate my reasons for rejecting these characterizations of Locke. Yet, there is another set of charges laid to Lockean political thought, to which I have not explicitly responded. These are more distinctly political and ideological criticisms. It is said, for example, that Locke is the progenitor of liberalism, that he is the apologist for the rising bourgeois class, that he is the father of the empiricist attack on religion and traditional philosophy, and so forth. It is never an easy matter to deal with such ideological charges. but one thing does seem certain; there is a question as to what Locke did say which must be answered before all the innuendoes of meaning can be extracted from his words in order to support one of the ideological positions cited above. For reasons of priority and space, I have considered here only the intellectual, not the political, accusations against Locke. It is in this sense that the explication of Locke's thought in this essay is prefatory to a more general and political assessment of Lockean political theory.115

Aside from the ideological implications and uses of historical scholarship, there is, it seems to me, another reason for rereading Locke in light of what has been said generally about 'classic' political theorists, and about Locke in particular. One of the criticisms frequently advanced by contemporary political scientists, including historians of political thought, is that traditional political thinkers did not understand the is/ought dichotomy, or the difference between an analytic and an historical argument.¹¹⁶ The effect of this criticism is 115 The ideological aspects of liberalism as they are related to Locke's political theory and the intellectual and historical events of seventeenth century England provide the primary focus for my longer—but yet uncompleted—work, The Roots of Liberalism.

116 See, for example, George Sabine, A History of to question the relevance of studying the classic writers in light of the preoccupations of modern political thought. Although it must be admitted that Locke does not make it especially easy for the reader to follow these distinctions, because he is not so painfully self-conscious of them as modern writers are, nevertheless such a simple criticism of his political thought will not do. Locke does attempt to blend together deductive hypotheses, historical evidence, and ethical assumptions, keeping in mind the 'very different' foundations of the various statements. If, as I believe, the problems and objectives of combining these various elements are generic to the creative activity of formulating a theory about politics, something may be learned concerning theory construction from reading a theorist such as Aristotle or Locke. In the opinion of a contemporary political scientist who shares this conviction, and who also selects Locke as the example illustrative of his point, "there are insights in the work (Two Treatises) that could be tapped as an aid to inquiry into systematic theory." And, he continues:

The thoughtful, so-called political theorists were in fact total social scientists who . . . felt free to explore every aspect of political life. In narrowing the study of the political thoughts of these earlier social philosophers to a reporting of their moral wisdom, contemporary political theory has helped to conceal from the rest of political science valuable resources for an understanding of causal theory, particularly of alternative conceptual frameworks. Clearly, the wisdom of the great social theorists needs to be scrutinized for its insights about general political theories.¹¹⁷

This is not to suggest, by way of analogy, that a study of Beethoven's techniques of composition, harmonic structure, or orchestration, should result in the student's composition of music which sounds like that of Beethoven. Indeed, the greater fault in this regard is chargeable to political science, which is still echoing worn-out dogmas, while contemporary music has advanced a considerable distance from its old masters. Hopefully, with an appreciation of what a thinker like Locke was asserting, we shall be in a better position not only to learn from but also to transcend the political thought of the past.

Political Theory (Third Edition, New York, 1961), pp. 523-540.

¹¹⁷ David Easton, The Political System (New York, 1943), p. 313.

NATIONAL ATTRIBUTES AS PREDICTORS OF DELEGATE ATTITUDES AT THE UNITED NATIONS¹

JACK E. VINCENT Florida Atlantic University

The purpose of this paper is to explore United Nations delegate attitudes toward the major organs of the United Nations, i.e., the Security Council, General Assembly, Economic and Social Council, Secretariat, International Court of Justice, and the General and Main Committees of the General Assembly. In respect to these organs, the study probes "delegate satisfactions" concerning voting procedures, membership arrangements, and general role and past performance; "delegate perceptions" in respect to present and future importance and the probability of changes occurring in respect to membership arrangements; and "delegate desires" in respect to modifying roles and powers. The study also attempts to ascertain if delegate attitude patterns can be related to "predictors" generated from attributes of the delegates' home states. That is, is it possible to predict delegate attitudes from information about their home states?

The potential importance of delegate attitudes in respect to the United Nations will be treated in detail later in the paper. Here, suffice it to say that delegates make decisions, relay information, give advice, and engage in other types of activities which allow them to help shape the institutions in which they operate. Because this is the case, it is assumed that the discovery of attitudinal patterns and the relationship of these patterns to various other indices is a potentially fruitful line of inquiry, which may facilitate an understanding of, and provide a basis for predictions about, the political processes of the United Nations.

It is apparent that a host of variables might "account" for United Nations delegate attitudes. Such variables could be categorized in a variety of ways, such as: (1) genetic, (2) past experience, (3) environmental, etc. However, to attempt to organize all relevant factors into a coherent theory of delegate attitudes at this time is probably premature; to accomplish this, more needs to be known about the formulation and pattern of attitudes of actors at the international level (and national level). In view of this, the objectives of this study are very modest. Basically, the study aims to answer a kind of pre-theory question-what kinds of national attributes appear to be related to delegate attitudes? Further, if certain national attributes are found to be related to delegate attitudes, how may this be interpreted and what does it suggest, if anything, about possible tendencies and developments at the United Nations? National attributes are selected as a starting point because of their "accessibility" compared to other potentially relevant indices, such as those relating to the personality of the delegates.

¹ I would like to thank the Research Advisory Committee of Central Michigan University for its financial support of the data gathering phase of the project; the Political Science Department of Florida Atlantic University for financial support of the data analysis phase; and, the vote of the Florida Atlantic University Research Committee to support the project out of NSF Institutional Grant monies. The generous counsel of Dean J. Clyde, Allan Nash, and Andrew Baggaley and the assistance of Daniel Cousens, David Joslyn, Derold Clement, Michael Novak and James Turner are greatly appreciated.

The present study, then, is offered as a modest first step in the problem of attempting to account for the orientations and predilections of delegates of the United Nations. Like many pilot studies, it is deficient in, but a struggle toward, theory.

I. DATA COLLECTION

Data used in the study were collected from March to December, 1965. All United Nations delegations were contacted² and 68 cooperated with the project.

Questionnaires were initially sent to Ambassadors in Permanent Missions. The Ambassadors were told, "If you choose, you may have anyone in your delegation who is competent complete the questionnaire." Although each respondent was told that his personal identity was not important, personal identification cards enclosed with some of the questionnaires indicate that at least 15 of the respondents were actually Ambassadors.

- ² See: Permanent Missions to the United Nations, United Nations Document, ST/SG/SER.A/186, January, 1966.
- ³ It is possible that many more of the responding delegates were also Ambassadors. It is probably desirable to have as many Ambassadors as possible within the group of responding delegates,

All respondents were also told: (1) All replies would be held in the strictest confidence. (No one but the research staff would be allowed to see the completed questionnaires); (2) The results of the study would be used solely for academic purposes. (In any published results, it would not be possible to identify those that helped us, either by person or nation); and (3) the respondent was contributing to a carefully planned and important scientific endeavor.

The collected sample tended to distribute well across many ways of classifying the respondents' states. For example, using cut-off points established by Banks and Textor in their A Cross Polity Survey, the sample may be compared, in terms of national attributes, with the "ascertainable" universe of states.

The sample tended to cut through other ways of classifying the respondents' states as well. In these terms, then, the sample may be viewed as fairly "representative" of all possible respondents' states even though it is not random. Also, "factors" which emerge from factor analysis of the respondents' states correspond well with factors which emerge from factor analysis of all or most states (i.e., economic development, density, size, etc.).

In connection with working with biased samples, Zetterberg has argued:

The relationships expressed in the theoretical propositions, in other words, claim to be universally present. They are, accordingly, present both in representative and non-representative samples. To disprove or demonstrate their existence is, hence, possible in any kind of sample—biased or unbiased. This important, and perhaps surprising, consideration, however, should immediately be qualified. When using a biased sample for a verification, we must have assurance that the relationship we want to prove is not introduced into our data by selective sampling. This possibility, however, is in most cases rather un-but, as the project has been set up, this is not necessary. That is, as explained above, the major purpose of the project is to relate non-personal data to delegate response patterns. A delegate's "rank," then, is considered to fall in the same analytical category (personal) as "age," "education," etc. These are potentially fruitful lines of inquiry, but are not pursued here for reasons explained above.

- ⁴ Arthur S. Banks and Robert B. Textor, A Cross Polity Survey (Cambridge: M.I.T. Press, 1953) pp. 54-117.
- ⁵ Phillip K. Gregg and Arthur S. Banks, "Dimensions of Political Systems: Factor Analysis of A Cross Polity Survey," this REVIEW, 59 (1965), p. 607.

likely.... On balance, it appears that non-representative samples are not much inferior to representative samples when we want to disprove a theoretical hypothesis.

If it is assumed that the propensity of delegates to cooperate is unrelated to their questionnaire responses, the tests of significance employed in this study can be viewed as applying as if the sample were random. If this assumption is deemed unwarranted, the tests of significance can be ignored and the correlations given later in the study can be seen as descriptive of the cooperative universe. In this case, it is assumed that the cooperative universe is large enough to make assertions about it meaningful.

II. QUESTIONNAIRE CONSTRUCTION

Please place one mark on each answer line according to the following scheme:

To mark here means that you are neither really satisfied nor dissatisfied with the situation.

Highly Moderately Slightly
Slightly Satisfied

Dissatisfied

Naturally, you can mark anywhere on the answer line. The major idea is that satisfaction, or dissatisfaction, increases as you move away from the "0" on the answer line. We understand that you may hold certain reservations or qualifications in mind in marking a particular answer line. What we want is your general impression of the situation.

Similar instructions and appropriate answer lines were employed in connection with other questions probing additional "satisfaction"

⁶ Hans L. Zetterberg, On Theory and Verification in Sociology (Totowa, New Jersey: The Bedminster Press, 1963), pp. 54-55.

TABLE 1. SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF THE RESPONDENT'S STATES

		Size					1	····	· I	Populati	on
	Sar	nple	Univ	erse					Sar	nple	Uni	verse
•	N	%	N	%			•	•	N	%	\overline{N}	%
Very Large	5	7.3	6	5.2			Very	Large	3	4.4	4	3.4
Large	12	17.7	26	22.6			Larg		12	17.7	23	20.0
Medium	24	35.3	36	31.4			Med	ium	24	35.3	34	29.6
Small	27	39.7	47	40.8			Sma	11	29	42.6	54	47.0
	68	100%	115	100%				•	68	100%	115	100%
Agric	ultura	l Populat	ion						Lite	racy R	ate
	Sa	mple	Uni	vėrse					Sa	mple	Un	iverse
	N	%	. N	%					N	%	\overline{N}	. %
High	24	35.2	56	49.5			High		19	27.9	25	23.8
Medium	28	41.2	33	29.2			Med		20	29.5	30	28.6
Low	13	19.2	17.	15.1			Low		14	20.5	24	22.8
Very Low	3	4.4	7	6.2			Very	Low .	15	22.1	26	24.8
	68	100%	113	100%					68	100%	105	100%
				Freedor	n of t	he Pro	ess
							Sa.	mple		Uni	verse	•
				\			N	%		N .	- %	i
Comp	olete I	reedom					26	38.3		43	44.4
Inter	mitter	it Freedo	m				17	25.0		17	17.5
Freed	lom Ir	nternally .	Absent				17	25.0		21	21.6
Freed	lom Ir	nternally	& Exter	nally A	bsent		8.	11.7		16	16.5
							68	100%		97	100%
				Status	of Le	gislatu	ıre	- And the second
					San	nple		Un	ivers	3e		•
					Ň	%		N		%
		Fully Effe			19	28.0		28		8
		Partially 1			18	26.4		23		3
•		Largely In			13	19.2		21		21
	,	Wholly In	effectiv	B	18	26.4		28		8
				Margina and a state of the state of the same	68	1009	6	100	10	0%
			G	eograph
•			_		San	nple				Uı	iverse
				N		······································	%			N		%
Africa (include	es N.	Africa)	•	17			25.1			33		8.7
Americas		11. \		10			14.7			24		0.8
Asia (includes		alia)		11			16.2			20	1	7.5
Eastern Europ	96			6			8.8			9		7.8
Middle East				10			14.7			11		9.6
Western Europ	pe			14			20.5			18	1	5.6
				68		1	00%			115	10	0%

matters and in respect to the organ's "increasing or decreasing importance," delegate desires to "increase or decrease importance" and the "probability or improbability" of certain changes occurring.

The problem of questionnaire validity was approached by having 51 non-delegate judges? "answer" the questionnaire. They were asked to "assume you are a UN delegate with positive feelings, perceptions, desires about the United Nations, who sees things in dynamic terms. Which ends of the following answer lines would you choose?" (The questionnaire was then administered). At least 95% of the judges agreed on each of the terms selected and how they should be labeled, i.e., as expressing either "positive feeling," a "positive perception," a "positive desire," or a "dynamic perception."

It was decided to label delegate responses that "deviate toward" (using the mean value on the answer line as the zero point) the end of the answer lines predicted by the judges as "positive" or "dynamic" delegate reactions, and those that "deviate away" as "negative" or "static" delegate reactions.8 Thus, each deviation toward "satisfied" is viewed as an indication of a "positive feeling," each deviation toward "dissatisfied" a "negative feeling," each deviation toward "increase" a "positive desire," each deviation toward "decrease" a "negative desire," each deviation toward "increasing" a "positive perception," each deviation toward "decreasing" a "negative perception," each deviation toward "probable" a "dynamic perception" and each deviation toward "improbable" a "static perception."

Reliability of the questionnaire was estimated at .93 by the "Kuder-Richardson formula 20." Scores were generated for the formula by treating each "positive" and "dynamic" delegate deviation as "correct" and each "negative" and "static" deviation as "incorrect."

⁷ A panel of 51 upper division international relations students at Florida Atlantic University were asked to judge the statements.

* Technically, then, it is movement away from the mean value, not actual agreement or disagreement with the judges, which defines "positive," "dynamic," "negative" and "static" attitudes. Thus, whenever a subject deviates from the central tendency, he is viewed as evincing one of these kinds of attitudes. "Attitude" is employed here in a broad sense to include "feelings," "perceptions," and "desires." A respondent having a score exactly equal to the mean value, of course, does not evidence either a "negative," "static," "positive," or "dynamic" attitude.

9 Reliability, of course, refers to the character-

Scores for the remaining data analysis were generated by dividing each answer line into 21 parts, with magnitude increasing moving from left to right and with "O" scored as 11. The following example gives some possible marks and the scores that would result:

The actual delegate responses tended to range across the answer lines, i.e., in 39 questions they range from 1 to 21, in nine from 1 to 20, in one from 1 to 19, in two from 1 to 17, in one from 1 to 16, in one from 1 to 14, and in two from 1 to 13.

III. FINDINGS

Overall. The overall results in terms of means and standard deviations may be summarized in the following table:

TABLE 2. SUMMARY OF RESPONSES

Questions	Organs	Mean	Stan- dard Devi- ation
Degree of satisfaction or dissat-	SC	10.4	7.0
isfaction with voting proce-	GA	4.7	4.5
dures	ECOSOC	5.2	5.6
	ICJ	4.4	4.1
	MC	4.4	4.2
Degree of satisfaction or dissat-	sc	9.9	7.6
isfaction with charter mem-	GA	3.6	3.9
bership arrangements	ECOSOC	9.0	7.3
	ICJ	5.9	5.3
	SEC	7.3	6.3
Degree of satisfaction or dissat-	sc	7.9	6.7
isfaction with understand-	ECOSOC	8.4	6.8
ings and agreements to allo-	ICJ	7.0	6.1
cate seats	SEC	7.6	6.3
	GC	6.5	5.4
	MC	5.9	5.0
Degree of satisfaction or dissat-	SC	9.6	5.8
isfaction with general rule	GA	6.3	4.5
and past performance of or-	ECOSOC	5.6	4.7
gans	ICJ	5.6	4.5
-	SEC	5.4	3.8
	GC	5.7	3.7
	MC	5.3	3.8

Where SC = Security Council

GA = General Assembly

ECOSOC = Economic and Social Council

ICJ = International Court of Justice

SEC =Secretariat

GC = General Committee of the General Assembly • MC = Main Committee of the General Assembly

istics of an entire test instrument and not its individual items. Because of the decision to work with individual items and not an aggregate score in this study, the above estimate is given simply for informational purposes.

TABLE 2-(Continued)

Questions	Organs	Mean	Stan- dard Devi- ation
Present increasing or decreas-	SC	7.7
ing importance of organs	ĞA	6.3	5.6
	ECOSOC	9.1	6.4
	ICJ	8.3	3.8
	SEC	7.5	4.7
	GC	7.5	4.7
	MC	7.0	4.6
Future increasing or decreasing	SC	6.1	5.1
importance of organs	GA	6.9	5.5
	ECOSOC	8.9	6.4
	ICJ	7.8	4.6
	SEC	6.8	5.0
	GC	7.2	4.3
	MC	6.9	4.5
Desire to increase or decrease	sc	6.6	5.3
the role and power of organs	GA	5.2	4.9
	ECOSOC	6.4	5.2
	ICJ	6.2	4.8
	\mathbf{sec}	5.9	4.5
	GC	6.6	4.4
	MC	6.5	4.7
Probability of changes in char-	SC	4.9	5.4
ter memberships arrange-	GA	8.6	7.3
ments	ECOSOC	6.6	6.2
	ICJ	10.4	6.5
	SEC	9.6	6.2
Probability of changes in un-	SC	6.6	6.1
derstandings and agreements	ECOSOC	6.3	5.8
to allocate seats	ICJ	9.8	6.5
	SEC	8.5	6.6
	GC	7.8	6.0
	MC	8.7	6.2

Table 2 shows that, generally speaking, (viewing the mean as the central tendency) delegates tend to be satisfied, expect and wish organs to increase in importance, and expect changes to take place. That is, the means of the answer marks tend to lie between "O" and the satisfied, increasing, increase, and probable sides of the answer lines. The table indicates variation, however, moving from organ to organ in the analytical categories. For example, generally speaking, United Nations delegates seem less satisfied with the voting procedures of the Security Council than with those of the General Assembly. Also, they seem to feel that it is less probable that changes will occur in respect to the Charter membership arrangements for the International Court of Justice than for the Security Council.

The standard deviations show the dispersion of the answer marks on the answer lines. For example, delegates seem to be closer together in respect to their evaluation of the general role and past performance of the Secretariat than on the question of the voting procedures of the Security Council. It has already been pointed out, however, that delegate answer marks tend to range, for the most part, completely across the answer lines. The question can then be asked, "What kinds of delegates, in terms of their home states' characteristics, mark the "negative" and "static" sides of the answer lines and what kinds of delegates mark the "positive" and "dynamic" sides?

Predicting Delegate Attitudes. To answer the above question, it was decided to employ a "scattergun" approach and consider a large number of variables relating to national attributes. Thirty-four of the independent variables considered were taken from Banks and Textors' Cross Polity Survey. 10 These were: Size of 10 Banks and Textor, op. cit. Selection of the 34 variables from the total of 57 treated by Banks and Textor was based upon the possibility of constructing a scale with direction for each variable, although in some cases, it is a nominal one, i.e., religious homogeneity (two categories). Also considered was the relative absence of ambiguous codings for the responding delegations. Although many of the Banks and Textor variables are soft, i.e., partially or completely subjective, nevertheless it has been successfully demonstrated that they are amenable to factor analysis and the factors tend to agree, in some respects, with other analysis of state social, economic, and political variables. See Gregg and Banks, "Dimensions of Political Systems . . ." op. cit., p. 607. The preference for the Banks and Textor variables over "hard" data collections, particularly over the excellent data in Bruce Russett, et al. World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964), lies in the fact, as explained by Arthur S. Banks and Phillip M. Gregg, that, "Despite the focus implied by the title, [World Handbook] most of the data series in this collection are of limited political significance." Arthur S. Banks and Phillip M. Gregg, "Grouping Political Systems, Q Factor Analysis of A Cross Polity Survey," The American Behavioral Scientist, 9 (1965), p. 6. In addition, the World Handbook's value was limited simply because data was not included for many of the responding delegations. For example, the World Handbook only covers 41 cases in respect to the expenditure of central governments as a ratio to gross national product; 18 cases in respect to employment by the general government and public enterprises; 44 cases in respect to votes for the Communist Party as percentage of total votes: 74 cases in respect to death by domestic violence per one million, through the years 1950-1962; and, 88 Country, Population of Country, Population Density, Population Growth Rate, Agricultural Population, Gross National Product, Per Capita Gross National Product, International Financial Status, Economic Development Status, Literacy Rate, Freedom of the Press, Newspaper Circulation, Religious Homogeneity, Racial Heterogeneity, Linguistic Homogeneity, Date of Independence, Westernization, Political Modernization, Systems Style, Constitutional Status, Representative Character, Freedom of Group Opposition, Political Inculturation, Interest Articulation by Associational Groups, Interest Articulation by Institutional Groups, Interest Articulation by Non-Associational Groups, Interest Articulation by Parties, Party System, Political Leader ship, Status of Legislature, Status of Executive, Character of Bureaucracy, Participation by Military, Communist Bloc.

Fourteen additional variables derived from other resources¹¹ were: United Nations Delecases in respect to military personnel as a percentage of the total population. The N's for the Banks and Textor variables are, in most cases, considerably larger than this.

¹¹ United Nations delegate size was taken from Permanent Missions to the United Nations, op. cit. Time in the United Nations was scored by the number of years a respondent's state had been in the United Nations by December, 1965. Intergovernmental memberships were taken from Mosche Y. Sachs, ed., Worldmark Encyclopedia of the Nations, Vol. I (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), pp. 247-265. Alliance scores are explained above. Military size (total men under arms) was taken from Worldmark Encyclopedia of the Nations, op. cit., Vol. 2-5, and supplemented by 1966 Reader's Digest Almanac and Yearbook (New York: Reader's Digest Association, 1965). Distances from the US, USSR, and China were based on the great circle distances to closest possible points between states (states with mutual borders with the US, USSR, and China were coded 0). Percent urbanization was taken from Worldmark Encyclopedia of the Nations op. cit., Vol. 2-5. Ratio of people to schools was found by dividing a state's total number of schools into its total population. The number of schools was taken from UNESCO, Survey of World Education, Vol. 3 (New York: International Document Service, Columbia University Press, 1961) and total population was taken from International Yearbook and Statesmen's Who's Who, 1966 (London: Burkes Peerage). United Nations Emergency Force Pay and United Nations Pay were taken from House of Representatives Report, No. 1564, 89th Congress. Import and Export Figures to the gations Size, Time in the United Nations, IGO Memberships, Alliance, Size of Military, Distance from U.S., Distance from U.S.S.R., Distance from China, Percent of Urbanization, Ratio of People Per School, United Nations Emergency Force Pay, United Nations Pay, Import from U.S., Export to U.S.

After data collection was complete and the cooperative delegations had been identified, each participating delegation state was coded on the first thirty-four variables by ranks suggested by the Cross Polity Survey. For example, in respect to the variable of size, Banks and Textor give four gradations: "Very Large" (two million square miles and above). "Large" (300,000-1.9 million square miles), "Medium" (75,000-299,000 square miles), and "Small" (below 75,000 square miles). Thus, countries falling in the "Very Large" category were coded 1, those in the "Large" category 2, etc. Rank numbers were then assigned to each state on each variable following procedures similar to those outlined by Alker and Russett in World Politics in the General Assembly. 12 The rank numbers for the remaining variables were calculated from cardinal magnitude (i.e., the number of IGO memberships) except for "Alliance" which was originally coded 1 = U.S. Ally, 2 = Neutral, 3 = U.S.S.R. ally. Thus, the rank numbers on all variables ranged from 1 to 68 with average rank scores assigned in cases of ties.

Because of their large number and possible confusing interrelationships between them, it was decided to factor analyze the independent indices.¹³

United States were taken from 1965-66 issues of Overseas Business Reports (Washington: U.S. Printing Office).

¹² Hayward R. Alker, Jr., and Bruce M. Russett, World Politics in the General Assembly, (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1965), pp. 30-31.

13 The principal component solution was employed. Unities were placed in the principal diagonal of the correlation matrix and the factor matrix was rotated using Kaiser's varimax criterion. The minimum eigenvalue for which a factor was rotated was 1.0. See Harry H. Harmon, Modern Factor Analysis (Chicago: University of Chicago Press 1960), Chapter 9; Henry F. Kaiser, "The Varimax Criterion for Analytical Rotation in Factor Analysis" Psychometrica, 23 (1958), 187-200; Henry F. Kaiser "Computer Program for Varimax Rotation in Factor Analysis" Educational and Psychological Measurement 19 (1959), 413-420; Dean J. Clyde, Elliott M. Cramer, Factor analysis is generally considered a useful research tool because it can reduce a large number of variables to a smaller number with little loss of information. Factor analysis dispenses with a priori assumptions about what should be related to what and, instead, demonstrates what kinds of relationships are present in the data. Each factor, using methods explained below, has the desirable characteristic of being orthogonal to every other factor in the analysis. This means that "factor

Richard J. Sharin, Multivariate Statistical Programs (Coral Gables, Florida: University of Miami, 1966), pp. 15-19.

14 For applications of factor analysis in connection with United Nations voting see: Hayward R. Alker, Jr., and Bruce M. Russett, World Politics in the General Assembly, (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1965); Bruce M. Russett, "Discovering Voting Groups in the United Nations," this Review 60 (1966), 327-339; Hayward R. Alker, "Dimensions of Conflict in the General Assembly," this REVIEW, 58 (1964), 632-658. For other applications of factor analysis of interest, see: Bruce M. Russett, "Delineating International Regions," Carnegie-IDRC Joint Study Group on Measurement Problems, Paper No. G60, Indiana University, February, 1965; Bruce M. Russett, International Regions and International Integration (Chicago: Rand-McNally, forthcoming); Raymond D. Cattell, "The Dimensions of Cultural Patterns of Factorization of National Characters," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 44 (1959), 215-253; Raymond D. Cattell, H. Breul, and H. Parker Hartman, "An Attempt at a More Refined Definition of Cultural Dimensions of Syntality of Modern Nations," American Sociological Review, 17 (1951), 408-21; Rudolph J. Rummel, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations," General Systems, Yearbook of the Society for the Advancement of General Systems Theory, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1963; Brian J. L. Berry, "Basic Patterns of Economic Development," in Atlas of Economic Development (by Norton Ginsberg, Chicago, 1961) pp. 110-119; Arthur S. Banks and Phillip M. Gregg, "Grouping Political Systems, Q Factor Analysis of A Cross Polity Survey," The American Behavioral Scientist, 9 (1965), 3-6; Phillip M. Gregg and Arthur S. Banks, "Dimensions of Political Systems: Factoral Analysis of A Cross Polity Survey," this REVIEW, 59 (1965), 602-614; Raymond Tanter, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations, 1958-1960," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 10 (1966), 41-64; and R. J. Rummel, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within Nations, 1946-1959," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 10 (1966), 65-73.

scores" calculated from factor loadings on one factor have zero correlations with factor scores calculated from all other factors. Thus, confusing interrelationships between original variables are eliminated through the technique of factor analysis, and, when a particular factor dimension is being discussed, we know that it is a "unique dimension" which does not overlap with other dimensions. In short, factor analysis shows how variables are related to orthogonal linear dimensions cutting through the data and how many such dimensions are needed to account for the bulk of the original variance.

The 48 original variables under consideration reduced to 11 factors. The amount of variance explained by each factor and the variables loading above .30 are given in the following table.

TABLE 3. RESULTS OF FACTOR ANALYSIS

Factor I (Variance accounted for = 21.6%) (Development)

High Newspaper Circulation (.88) High Literacy Rate (.86) High Per Capita Gross National Product (.86) High Economic Development Status (.83) High Percent Urban (.83) Westernized (.83) Low Agricultural Population (.79)

15 Factor scores were calculated using the formula: $F = ZA (A'A)^{-1}$ where F is an $N \times m$ matrix of factor scores, Z is an N×n matrix of scores on the original variables in standard score form, A is an n×m matrix of factor coefficients (loadings) and N=subjects, n=variables and m = factors. See John L. Horn and Wilbur C. Miller, "Evidence on Problems in Estimating Common Factor Scores," Educational and Psychological Measurement, 26 (1966), 617-622, for the advantages of this formula over other possible formulas, such as: F = ZA (defined above) or F = ZB where B is an $n \times m$ matrix in which unity is substituted for each "salient" coefficient and zero is substituted for every other loading. The most obvious advantage of the formula employed in this study is that it produces truly orthogonal factor scores, whereas the other formulas may not. In this connection, a check correlating each set of factor scores with every other set of factor scores showed them to be truly orthogonal with correlations of .0. See also John L. Horn, "An Empirical Comparison of Methods for Estimating Factor Scores," Educational and Psychological Measurement, 25 (1965), 313-321, and Gene B. Glass and Thomas O. Maguire, "Abuses of Factor Scores," American Educational Research Journal, 3 (1966), 297-304.

Table 3 (Continued)

Negligible Interest Articulation by Non-Associational Groups (.78) Modern Bureaucracy (.77) Significant Interest Articulation by Associational Groups (.70) Politically Modern (.60) High Gross National Product (.55) High International Financial Status (.54) Old (.43) High Political Inculturation (.43) Large Military (.43) High United Nations Pay (.43) Low Ratio of People per School (.42) Linguistic Homogeneity (.40) Representative System (.40) Effective Legislature (.39) Many IGO Memberships (.38) Long Time in UN (.38) Significant Interest Articulation by Parties (.37) Low Distance from US (.34) Non-Communist (.30) Religious Homogeneity (.30) High United Nations Emergency Force Pay (.30)

Factor II (Variance accounted for = 16.7%) (Authoritarianism)

No Effective Constitution Limitations (.87) High Censorship (.87) Ineffective Legislature (.83) Opposition Groups Not Tolerated (.82) Not Representative System (.81) Strong Executive (.79) Elitist Political Leadership (.77) Participation by Military (.72) Significant Interest Articulation by Institutional Groups (.64) Negligible Interest Articulation by Associational Groups (.47) Mobilized System Style (.47) Communist Bloc (.41) Traditional Bureaucracy (.37) Communist Alliance (.31)

Factor III (Variance accounted for = 7.8%) (US Relations)

Large Import from US (.86) Large Export to US (.77) Allied With West (.72) Linguistic Homogeneity (.55) Religious Homogeneity (.43) Non-Communist (.42) Long Distance from USSR (.40) Long Time in UN (.32) High Population Growth Rate (.30)

Factor IV (Variance accounted for = 9.3%) (Bigness)

Big Population (.87) High International Financial Status (.73) Big Gross National Product (.72) Big Country (.67) Large Military (.66) Large United Nations Delegation Size (.59) High United Nations Pay (.53) Long Time in UN (.33) Significant Interest Articulation by Institutional Groups (.31) Politically Modern (.31) High Economic Development Status (.30) Many IGO Memberships (.30)

Factor V (Variance accounted for = 4.4%) (Party-Mobilization)

One Party System (.76) Mobilized System Style (.65) High Political Inculturation (.54) Negligible Interest Articulation by Parties (.35) Communist Bloc (.31)

Table 3 (Continued)

Factor VI (Variance accounted for = 3.6%)
(Density)

Low Population Density (.87) Big Country (.59)

Factor VII (Variance accounted for = 3.2%)
(Growth Rate)

High Population Growth Rate (.76) Non-Elitist Political Leadership (.33) Linguistic Heterogeneity (.32) Small IGO Memberships (.30)

Factor VIII (Variance accounted for -3%) (Racial)

Racial Heterogeneity (.80) Short Time in UN (.43)

Factor IX (Variance accounted for = 5.2%) (U.S. Distance)

Low Distance from U.S. (.75) Low Ratio of People per School (.58) Old (.47) Many IGO Memberships (.44) Politically Modern (.39) Long Time in UN (.44) Religious Homogeneity (.35) Non-Communist (.35)

Factor X (Variance accounted for = 3%) (UN Pay)

High United Nations Emergency Force Payment (.68) High United Nations Payment (.44) Limited Interest Articulation by Institutional Groups (.31)

Factor XI (Variance accounted for =4.4%) (Distance)

Long Distance from China (.81) Long Distance from USSR (.68) Low Political Inculturation (.37)

Those possessing the highest factor scores tend to possess the characteristics indicated, and those with low factor scores, the opposite characteristics. Thus, concerning the first factor dimension, a state with a high factor score tends¹⁶ to have high newspaper curculation, a high literacy rate, high per capita gross national product, high economic development status, a high degree of urbanization, a high degree of Westernization, a low agricultural population, and so forth. Variables load differently on the factor dimensions and, therefore, variable scores contribute differently to factor scores. Thus, in respect to "newspaper circulation," a score of 2.0 (standard score) moves a state further up the factor dimension than a score of 2.0 on the "status of legislature" variable. In terms of its overall features, the first factor might be christened "Development Factor," and the remaining possible names are given in Table 3.

¹⁶ The term "tends" must be emphasized because it is possible that a subject's very high score on one variable can "make up" for a deviation in the wrong direction on another variable. Nevertheless, an extensive visual check failed to reveal a single case where subjects with high factor scores on the factor dimensions did not have deviations on the means in the predicted "direction" on variables loading .30 or above on the factors.

The factor analysis, then, produced eleven predictors, each of which is orthogonal to the others. Any variance explained by one predictor, in a dependent variable, then, will not also be explained by another predictor. For example, if it is found that both the "Development" and "Authoritarianism" dimensions are related to one of the questionnaire variables, we know that both predictors have explanatory power and that the relationships are not the result of an interrelation between the predictors.

It was decided to rank all scores, both independent and dependent, and use the correlational technique of Spearman's rho to test for relationships. Ranks for Spearman's rho were assigned by treating each original score which is higher to be a higher rank number and by assigning average ranks in cases of ties between original scores. Thus, an original score sequence of 1, 2, 4, 4, 6 became 1, 2, 3.5, 3.5,5 as rank numbers. Table 4 shows the relationship between the predictors and the questionnaire data.

In Table 4 the characteristics of high scores have been indicated. Thus, in respect to the 17 The naming of factors is always arbitrary. Alker and Russett have argued, "Factors are not born with names but must be christened by their parents who may not be able to agree on what they should be called." Alker and Russett, World Politics in the General Assembly, op. cit., p. 36. In fact, "factor names" may fall short of describing all of the variables loading most heavily on the factor. A listing of the heaviest loadings, then, makes it clear which are the important tests involved in producing factor scores. Simply referring to factor dimensions by their "name," then, may not do complete justice to the actual loadings.

¹⁸ See Andrew R. Baggaley, Intermediate Correlational Methods (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1964), pp. 21–23. Once rank numbers were assigned, the Spearman correlational formula was employed for convenience. As Baggaley points out, the results of applying the Spearman formula to rank numbers is exactly the same as applying the Pearson formula to such numbers.

questionnaire, high scores in the first part of the table indicate dissatisfaction with the voting procedures of the listed organs and, in respect to the predictors, high scores indicate high development, highly authoritarian, and so forth.

Interpreting the correlations in these terms, the findings may be summarized as follows:

The higher a respondent's home state's score is on the "Development Factor," the stronger the respondent's:¹⁹

- satisfaction with the voting procedures of the Security Council;
- (2) dissatisfaction with the voting procedures of the General Assembly;
- satisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the Security Council, Economic and Social Council, and Secretariat;
- (4) dissatisfaction with the general role and past performance of the General Assembly, Economic and Social Council, Secretariat, and General Committee;
- (5) view that the General Assembly, International Court of Justice, General Committee, and Main Committees are decreasing in importance at present;
- (6) view that the General Assembly, Economic and Social Council, International Court of Justice, Secretariat, General Committee, and Main Committees will decrease in importance in the future;
- (7) wish to decrease the role and powers of the General Assembly, General Committee, and Main Committees;
- (8) view that changes are imporbable in the Charter membership arrangements of the General Assembly, Economic and Social Council, International Court of Justice, and Secretariat:
- (9) view that changes are improbable in the understandings and agreements to allocate seats and positions on the Economic and 19 The opposite relationships are, of course, also true. That is, the lower a respondent's home state score is on the "Development Factor," the stronger the respondent's dissatisfaction with the voting procedures of the Security Council. These generalizations may be stated in these terms because in almost all cases the answer marks ranged across the entire answer line. In those few cases where they did not, a statement such as "less satisfied," instead of "dissatisfied," is, of course, more technically true. In all cases, however, at least some of the respondents marked the "negative" or "static" sides of the answer lines (as indicated above).

TABLE 4. RELATION BETWEEN PREDICTORS AND QUESTIONNAIRE DATA.20

			REDATIO	TODA II
·		Factor I High Devel- opment	Factor II Author- itarian	Factor III Close U.S. Rela- tions	Factor IV Is Big	Factor V One Party Mobi- lized	Factor VI Low Den- sity	Facter VII High Growth Rate	Factor VIII Racial Heter- ogen- eity	Factor IX Low Distance from U.S.	Factor X U.N. Fay	Factor XI High Distance U.S.S.R. and China
Voting dissatis- faction	SC GA Ecosoc ICJ MC	34 .25 21 .06	28 06 10 .05 18	.29 .14 .02 .09 .11	21 .16 25 .09 02	.14 18 .22 .10	.02 04 14 .02 06	10 16 11 .05 09	.15 .02 .09 .10	03 52 26 35 33	27 14 03 05	.28 04 ,15 05 07
Character membership dissatis- faction	SC GA Ecosoc ICJ Sec	31 .14 27 07 36	29 17 14 15 .03	14 .07 .04 07	16 08 10 11 02	.27 07 .32 .39	.06 34 .06 .20	.03 03 .18 .33 .33	07 .20 04 .03 .13	08 18 .05 .10	12 07 11 07 .04	02 38 .02 16 22
Under- standings dissatis- faction	SC Ecosoc ICJ Sec GC MC	02 .04 05 .07 .11	07 .03 13 07 .12	04 11 .10 .15 17 23	09 .04 .04 .13 02	.45 .49 .34 .14 .24	17 17 .02 17 06 16	.11 .14 .27 .40 .13	.14 .13 .14 .17 .09	.13 .20 .22 .19 .09	21 22 10 04 26 30	08 12 05 06 23 29
General role and performance dissatisfac- tion	SC GA Esosoc ICJ Sec GC MC	.20 .42 .36 .22 .26 .32	25 07 12 02 .23 .04 04	.08 09 14 29 19 .02	05 .02 08 .12 .16 07 12	.22 .09 .21 .08 .33 .16	04 34 14 .02 09 38 30	.13 15 .05 .13 .09 11 04	.04 15 04 12 15 12 02	.32 09 07 .05 .13 .07 12	08 .12 .04 08 05 10	.06 07 18 29 16 12 15
Organs decreas- ing in importance at present	SC GA Esosoc ICJ Sec GC MC	09 .42 .22 .42 .19 .34	11 05 13 07 .03 26 22	.16 04 .14 03 .10 .10	31 .10 05 .17 05 .08 07	.18 34 02 .12 15 15 21	07 40 .03 21 34 38 39	.22 .06 .03 .09 02 .14 03	.07 06 11 05 .08 14 12	.28 .10 .03 12 03 .25	.14 .15 02 .09 .07 .08	21 .03 .12 25 21 07
Organs decreasing in impor- tance in the future	SC GA Ecosoc ICJ Sec GC MC	14 .59 .31 .29 .35 .44	16 13 .02 12 .11 17 15	.14 .02 07 16 .15 .02	.05 .16 .15 .15 .08 .19	07 22 15 .11 26 11 20	.05 20 .09 12 26 17 22	.14 24 16 09 10 10	.15 07 .21 .13 .14 18 11	.16 11 04 15 06 .07	02 .02 .04 06 17 05 07	14 .02 .10 25 25 .12 .15
Desire to decrease importance	SC GA Ecosoc ICJ Sec GC MC	14 .45 .21 07 .15 .38	25 04 .14 .14 .28 09 05	.11 11 12 08 .07 09 08	04 .11 .19 .15 .28 .21	.02 03 08 .03 17 .03 05	06 17 09 .16 20 13 17	14 13 11 18 10 21 21	.17 .12 .36 .23 .18 .03	05 15 19 15 06 03 03	03 08 21 .04 04 .03	.05 04 11 16 14 03 04
Improbable to change the member- ship ar- rangements	SC GA Ecosoc ICJ Sec	.12 .32 .27 .41 .35	11 20 .14 12 04	.18 04 .04 15 20	.27 .14 .81 .17 .27	30 19 12 .12 .08	.04 09 .14 09 09	16 05 11 07 08	.26 05 .07 18 11	.12 11 05 06 19	03 .07 04 .02 .05	07 .08 19 09 11
Improbable to change under- standings	SC Ecosoo ICJ SEC GC MC	.21 .34 .30 .25 .18	02 .08 13 10 07 09	.32 .25 08 .06 .06	20 .03 .12 .06 .10	26 16 .03 .05 .02 06	.02 07 02 08 09 04	14 18 13 24 03 04	03 03 24 27 17 24	10 28 17 10 04 06	.11 .22 .16 .13 .13	28 41 42 42 31 34

Social Council, International Court of Justice, Secretariat, and Main Committees.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "Authoritarianism Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- (1) satisfaction with the voting system of the Security Council:
- satisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the Security Council;
- (3) satisfaction with the general role and past performance of the Security Council;
- (4) view that the General Committee is increasing in importance at present;
- (5) desire to increase the role and performance of the Security Council;
- (6) desire to decrease the role and importance of the Secretariat.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "U.S. Relations Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- dissatisfaction with the voting procedures of the Security Council;
- (2) satisfaction with the role and performance of the International Court of Justice;
- (3) view that changes are imporbable in the understandings to allocate seats and positions on the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "Bigness Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- satisfaction with the voting system of the Economic and Social Council;
- (2) view that the Security Council is increasing in importance at present;
- (3) wish to decrease the importance of the Secretariat;
- (4) view that future changes in the Charter membership arrangements of the Security Council, Economic and Social Council, and Secretariat are improbable.

The higher a respondent's home state score

 20 All significant correlations have been underlined. Because N is the same in every case, all correlations greater than $\pm .25$ are significant at the .05 level or less, and all correlations $\pm .32$ or above are significant at the .01 level or less. The generalizations that follow, then, are based upon these levels of significance. That is, every relationship is significant either at the .05 level or less. If the exact level is of interest, then it may be ascertained by reference to the table to see whether the correlation lies between $\pm .25$ and $\pm .31$, or is greater than $\pm .32$.

is on the "Party-Mobilization Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- dissatisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the Security Council, Economic and Social Council, and International Court of Justice;
- (2) dissatisfaction with the understandings to allocate seats and positions on the Security Council, Economic and Social Council, and International Court of Justice;
- (3) dissatisfaction with the general role and past performance of the Secretariat;
- (4) view that the General Assembly is increasing in importance at present;
- (5) view that the Secretariat will increase in importance in the future;
- (6) view that changes in the Charter membership arrangements in the Security Council are probable;
- (7) view that changes in the understandings to allocate seats and positions on the Security Council are probable.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "Density Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- satisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the General Assembly;
- (2) satisfaction with the general role and performance of the General Assembly, General Committee, and Main Committees;
- (3) view that the General Assembly, Secretariat, General Committee, and Main Committees are increasing in importance at the present:
- (4) view that the Secretariat will be increasing in importance in the future.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "Growth Rate Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- dissatisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the International Court of Justice and the Secretariat;
- (2) dissatisfaction with the understandings and arrangements to allocate seats on the International Court of Justice and the Secretariat.

The higher a respondent's state score is on the "Racial Heterogeneity Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- desire to decrease the importance of the Economic and Social Council;
- (2) view that changes in the Charter membership arrangements of the Security Council are improbable;
- (3) view that changes are probable in the understandings and agreements to allocate seats and positions on the Secretariat.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "U.S. Distance Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- satisfaction with the voting systems of the General Assembly. Economic and Social Council, International Court of Justice, and Main Committees;
- dissatisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the Secretariat;
- (3) dissatisfaction with the general role and past performance of the Security Council;
- (4) view that the Security Council and General Committee are decreasing in importance at present;
- (5) view that changes are probable in the understandings and agreements to allocate seats and positions on the Economic and Social Council.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "UN Pay Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- satisfaction with the voting system of the Security Council;
- (2) satisfaction with the understandings and agreements to allocate seats and positions on the General Committee and Main Committees.

The higher a respondent's home state score is on the "Distance Factor," the stronger the respondent's:

- dissatisfaction with the voting procedures of the Security Council;
- (2) satisfaction with the Charter membership arrangements of the General Assembly;
- (3) satisfaction with the understandings and agreements to allocate seats and positions on the Main Committees;
- (4) satisfaction with the general role and past performance of the International Court of Justice;
- (5) view that the International Court of Justice is increasing in importance at present;
- (6) view that the International Court of Justice and Secretariat will be increasing in importance in the future;
- (7) view that changes are probable in the understandings and agreements to allocate seats and positions on the Security Council, Economic and Social Council, International Court of Justice, Secretariat, General Committee, and Main Committees.

If the predictors are listed in the order of the number of significant correlations produced and in terms of tendencies of high predictor scores to predict either "negative," "static," "positive," or "dynamic," questionnaire scores

TABLE 5. PREDICTORS AND ATTITUDES

Predictor	Nega- tive	Static	Posi- tive	Dy- namic
Development	18	8	4	0	=30
Distance	1	0	6	6	=13
Party-Mobilization	7	0	2	2	=11
U. S. Distance	4	1	4	0	= 9
Density	0	0	9	0	= 9
Authoritarianism	1	0	5	0	= 6
Bigness	1	3	2	0	= 6
U. S. Relations	1	2	1	0	⇒ 4
Growth Rate	4	0	0	0	= 4
UN Pay	0	0	3	0	= 3
Racial Heterogeneity	1	1	0	1	= 3
		*		_
	38	15	36	9	98

(see "validity" discussion above) the results may be tabulated as follows as in Table 5.

Table 5 shows that high economic development factor scores were associated 18 times with negative questionnaire scores.21 8 times with static questionnaire scores, 4 times with positive questionnaire scores, and 0 times with dynamic questionnaire scores—for a total of 30 significant associations. Low predictor factor scores, of course, predict the opposite kinds of questionnaire scores. Thus, low economic development scores were associated 18 times with positive questionnaire scores, 8 times with dynamic questionnaire scores, and so forth. If the proportion of correlations between the categories "positive-negative" and "dynamicstatic" are considered, then each tends to receive "its share" of significant correlations. Thus, "positive-negative" questions constituted 80% of the total questions and receive 76% of the total correlations, while "dynamicstatic" questions constituted 20% of the total questions and receive 24% of the correlations. Altogether, the 11 predictors produced 98 significant correlations. Because the analysis took place at the 5% level and 605 correlations were considered, however, 30 "significant" correlations could have been expected by chance. There are, therefore, 68 more "significant" correlations than expected by chance, if it is assumed that there is no "actual" relationship between the variables in the universe.

The analysis shows that the "Development Factor" is far and away the most important predictor. Trailing considerably behind it are dimensions such as "Distance," "Party-Mobilization," "Density," and "U.S. Distance." The analysis also shows that some predictors have hardly any explanatory power, particularly "Racial Heterogeneity" and "United Nations Pay."

²¹ Technically, of course, it is more proper to say that economic development scores have a positive correlation with questionnaire scores However, because high questionnaire scores are assumed to connote negative behavior, the analysis is facilitated by stating the relationships in this way.

In addition to importance, an interesting question arises as to the "purity" of the predictors. To make this analysis, the negative and static categories were lumped together and also the positive and dynamic categories. The "purity" (and importance) of a predictor were estimated by subtracting the number of positive and dynamic associations from the number of negative and static associations and expressing the resulting difference in absolute terms. Thus, if high predictor scores tend to associate fairly equally with both the negative/static category and the positive/dynamic category, the predictors' purity index should fall toward zero. Also, of course, the fewer correlations associated with a predictor, the lower will be its index. The scoring scheme, then, takes into account both purity and importance. That is, the larger the number of significant correlations made by the predictor and the greater the tendency for high predictor scores to be associated with either negative/static scores or positive/dynamic scores, the larger will be the predictor's index.

Table 6 shows the results of the analysis.

Again, Table 6 can be understood in terms of the kinds of responses associated with high factor scores. The analysis shows "high development" predicts negative/static questionnaire scores, "high distance" predicts positive/dynamic scores, and so on. The overall results can be expressed even more clearly, if presented in terms of lines symbolizing factor dimensions, and an indication is given of the kind of factor scores (high or low) that predict negative and/or static questionnaire scores. Again, the predictors are listed in order of their purity/importance index.

TABLE 6. "PURITY" OF THE PREDICTORS

(22 Negative and Static)
(11 Positive and Dynamic
(9 Positive and Dynamic
(4 Positive and Dynamic
(4 Negative and Static)
(3 Positive and Dynamic
(3 Negative and Static)
(2 Negative and Static)
(2 Negative and Static)
(1 Negative and Static)
(1 Negative and Static)

Table 7 may be read as follows: If a respondent's state is high on the "Development Factor" (highly developed) predict negative/static responses; if low on the "Distance Factor" (i.e., close to the USSR and China) predict negative/static responses, etc. It should be remembered, because the predictors are listed in order of their purity index, that the "Development Factor" had more total correlations in one direction than "Distance," "Distance" had more than "Density," "Density" had more than "Authoritarianism," and so forth.

Factor scores opposite those indicated in the table, of course, predict the opposite kinds of questionnaire scores. Thus, if a respondent's state is low on the "Development Factor" (underdeveloped) predict positive/dynamic responses; if high on the "Distance Factor" (i.e., far from the USSR and China) predict positive/dynamic responses, and so on. Table 4, of course, indicates the specific kinds of predictions that can be made in regard to particular areas and is the basis of these generalizations.

If just the three most important predictors are considered, frequent positive/dynamic delegate responses should be predicted for states that are underdeveloped, located away from USSR and China, i.e., in Africa or South America, which have a low population density. On the other hand, delegates from developed states, close to the USSR and China, i.e., in Europe, with a high population density, should tend to frequently give negative/static questionnaire responses. Generalizations beyond these first three predictors should be made with the utmost caution because of the rapid falling off of the purity-importance index and the knowledge that it is possible that a number of the correlations upon which these tables were built were due to random variation.

Literature about the United Nations has frequently indicated a basis for developed-underdeveloped attitudinal differences and also tends to emphasize a more positive outlook by the less developed. For example, A. F. Shihata argues, in connection with the International Court of Justice, that, "... the record shows that some new states have adopted an attitude more favorable to the Court than that adopted by many older nations." F. O. Wilcox sees various reasons why the "non-aligned nations" (most of which are underdeveloped) need the United Nations.²³ K. I.

²² Abraham F. I. Shihata, "The Attitude of New States Toward the International Court of Justice," International Organization, 14 (1965), p. 222.

²³ Francis O. Wilcox, UN and the Nonaligned from 1900 to the present. Despite our belief in their importance, it does not, however, include the infinite number of sub-national and extranational actors in world politics, territorial or otherwise. The list is so conceived as readily to accommodate most of the modifications in territory or status that can be anticipated in the decades immediately ahead. In addition to delineating such a population, we specify the general political-legal status of each entity, and the time period during which each such status was held. Finally, in order to make more efficient and more accurate the borrowing of data from one research enterprise to another, we propose a simple three-digit coding scheme keved to the major continental regions, which others might see fit to continue. In short, we offer here what might be called a "prominent solution"; while it may not represent the very peak of refinement, it nevertheless reflects what we consider a reasonable balance among a number of competing requirements, it is convenient for ready reference, and all of the data from both our projects are already stored in accord with this particular scheme. In order to maximize replicability and cumulativeness, we invite others to adopt it for their own investigations, and to advise us as to any errors or inconsistencies which may have escaped our successive and independent scrutinies.

As to the time span covered, we had originally hoped to go as far back as the Congress of Vienna, but soon settled upon 1900 as a reasonable point of origin. First of all, the amount of interest in nineteenth century data is quite limited, especially among those doing quantitative political research. This is, of course, partly due to the lack of much available data during that period, especially if one tries to go beyond the major Western powers. Secondly, the coding problem is markedly eased by the turn of the century, by which time the unification of Germany, Italy, and Russia had been completed, almost all of the Indian subcontinent had come under the British Raj, and Africa had been largely carved up by the colonial powers. An earlier starting date would not only have necessitated a dramatically longer list, but one with a far greater likelihood of error and ambiguity.

and the same holds true for the date of annexation, federation, or disunion. Our general rule was to use the politically effective date rather than that which reflected a declaration of independence or the mere signing of a treaty or convention. Thus, despite careful investigation and our preference for dates which are politically operational, there will certainly be room for disagreement on occasion, and there may even be discrepancies of more than a year or two.

Let us now summarize our selection and classification criteria. In order to compile an exhaustive list of the territorially based political units which are, have been since 1900, or are likely to become national political entities, we began by assembling a thoroughly undiscriminating card file including all units that might possibly qualify. This list (and subsequent information regarding the status of its entities) was based on the examination of nearly one hundred different gazetteers, yearbooks, atlases, diplomatic lists, and the like. (The list is, of course, too numerous and diverse to warrant reproduction here.) We then proceeded to refine the list as follows.

Leaving aside past or present political status for the moment, we first eliminated all entities whose population never exceeded 10.000 people.2 This avoided the almost impossible task of identifying the scores of island kingdoms and chiefdoms (most of which are now gone) as well as a number of politically esoteric enclaves. Almost no useful and accurate data could be expected to exist for them, and we assumed furthermore that such entities would be of little interest to most comparative and international politics scholars. At the same time, this relatively low population threshold permitted the inclusion of such modest "postage stamp" entities as Andorra, Monaco, and Liechtenstein; the only entity included whose population never met that figure is Vatican City, whose diplomatic role is sufficiently important to justify this exception. Naturally the user is free to raise the population threshold and thereby reduce the size of his universe.

Before going on to another set of deletions, we proceeded to ascertain the political status of each remaining entity, and the dates during analysis of the wide range of status conditions that might exist, and we therefore settled on a fairly gross, and only semi-operational, set of distinctions. Furthermore, any change in an entity's status which did not last for one month or more was not included. Thus, British Somaliland's two weeks of independence in 1960 as well as Rumania's brief and admittedly complete occupation in 1944 are not accounted for here. At any given time, an entity was classed as independent if it enjoyed some measure of diplomatic recognition as well as effective control over its own foreign affairs and armed forces.

If the entity did not satisfy the territorial and demographic, or diplomatic and political, requirements of "sovereign" independence, it was classified as dependent, under one of three relatively general categories. The first group embraces colonies and dependencies, characterized by a fairly durable status in which the entity exercised almost no control over its foreign affairs, armed forces, immigration, or trade. Originally, we attempted to differentiate between those entities which exercised no appreciable control over either their foreign affairs or their domestic affairs and those which enjoyed some degree of self-government at home while having no external sovereignty. But when it came to applying these criteria, we found it impossible to identify the cutting point on the domestic autonomy continuum. That is, many entities whose foreign policy was not essentially under their own control also turned out to suffer appreciable legal and political restraints on their domestic policy as well. Even when the colonial power which dominated the entity's foreign policy permitted a wide range of internal self-government, it often turned out that this "self-government" only applied to a small sector of the population. with little or no political power in the hands of the native population and a great deal of it in the hands of the non-indigenous military officer, civil servant, or colon. In just about every case, there was some form of visible or invisible veto invested in the foreign power or its local surrogates. Thus, even though one could devise a coding scheme which might operationalize the varying degrees of self-government, the effort did not seem justified for the purposes at hand. Some question still remains about Greenland and about the Caribbean territories of France and the Netherlands which might well have been coded as incorporated into the metropolitan country. Data for them still are separately reported in the U.N. Yearbooks, however, as "non-sovereign territories," so we have resolved ambiguities about their legal status by listing them separately here too.

In a second group we placed those entities whose dependent status was intended by the major powers to be fairly temporary. These are, of course, the mandate and trust territories whose gradual transition to independence was the moral and legal responsibility of the metropolitan power assigned to it by the League of Nations or the United Nations. Illustrative here are Tanganyika from 1922 to 1961 or Eritrea from 1945 to 1952. The distinctions made within this class by the League Covenant (Article 22) and the U.N. Charter (Article 77) did not seem worth specifying, given the purposes of this particular enterprise. It should also be noted that we have defined this class rather broadly, and include under it a number of other units whose administration was made a matter of international responsibility, such as Danzig and the Saar.

In a third and final group are those entities which had enjoyed independence until overrun and occupied by foreign military forces. If the nation at hand suffered only a partial occupation and it retained effective control over a viable (intuitively defined) sector of its population and territory, it was not classed as occupied. Thus, even though the Belgian government and its army was pushed into the relatively small Ypres-Nieuport sector during World War I, it remained in the independent classification. In World War II, on the other hand, the government went into exile and there were no effective Belgian fighting forces remaining on the continent or resisting the Axis overseas. Following this criterion, we also treated a nation as continuing in existence if an effective fighting force of 100,000 or more troops persisted in its struggle against the enemy elsewhere along the front, even if the home territory were completely overrun: Serbia during World War I is an example of such a case. Finally, even if not under the military government of a foreign power, if a nation's legitimate government went into exile, or was replaced by a puppet regime, the entity was treated as experiencing the occupied status.

Beyond these considerations of war-zone occupations, there are certain difficulties in classifying occupations which occurred outside of a major combat theater or in peace-time. It seemed unreasonable, for example, to try to differentiate between those nations whose independence is effectively limited by economic penetration or inclusion within another's

(Text continued on page 950)

NATIONAL POLITICAL UNITS IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

	Western Hemisphere (002-199)	Indep	endent	D	epende	nt	Part Larger	of Entity
Code Nó.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
002	United States of America	— ,
003	Alaska				1959	col	1959
004	Hawaii				1960/	$661	1960	- \
005	Virgin Islands			.		col		5
006	Puerto Rico			_		col:	10	1
010	Greenland					col	2542
011	Faeroe Islands					col
020	Canada	1920			1920	col
021	Newfoundland	1920	1933	1933	1920 1949	col col	1949
030	Bermuda					col
031	Bahamas			_		col
040	Cuba	1902			1902	col
041	Haiti	_	_	•				!
042	Dominican Republic	_	_				• ;
050	(West Indies Federation)			1958	1962	col
051	Jamaica	1962	_		1962	col	1958	1962
052	Trinidad and Tobago	1962	_		1962	col	1958	1962
053	Barbados	1966	_		1966	col	1958	1962
054	Dominica					col	1958	1962
055	Grenada					col	1958	1962
056	St. Lucia			.—		col	1958	1962
057	St. Vincent			_		· col	1958	1962
058	Antigua	·				col	1958	1962
059	Montserrat					col	1958	1962
060	St. Kitts—Nevis—Anguila				,	col	1958	1962

	Western Hemisphere (002–199)	Indep	endent	Γ	epende	nt		rt of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
065	Guadeloupe					col
066	Martinique					col
068	Netherlands Antilles					col
070	Mexico
080	British Honduras					col
090	Guatemala
091	Honduras		—
092	El Salvador		_
093	Nicaragua
094	Costa Rica		_
095	Panama	1903						1903
096	Panama Canal Zone			1903		col		1903
100	Colombia		_
101	Venezuela	_
110	Guyana [British Guiana]	1966			1966	col
115	Surinam [Dutch Guiana]			_	_	col
120	French Guiana					col
130	Ecuador		_
135	Peru
140	Brazil		_
145	Bolivia
150	Paraguay
155	Chile		_
160	Argentina
165	Uruguay

	Europe (200-399)	Indep	endent	D	epende	nt	Par Larger	t of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
200	United Kingdom		_
201	Isle of Man	-				col
202	Guernsey and dependencies					col		•
203	Jersey					col
205	Eire [Ireland]	1922	_					1922
210	Netherlands	1945	1940	1940	1945	occ
211	Belgium	1945	1940	1940	1945	occ
212	Luxembourg	1918	1914 1940	1914 1940	1918 1944	occ occ
220	France	1944	1942	1942	1944	oec
221	Monaco	1944	1942	1942	1944	occ
223	Liechtenstein
225	Switzerland
230	Spain	_						** * *
231	Gibraltar					col
232	Andorra	_
235	Portugal	_	_
255	West Germany/Germany	1949	1945	1945	1949	occ
256	Saar			1920 1945	1935 1947	man occ	1935	1920 1945
				1947	1957	col	1957	_

	Europe (200-399)	Indep	endent	Ι	epende	nt		rt of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
265	East Germany	1949		1945	1949	occ		1945
290	Poland	1919 1945	1939	1939	1945	occ		1919
291	Danzig			1920 1939	1939 1945	man occ	1945	1920 —
300	(Austria-Hungary)	_	1918
305	Austria	1918 1955	1938	1938	1955	occ		1918
310	Hungary	1918	-					1918
315	Czechoslovakia	1918 1945	1939	1939	1945	occ		1918
317	Slovakia	1939	1945				1945	1939
325	Italy
326	Trieste			1943 1947	1947 1954	occ man	1954	1947
328	Vatican City	- ,
331	San Marino	_
338	Malta	1964			1964	col
339	Albania	1912 1921 1944	1914 1939 —	1914 1939	1921 1944	occ		1912

	Europe (200-399)	Indepe	endent	D	epende	nt ·		rt of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
345	Yugoslavia/Serbia	1944	1941	1941	1944	occ
346	Bosnia			#	1908	occ	1908	,
347	Herzegovina				1908	occ	1908
348	Montenegro	_	1919				1919
350	Greece	1944.	1941	1941	1944	oce
351	Crete	·		grannopy	1913	occ	1913
352	Cyprus	1960			1960	col
355	Bulgaria	1908		Manager	1908	col
360	Rumania							-
365	U.S.S.R./Russia
366	Estonia	1918	1940				1940	1918
367	Latvia	1918	1940				1940	1918
368	Lithuania	1918	1940				1940	1918
369	Ukraine .	1918	1920	1941	1943	occ	1920	1918
370	Byelorussia			1941	1943	occ	_
375	Finland	1919						1919
380	Sweden		_

	Europe (200-399)	Indep	endent	D	epende	nt		rt of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
385	Norway	1905 1945	1940	1940	1945	oce		1905
390	Denmark	1945	1940	1940	1945	occ
395	Iceland .	1944			1944	col
	Africa (400–599)
400	Azores [Western Isles]					col
401	Madeira Isles					col
402	Cape Verde Islands					col
403	Sao Tome and Principe					col
404	Portuguese Guinea					col
410	Canary Islands					col
411	(Spanish Guinea)				1960	col
412	Rio Muni			1960		col		1960
413	Fernando Po			1960		col		1960
420	Gambia	1965			1965	col		,
430	(French West Africa)				1958	col
431	(Mali Federation)	6/60	8/60	1959	1960	col
432	Mali [Sudanese Republic]	1960	.		1960	col	1959	1960
433	Senegal	1960	_		1960	col	1959	1960
434	Dahomey	1960	_		1960	col

	Africa (400-599)	Indepe	endent	D	epende	nt		t of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
435	Mauritania	1960	and the state of t		1960	col
436	Niger	1960	*		1960	col
437	Ivory Coast	1960			1960	col
438	Guinea [French Guinea]	1958			1958	col
439	Upper Volta	1960		— ,	1960	col	4
450	Liberia		gallannah			THE PERSON AND THE PE
451	Sierra Leone	1961		-	1961	col
452	Ghana [Gold Coast]	1957	ab.cab.di		1957	col
460	(German Togoland)			 1916	1916 1922	col occ		•
461	Togo [French Togoland]	1960	,	1922	1960	man		1922
462	British Togoland (to Ghana)			1922	1956	man	1956	1922
470	(Kamerun)			 1916	1916 1919	col occ
471	Cameroun [French Cameroons]	1960		1919 1922	1922 1960	occ man		1919
472	British Cameroons (split between Cameroun & Nigeria)			1919 1922	1922 1961	occ man	1961	1919 —
475	Nigeria	1960			1960	col
480	(French Equatorial Africa)	-			1958	col

	Africa (400–599)	Indep	endent	D	epende	nt		rt of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	· to
481	Gabon	1960		_	1960	col		1960
482	Central African Republic	1960		_	1960	col		1960
483	Chad	1960		_	1960	col		1960
484	Congo (Brazzaville) [French Congo]	1960		_	1960	col		1960
490	Congo (Kinshasa) [Belgian Congo]	1960			1960	col
500	Uganda	1962			1962	col
501	Kenya	1963			1963	col		-
510	Tanzania/Tanganyika/German East Africa	1961		1916 1922	1916 1922 1961	col occ man
511	Zanzibar	1963	1964		1963	col .	1964
515	(Ruanda-Urundi)			1922	1962	man		1922
516	Burundi	1962						1962
517	Rwanda	1962					-	1962
520	Somalia/Italian Somaliland	1960		1941 1950	1941 1950 1960	col occ man
521	British Somaliland				1960	col	1960
522	French Somaliland			_		col
530	Ethiopia [Abyssinia]	1941	1936 —	1936	1941	occ

	Africa (400–599)	Indep	endent	Ι	Depende	nt		rt of r Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
531	Eritrea			 1941	1941 1945	col occ	1952
540	Angola				_	col
541	Mozambique					col
550	(Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland)			1953	1964	col
551	Zambia [Northern Rhodesia]	1964			1964	col	1953	1964
552	Rhodesia [Southern Rhodesia]					col	1953	1964
553	Malawi [Nyasaland]	1964			1964	col	1953	1964
560	South Africa	1920	*	1903	1920	col		•
561	Cape Colony				1910	col	1910
562	Natal .			_	1910	col	1910
563	Transvaal		1903	1903	1910	col	1910
564	Orange Free State/Orange River Col.		1900	1900	1910	col	1910)
565	South West Africa [German West Africa]			 1915 1922	1915 1922 —	col occ man
570	Lesotho [Basutoland]	1966	gravenský		1966	col
571	Botswana [Bechuanaland]	1966	*		1966	col
572	Swaziland ,			_		col
580	Malagasy [Madagascar]	1960	 	_	1960	col

	Africa (400-599)	Indepe	endent	, D	epende	nt	Par Larger
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
581	Comoro Islands			1947		col	_	1947
585	Reunion					col
590	Mauritius	1968	·		1968	col
591	Seychelles					col
	Middle East (600–699)				-
600	Могоссо	1956	1911	1911	1956	col
- 601	Tangier			1923 1940 1945	1940 1945 1956	man occ man	1956	1923
602	Spanish Morocco			1912	1956	col	1956	1912
605	Ifni			1934		col		1934
606	Spanish North African Presidios (incl.: Alhucemas, Ceuta, Chafarinas, Me- lilla, and Penon de Velez)					col
609	Spanish Sahara				_	col
615	Algeria	1962			1962	col
616	Tunisia	1956			1956	col
620	Libya/Tripolitania, Cyrenaica, Fezzan	1952		1912 1942 1946	1942 1946 1952	col occ man		1912
625	Sudan [Anglo-Egyptian]	1956			1956	col
630	Iran [Persia]	_

	Middle East (600–699)	Middle East (600-699) Independent				Dependent
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
640	Turkey/Ottoman Empire
645	Iraq [Mesopotamia]	1932		1917 1920	1920 1932	occ man		1917
650	(United Arab Republic)	1958	1961				-
651	United Arab Republic [Egypt]	1922 1961	1958		1922	col	1958	1961
652	Syria	1946 1961	1958	1918 1923	1923 1946	occ man	1958	1918 1961
660	Lebanon	1946		1918 1923	1923 1946	occ man		1918
663	Jordan [Transjordan]	1946	Accounts	1918 1923	1923 1946	occ man		1918
666	Israel [Palestine]	1948	Marine Ma	1918 1923	1923 1948	occ man		1918
670	Saudi Arabia/Nedj	1902			1902	occ	The state of the s
671	Hejaz Sultanate	1919	1926				1926	1919
672	Asir	1914	1926	1926	1914 1930	occ col	1930
673	Al Hasa				1913	occ	1913

	Middle East (600–699)	Indep	endent	D	epende	nt		t of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
674	· Jabal Shammar		1921				1921
678	Yemen	1918					-	1918
680	People's Republic of Southern Yemen [Federation of South Arabia/Aden Colony]	1967			1967	col
681	Aden Protectorate			— 1915 1918	1915 1918 1963	eol occ col	1963
690	Kuwait	1961	A	_	1961	col		,
692	Bahrain					col
694	Qatar			_		col
696	Trucial Oman States					col
698	Muscat and Oman	-
	Asia (700-899)
700	Afghanistan	_
710	People's Republic of China/China	_
711	Manchukuo	1932	1945				1945	1932
712	Mongolian People's Republic	1921						1921
713	Republic of China [Taiwan, Formosa]	1949	p					1949
720	Hong Kong			_		col
721	Масао			_		col
730	(Korea) [Chosen]		1905	1945	1948	occ	1905	1945
731	North Korea	1948						·

	Asia (700–899)	Indepe	endent	D	epende	nt	Part of Larger Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
732	South Korea	1948
735	Far Eastern Republic (to U.S.S.R.)	1920	1922				1922	1920
740	Japan	1952	1945	1945	1952	occ
741	Ryukyu Islands			1945 1951	1951 —	occ col		1945
750	India	1947			1947	col
751	French India (incl.: Pondicherry)				1954	col	1954
752	Portuguese India (incl.: Goa, Diu, and Daman)			1961	1961 1962	col	1962
760	Bhutan					col		-
761	Sikkim .				_	col
770	Pakistan	1947				-		1947
775	Burma	1948	No Annabasia	1937 1942 1945	1942 1945 1948	col occ col		1937
780	Ceylon	1948	abornos y		1948	col
781	Maldive Islands	1965			1965	col
790	Nepal	_
800	Thailand [Siam]	_
810	(Indochina)				1949 1945	col occ

	Asia (700-899)		Independent		Dependent			t of Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
811	Cambodia	1953		1949	1953	col		1949
812	Laos	1954		1949	1954	col		1949
815	(Vietnam)			1949	1954	col		1949
816	North Vietnam	1954	numbers.
817	South Vietnam	1954		_
820	Malaysia/Federation of Malaya [Malayan Union]	1957	*	1946	1957	col
821	Federated Malay States		,	1942 1945	1942 1945 1946	col occ col	1946
822	Unfederated Malay States (incl.: Johore, Kedah, Kelantan, Perlis, Trengganu)			1942 1945	1942 1945 1946	col occ col	1946
823	Sabah [North Borneo]			 1942 1945	1942 1945 1963	col occ col	1963
824	Sarawak			 1941 1945	1941 1945 1963	col occ col	1963
827	(Straits Settlement) (incl.: Penang and Malacca)			— 1942 1945	1942 1945 1946	col occ col	1946
830	Singapore	1965		1946	1963	col	1963	1946 1965
835	Brunei				1941 1945 —	col occ col

	Asia (700–899)	Indepe	endent	Dependent			Part of Larger Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
840	Philippines	1946		 1942 1945	1942 1945 1946	col occ col		``
850	Indonesia [Netherlands East Indies]	1949		_	1949	col
851	West Irian [Netherlands New Guinea]			1942 1945 1962	1942 1945 1962	col occ col man
860	Portuguese Timor			_		col
	Oceania (900-999)
900	Australia	1920		1901	1920	col
901	New South Wales			_	1901	col	1901	-
902	Western Australia			_	1901	col	1901	******
903	South Australia			_	1901	col	1901	SALARANT
904	Victoria				1901	col	1901	ggennak
905	Queensland				1901	col	1901	4000004
906	Tasmania				1901	col	1901
910	Papua and New Guinea			1946		man
911	Papua	-				col	1946
912	New Guinea [German New Guinea]			— 1914 1921	1914 1921 —	col occ man	1946	Parasadh.
920	New Zealand	1920			1920	col
925	Cook Islands					col

	Oceania (900–999)	Indep	endent	Dependent			Part of Larger Entity
Code No.	Name	from	to	from	to	type	from	to
930	New Caledonia					col
935	New Hebrides					col
940	Solomon Islands					col
945	Gilbert and Ellice Islands					col	_
950	Fiji Islands					col
955	Tonga Islands [Friendly Islands]					col
960	French Polynesia [Oceania]					col
980	U. S. Pacific Trust Territories (incl.: Caroline, Marshall, and Mariana Islands)			1914 1920 1944 1947	1914 1920 1944 1947	col occ man occ man
985	Guam			1941 1944	1941 1944 —	col occ col
990	Western Samoa	1962		1914 1920	1914 1920 1962	col occ man
991	American Samoa				_	col

(Text continued from page. 934)

sphere of influence on the one hand, and those similarly constrained by partial military occupation, on the other. For example, even though U.S. Marines remained in Haiti, Nicaragua, and the Dominican Republic during much of the period between the Spanish-American War and the mid-Thirties in order to establish or buttress friendly regimes, these governments cannot be thought of as fully subjugated and their areas colonized. As a matter of fact, these three nations continued to enjoy diplomatic relations with most of the international system's members. Moreover, the fact that Guatemala and Honduras, for example, were not occupied need not suggest that they were any more independent than those Caribbean states which were partially occupied. Conceivably, these two nations were sufficiently docile not to require a military presence. Among other temporary invasions or occupations which were not sufficiently dominant or permanent to justify reclassification of the object nation were those of Iran from 1941 to 1946, Lebanon in 1958, and the Congo from 1960 to 1963.

A special word is also necessary in regard to the status of certain British Commonwealth members. After considerable indecision (associated with our search for a finer discrimination among dependent entities) we settled on 1920 as the date marking the effective independence of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. First of all, they participated in the Versailles Conference in a far from servile role and were subsequently admitted to membership in the League. Second, even though they did not establish normal diplomatic relations with other nations until well after London formally acknowledged their independence via the 1931 Statute of Westminster, and even though the Crown continued to be represented by Governors-General, the Imperial Conference legitimized, as early as 1926, what had already been the case in fact, and recognized them with England as "autonomous communities...equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another..." Furthermore, Canada had consummated several treaties with the U.S. after 1923, exchanged missions with Washington in 1926, assumed a seat on the League of Nations Council in 1927, and established diplomatic relations with France and Japan in 1928.

Once the list of dependent entities with the requisite 10,000 population was established, it was pared down to exclude all those dependencies which are geographically contiguous to (or immediately off-shore) the metropolitan nation or another dependency which was itself contiguous to the metropolitan nation. (The Isle of Man, Guernsey, and Jersey, for which data are reported separately in the U.N. Yearbooks, were retained.) This exclusion merely recognized the impossibility of drawing a consistently valid and reliable distinction between component parts of various federations or unions and contiguous dependent territories. By the same token, we also excluded territories transferred from one contiguous nation to another without an intervening period of relative autonomy.

With the two basic classes of entity (independent or dependent) identified, the lists were recombined. The three types of dependency are indicated by "col" for colony, "man" for mandate, and "occ" for occupied.

The next problems were those of fission and fusion, including a change of name, and these were handled as follows:

- (a) Where the name of an entity has been changed, we use the most recent one, and in cases of possible confusion add the earlier name in brackets; e.g., Iran [Persia].
- (b) A larger entity which subsequently became divided into separate entities has its original name in parentheses; e.g., (French Equatorial Africa). Its present-day components are listed immediately below. In those cases in which several entities merged for a while and then split apart again, the combined entity's name is shown in parentheses and the original components are listed below, indicating their present separate status, e.g., (Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland), with Zambia [Northern Rhodesia], Rhodesia [Southern Rhodesia], and Malawi [Nyasaland].

- (c) Where there has been either merger or disunion around a dominant "core" territory, the present name of the core unit is used and both the core and the subsequent unit receive the same code number; e.g., Saudi Arabia/Nejd, or West Germany/Germany.
- (d) A larger entity which split temporarily but subsequently returned to the earlier boundaries is listed in its present status, with the peripheral entity indented below; e.g., Czechoslovakia with Slovakia below.
- (e) Smaller entities which subsequently merged into a larger one are indented one space in, under the larger one's listing; e.g., Alaska and Hawaii under the United States.

Thus, the indentation is used as a visual convenience for those who will be gathering highly contemporary data, and indicates that the indented unit is, at press time, part of a larger entity, but had been in the past an administratively separate unit. If a unit never experienced a particular status, no dates at all are entered alongside it under that status column; a dash under the "from" column means that such status existed as of 1900, and a dash under the "to" column means that the status continues as of date of publication.

(EDITOR'S NOTE: For comments on this article and its list of national political units, see Communications to the Editor, pp. 952-955.)

COMMUNICATIONS

TO THE EDITOR:

A central task in applying systems analysis is to enumerate all actors within a particular arena, since the notion of "system" focuses attention upon interrelationships between parts of a whole. Because "National Political Units in the 20th Century" is the most comprehensive international census to appear so far, I am sure that members of the profession will be extremely indebted to Russett, Singer, and Small for years to come. But since all of the authors have conducted empirical investigations using lists based upon different criteria, further discussion appears warranted in the interest of demonstrating how to utilize the list in practice.

The criteria need to be examined more carefully. The obvious focus in the present enumeration is on whether a particular unit, in classical "political-legal" terms, may be classified as "independent" or "dependent." An exclusive emphasis on "political-legal" aspects of politics has of course long since been abandoned within political science; yet until publication of the Russett-Singer-Small list there was no classification of international actors relevant to the age-old concern for sovereign status. A study on the control of epidemics, however, would be incomplete without discussing the U.N.; international economists treat cartels and regional common markets; students of Southeast Asian military activity can hardly avoid including the Vietcong. In short, the criterion of legal status will not be satisfactory for all studies that are international and crossnational in scope. Different criteria will yield different lists, but to draw up all possible additional lists would be a most formidable task, one that the authors wisely have sidestepped. The question of whether the authors' formal criteria are preferable to behavioral ones, nevertheless, will be reraised as further efforts emerge.

A mere list of international actors, hence, will develop systems theory only if a type of system is specified; and, having defined such a whole, deductively derived criteria will serve the function of identifying members of a system. To illustrate, one could scarcely conceive of estimating "stability" of bipolar world power distributions without providing a list of militarily autonomous members which confront one another on strategic-security issues. In structuring research to answer this question, the smaller units reported by Russett, Singer, and Small will be nonmembers of such systems. But quite different members would qualify: The Pathet Lao, Vietminh, Greek Communists (1946-1949), Yugoslav Partisans, and Falangists certainly have been independent in a military sense. Nevertheless, in compiling just this sort of list of late,2 I am convinced that the present list, however insufficient by itself to frame particular behavioral studies with specific data requirements, is so standardized as to constitute an essential initial source to consult. Readers, no less than are the compilers themselves, should be aware of biases built into any such enumeration.

¹ J. David Singer and Melvin Small, "The Composition and Status Ordering of the International System," World Politics, XVIII (January, 1966), 236-82, is superseded by the present list.

MICHAEL HAAS

University of Hawaii

TO THE EDITOR:

At first sight, this article ["National Political Units in the Twentieth Century," by Bruce M. Russett, J. David Singer and Melvin Small] appears to ask a simple, straightforward question capable of a routine answer: "what are the political entities whose attributes and relationships must concern us?" The authors themselves do not attach undue importance to this problem and emphatically aver that in their opinion "this is hardly the most pressing issue facing our two fields" (of international relations and comparative politics). Indeed they think it can be solved essentially by the application of common sense and by consulting standard works of reference.

A cursory glance makes it clear however that the list falls somewhat short of its avowed promise to introduce "standardization" in the enumeration of political entities. Our purpose here is to argue that this failing is attributable to the absence of an adequate theoretical basis.

The authors offer us "a population of ... national or quasi-national entities" and we take this to be a population of states, actual or potential. For even though they studiously avoid applying such familiar if variously interpreted terms as "state" or "political system," their consistent reference to "national" units does in fact amount to using an adjectival form of the term "state" (confirming the identity political entity = national state previously established by Singer and Small in World Politics January 1966 page 245).

Michael Haas, "International Subsystems," paper prepared for presentation at the Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, Washington, D. C., September, 1968; Haas, International Conflict (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, forthcoming), Appendix D.

Hence we take this to be a list of what Russet, Singer and Small should call nation-states, even though they shy away from the word. We find the list unsatisfactory because it includes entities which on no reasonable account can be called states, either actual or likely, such as Alaska, Ifni, Gibraltar, Trieste, Danzig, Andorra, the Panama Canal Zone, San Tome and Principe, and excludes others which could also be judged to have been states or likely to become states, such as Tibet, Quebec, Kashmir, Biafra and why not, after all, Scotland, the Basque Country, Nagaland, the Kurdish Republic and so many others. In any event, how do the authors assess the likelihood of the emergence of a new state? Provided our threshold of likelihood is appropriately low, the number of candidates for statehood is, of course, extremely large. For instance, all the world's federal units, and not only Alaska and Quebec, might be looked upon as potential states. And so might all "agencies or bodies having an organized existence, governmental character and substantial autonomy: (this is the useful definition of a "governmental unit" adopted by the United States Statistical Abstract). The United States had, in 1962, 4,645 such units the population of each one of which exceeded 10,000 and all of which, we would hazard to guess, were more important than Ifni (Abstract for 1967 p. 414: this includes states, counties, municipalities and townships). That, of course, is still not all: for likely states might arise not only by splintering or fission (of which process the colonial revolution is the contemporary exemplar and the only one the standardized list seems concerned with) but also by amalgamation or fusion e.g. the European Economic Community, or the United States of Central America. The moral of all this is that a list of potential national-states is plainly impracticable without an explicit theory for the universe of which they are a part; anything else can be no more than a fusillade in the dark.

So much for potential or likely states; but what about actual or real, observable states? At the source of the difficulties confronting Russett, Singer and Small is lack of clarity about the criteria used to establish the existence of a state: namely confusion between subjective (participants') and objective (observers') criteria of statehood. Intuitively, the important criteria would seem to be subjective. that is those which participants in the social process themselves regard as significant. Thus in respect of statehood we would ask how do we know that participants in interstate relations treat some entities as states and not others? We would inquire into their perceptions in these matters, and also into their practices. and would soon notice that "recognition," a well-understood diplomatic institution, is a key phenomenon here and that it has close links with the network of diplomatic representation and, more recently, with membership in international organizations. Broadly, entities recognized as members by other entities and joined together in a global network would constitute a world system. The system could be a club of sovereigns, or an association of organizations, partly formalized e.g. as the United Nations, not necessarily a closed-circuit association, but possibly an open-ended one. In the pure nationstate system statehood amounts to membership in such a circuit, and the criteria for judging whether an entity does or does not belong to the circuit are the criteria of statehood. (Conversely, of course when the system changes its nature and its structure, the characteristics and the relationships of the member units change too. Yet the authors proceed on the assumption that the world political system has continued unchanged for the past 70 years.)

Singer and Small imaginatively applied the subjective criterion of "recognition" in their earlier study (ibid., pp. 246-9) but have failed to carry it through in this latest work. But even in their earlier study they confused the matter further by adding to this subjective standard (a state is a state if it is so regarded by other states) an extraneously objective one, in the shape of a population-exclusion factor. They in effect also said: a state is a state only if the population it controls exceeds 500,000. In their latest work they have lowered their sights considerably but still insist that a state cannot be (the Vatican excepted) unless its population exceeds 10,000. This is unconvincing: a state is a state irrespective of the population it controls. Population size describes no more than an attribute of a state (e.g. its "importance") but does not bear upon its existence.

The authors introduce a second objective criterion, that of independence, interpreted as control over territory and absence of occupation or of dependent status. Hence a state occupied by foreign (but hostile) troops, such as Belgium in World War II (surely also in World War I) on their reckoning was not a state in the period 1940–4. This again flies in the face of common sense. Of course, Belgium was under hostile occupation, but it also had a government in exile (as it did in the First World War), continued to exercise authority in the Belgian Congo and retained recognition by numerous other states; hence, conclusively, remained in existence. Civil war regimes present similar difficulties. Independence, in any event, is a treacherous concept hardly susceptible to an either-or treatment. More promising would be a search for measures of "degrees of autonomy." Pending the development of such measures the use of "independence" as an objective criterion of political status should preferably be discontinued.

Even though conventional wisdom points the other way there are thus significant grounds for doubting that either population size or independence seen as territorial control can serve as objective standards of statehood. The essential character of states resides in their organizational features: states are first and foremost organizations of varying degrees of complexity and formality, they are organizations of a governmental character (hence concerned with order, use and control of violence and incidentally with a host of other functions) and they are relatively autonomous organizations. In this conceptualization we thus follow the definition used for the Statistical Abstract. As all organizations, states are, of course, oriented to populations, but states are not to be confused with populations, nor with any particular type of control over populations. States, too, are oriented to a territory but this is not to say that a piece of territory such as Ifni (and what happened to Antarctica?) does by itself constitute a state. Nor need we base our listing upon the supposition that in respect of a certain territory one particular political entity must always exercise a monopoly of jurisdiction. This condition certainly does not apply in federal and other complex states, characterized by a multiplicity of overlapping jurisdictions; it ignores international, and regional and functional organizations at all levels and generally presents a superficial and in fact misleading picture of political life. The game of dividing the world's surface into a number of mutually exclusive territorial entities may be a fascinating one, but belongs to "Monopoly" and not to political science.

An inventory of states thus represents, by all acounts, a formidable problem, amounting in some respects to a global census of political entities. But, depending on the criteria we choose, we could construct at least three lists to cover the problems and the period of the article under discussion.

(1) A historical list for the pre-1945 period: a complex arrangement taking note of the fact that the Western states-system of that period was in large part still imperial, hence also to a great extent traditional, hierarchical and nonnational. This would be, of course, a subjective list based on the Western point of view, but since the Western system did not at that time completely cover the earth, residual parts of non-Western political systems in Asia, Africa, and even in the Americas would have to be separately accounted for.

(2) The contemporary universal nation-state system is essentially a post-1945 phenomenon, with a new structure and new membership criteria; thus with reference to these latter criteria all its actual participants could be listed on a subjective basis of who recognized whom as what (without troubling about such extraneous data as population limits and territorial control). This could give us the composition of the system as seen by the members themselves and it should be a complete accounting. A simple beginning and the ideal basis for such an enterprise is membership of the United Nations (surprisingly the authors do not use it at all); additions could then be made to such a list only on the basis of criteria of subjective recognition, as evidenced by diplomatic representation, political contact, full or associate membership in international organizations, etc. The United Nations Organization is itself, of course, a member of that changing system and so are increasing numbers of other organizations, such as the EEC and the OAU, if once again we apply criteria of subjective acceptance.

(3) Finally we could attempt the staggering, but stimulating tack suggested by the question: what are the entities which politically shape a world system? In the modern world the scope of such an inquiry is tremendous and would include a great deal besides states, for the number of autonomous political authorities alone runs into the tens of thousands, and that of other politically important organizations could easily be of a similar order. Yet this, precisely, is the universe of political science, and it is here that objective criteria of exclusion could help greatly in simplifying our work. For organizational dimensions, as measured by size of the budget, number of personnel. geographical scope of operations, would help us to distinguish between entities whose actions do and do not have significant, i.e. global repercussions. Yet other criteria could also be thought of but whatever they are we would have to conclude that for the contemporary world system such a list should feature not only the United States and say, Dahomey, but also the State of California, the Royal Dutch-Shell Petroleum Company, the Ford Foundation, the World Bank and the Roman Catholic Church. This would bring home the fact that the world abounds with politically significant entities about which we know little, confined as we are by the theoretical perspectives of the nation-state system.

To conclude: a seemingly innocuous question has led us into one of the crucial problems of contemporary political science. If the information assembled by Russett, Singer and Small is intended to serve only as a check list against which certain statistics (e.g. mortality rates or election results) may be conveniently tabulated it would (despite gaps) have utility but it will require considerable academic caution. If it is, on the other hand, to present basic political data and an authoritative definition of the universe whose attributes and relationships we are to study, it must be judged inadequate.

George Modelski
University of Washington

JEAN-LUC VELLUT Université Lovanium (Kinshasa)

TO THE EDITOR:

Given the frequency with which authors chide their critics for attacking a work on grounds other than those selected by the authors, one might expect that critics would become more cautious. Alas, they do not. We stated our objective, our criteria, and the limitations. We intended neither an analysis of "the essential character" of statehood, a theoretical diagnosis of the global system, nor an exhaustive listing of all government units in the world, past and future.

We claim to do nothing more than offer a prominent solution to the need for a defined population, with standard code-numbers, of "territorially based political units" of a "national or quasinational" nature, to serve comparative and international politics scholars who might want to compare or generalize about, "such entities, or a sample thereof, from 1900 to the present." At no point do we even suggest that this is a list of states, nor of all relevant actors in world politics. In response to Haas's original communication, we explicitly declared that "despite our belief in their importance, it (the list) does not, however, include the infinite number of sub-national and extra-national actors in world politics, territorial or otherwise." In earlier papers each of us has manifested his awareness of that importance; most recent is Singer's "The Global System and its Sub-Systems" in the Rosenau volume on national and international linkages. Had our critics taken our original language seriously or thought to check with us before publishing their critique, there would have been no doubt as to our intention here.

As to other Modelski-Vellut complaints, there is again the problem of careless reading. (1) In their earlier listing Singer and Small made no pretence of identifying all states since 1815; rather they sought to define a considerably smaller population embracing only "nation-members of the international system" and made quite clear their criteria of inclusion. (2) At no point do we suggest that Belgium was not a state from 1940 to 1944; we merely say (at some length in the text) that it was not an active and independent member of the international system during that period. (3) We left unused code numbers throughout the list to permit the addition of new entities, without trying to predict which particular ones (Quebec, Biafra, or Delaware) might emerge, and anticipated a supplementary two-digit code for those who need sub-national distinctions. (4) Since, as Modelski and Vellut admit, we did not call our entities "nation-states" we need not rebut the charge that we proceeded "on the assumption that the states system has continued unchanged for the past 70 years." Anyone who wants separate listings for before and after World War II might begin with our compilation, with its dates. As we say at two points, one may always select a sub-set from a defined population by modifying the criteria used in the original definition.

We fully agree that other criteria might better suit particular theoretical interests, but remain persuaded that our list will be useful to many scholars in several disciplines. Nor do we doubt the potential value of a standardized listing of other types of social entities in the global system, and we will welcome one compiled by any of our critics. If Modelski and Vellut also care to list all past and present national units having fewer than 10,000 people, or all the sub-national "governmental units" in the world, beginning with the 4,645 in the United States, we are sure they will find the exercise an engaging one.

Bruce M. Russett

Yale University

DAVID J. SINGER

The University of Michigan

MELVIN SMALL

Wayne State University

TO THE EDITOR:

In a research note in the March issue of this Review ("A Theorem about Voting"), Thomas Casstevens asserts as a theorem and then attempts to prove the following proposition: in a single-member district using the simple-majority single-ballot system of election, a rational voter will always vote for the candidate he most prefers.

The validity of this proposition is, of course, far from obvious, when applied to a multi-party system: in particular, if some voter prefers candidate A to B and B to C, and if candidate A has little chance of winning, while B and C are running evenly, then one might suppose that elementary strategic considerations would lead such a voter to cast his ballot for B, rather than waste it upon A. Casstevens' proposition, however, asserts that such strategic considerations will never arise, which if true would be both surprising and disturbing.

In fact, however, the proposition is not true. The proof is technically incorrect because of the treatment of ties, but the more fundamental difficulty is that the proof is essentially irrelevant to the theorem as stated, because of its dependence upon an unjustifiable "reduction postulate." It may be worthwhile to elaborate briefly on these points.

If there are more than two candidates and a finite number of voters, the probability of a tie in general will not be zero. The fact that it may be small is essentially irrelevant, since the proof depends upon showing that if a voter switches from one candidate to another, the resulting decrease in the probability of the first candidate winning must precisely equal (in magnitude) the increase in the probability that the second candidate will. Once the possibility of ties is admitted, however, such a switch in votes will in general also affect the probability of a tie (perhaps only slightly), so that exact equality will no longer hold and the result will not follow. (It is true, of course, that if the number of voters is infinite then the probability of a tie can be zero, as assumed; in that case, however, the contribution of any single vote to the outcome is also zero, which contradicts another of the basic assumptions of the proof.)

The more fundamental difficulty, however, lies in the presence of a "reduction postulate," to the effect that "if the voter changes his decision from [A] to [B], then the probability of [A] winning decreases and the probability of [B] winning increases, but the probability of [C] winning is not affected." The only justification offered for this assumption is that it "does not contradict the mathematical theory of probability," which may be true, but is in any event quite irrelevant. It certainly is not implied by that theory, or by the theory plus the institutional context in which elections are held; hence, its status is that of an assumption which is certainly not true of all elections, but which might be true of some (though plausible examples in which it is true are difficult to devise). Even if the technical difficulty arising from the treatment of ties could be resolved, the most that would follow is that in those rather special elections where the "postulate" happens to hold, voters will act in accord with their true preferences.* This, however, would clearly be a much weaker and a less surprising result than the theorem as originally stated.

GERALD H. KRAMER

Yale University

* In similar vein, an alternative "postulate," which would simplify the proof even further, would be to assume that all candidates are running equally well; or, more precisely, the conditional probability of a candidate winning, given that the voter in question votes for him, is equal for all candidates. This also has the status of an assumption which is true of some elections (and voters), and not of others, and it is trivial to show that the voter in question will act in accord with his true preferences in those elections for which this "postulate" happens to be true. It is clear, however, that this fact does not preclude the possibility of strategic considerations arising in other elections which will lead voters to act quite differently.

BOOK REVIEWS AND NOTES

Beginning with this issue, Professor Richard F. Fenno, The University of Rochester, becomes Book Review Editor.

BOOK REVIEWS Germino, Beyond Ideology, HARRY GIRVETZ..... 958 Lipset and Rokkan, editors, Party Systems and Voter Alignments: Cross-National Perspectives. Robert C. Fried..... 960 Stone, Strategic Persuasion: Arms Limitations through Dialogue: Cox, Prospects for Peacekeeping: Miller, World Order and Local Disorder: The United Nations and Internal Conflicts. LAWRENCE S. KAPLAN..... 961 Barnett (with Vogel), Cadres, Bureaucracy, and Political Power in Communist China: Bruce D. Larkin..... 963 McLin, Canada's Changing Defense Policy, 1957-1963: The Problems of a Middle Power in Alliance: Rosenbluth, The Canadian Economy and Disarmament. GILBERT WINHAM.... 965 Spaulding, Imperial Japan's Higher Civil Service Examinations. Edwin O. Reischauer.... 966 Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics. WILLIAM C. MITCHELL.. 968 Davison, International Political Communication, KARL W. DEUTSCH..... 969 Russett, International Regions in the International System: A Study in Political Ecology. Michael K. O'Leary... 970 Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammed Abduh and Rashid Rida, Fauzi M. Najjar.... 971 BOOK NOTES POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY..... 973 American Government and Politics..... 980 Comparative Government and Politics.... 995

BOOK REVIEWS

Beyond Ideology: The Revival of Political Theory. By Dante Germino. (New York: Harper & Row, 1967. Pp. ix, 254. $5.00.)

Political theory as "the study of the principles of right order in the psyche and in society," which is to say "reflection on the good life for man and society," is neither dead nor dying and this book is a protest against premature obituaries. Its thesis is that political theory is enjoying a revival which the neopositivists and behavioralists who dismiss political theory as normative and therefore outside the purview of science are unable to see. So argues Dante Germino who, instead of disassociating political theory and political science, insists that they are inseparable provided one does not confuse "authentic" political theory with ideologizing, utopianizing, partisan contention, subjective moral preference; and provided further that one does not commit the error of limiting science to dealing with overt behavior to the neglect of inner experience. If statements about the latter are by the positivist's criterion unverifiable, inner experience is nonetheless real and knowable by other means than sensory observation. Germino avoids the German term sometimes badly translated as "understanding," but it is to acts of "Verstehen" that he refers when he speaks of verifying propositions about inner experience by "meditatively re-enacting" such experiences. "Political theory is an experiential, as opposed to an exclusively experimental science," he writes, thereby placing himself in the ranks of phenomenologists like Alfred Schuetz, although he could also invoke the authority of MacIver ("imaginative reconstruction"), Weber ("interpretive understanding") and Cooley all of whom long ago urged that because we deal in the human sciences with motivational attitudes and intended meanings we cannot stop at the observation of external behavior. Whether or not we agree with Germino that Plato and Hegel transcended the level of ideology we may still affirm (with Mannheim if not with Marx) that it is possible to transcend bias or, as Germino puts it, make "the leap to the perspective of theory." One problem is that a writer who denies that Marxist doctrine is significant as political theory and asserts that Hegelianism is, or who dismisses Bentham and Burke as mere publicists and virtually ignores Locke and J. S. Mill may himself have failed to get 'Beyond Ideology."

Can one affirm that value judgments made at the level of theory have cognitive status and as such are confirmable or disconfirmable? Are they objective in the sense that they are something more or other than expressions of subjective preference? If political theory is to be identified with political science the answer must be affirmative. "Objectivity in political theory comes not from the vain attempt to avoid evaluation and thereby appear impartial but through the adoption of critical standards and criteria of evaluation that are not transitory or parochial but are based on an experientially sound anthropology." Many would go this far with the author but question the basis on which he reaches this conclusion once they are confronted by the specific uses to which he puts it. What, according to Germino, is "an experientially sound anthropology" and who qualifies as "sound"?

Those who qualify fall into two groups which the author, following Maritain, calls the "theocentric" and the "anthropocentric" humanists. Western theocentric humanism is rooted in classical philosophy, Judaism and Christianity. Its great exemplars were Plato. Aristotle, Augustine, Aquinas. As these were governed by the Platonic dictum that "God is the measure of all things," so the anthropocentric humanists have been governed by the Protagorean dictum that "man is the measure of all things." In the case of the latter as exemplified by Machiavelli, Hobbes, Rousseau, Hegel, the basis for a model society is not laid up in heaven but here on earth: "immanent" temporal existence is substituted for a timeless transcendent realm; the ordering principles are sought within the human community, as in the case of Hobbes' sovereign and the mundane contract from which the sovereign's authority is derived.

Although most modern political theory is of the anthropocentric variety, representatives of both traditions share a common opposition to the "messianic humanism" of a Comte, Marx, Mazzini, or (to mention a 20th century writer) Harold Laski which would "turn man into something other than he is or can become" (and is therefore antihumanistic), whereas for true humanists "man remains man, a finite creature of limited capabilities." It is, to be sure, difficult to see how this can be reconciled with an earlier statement that Augustine and Aquinas shared with the great classicists a belief that pleasure, power, honor, glory are illusory ends, the chief end of man being the vita contemplative; or the statement that for the theocentric humanist "existence is bathed in a new light" and the "human person . . . discovers himself as little lower than the angels." Perhaps this reviewer has missed the point: if this is not an example of a millenarian fantasy involving "a qualitative transformation of existence" I fail to see what is. But we are told that millenarianism is precisely what theocentric and anthropocentric humanists, i.e. all political theorists in the authentic sense, reject, as they do the belief that man can conform reality to his will. While at one point "pseudoobjective descriptivism" is dismissed (along with "opinionated ideology"), we are told in this context that the task of political theory is to describe the human condition not to transform it. To be sure authentic political theorists may be concerned with changes within the realm of the possible, according to the author, a qualification which, while used to exclude Marx, specifically does not exclude Plato (presumably on the basis of Eric Voegelin's distinction between a utopia and a paradigmatic society) or Rousseau whose concept of a free body politic modelled after the "bands of peasants ... regulating affairs of state under an oak. and always acting wisely" surely suggests millenarianism to this reviewer.

For Germino the hallmarks of authentic political theory are (1) openness, meaning critical detachment from the contemporaneous world of practical activity; (2) theoretical intention, meaning avoidance of the temptation to impose one's will on reality with a view to changing it; (3) contentration on universal or perennial problems, namely, those that "confront man as man rather than particular men at a particular time and place"; (4) realism, which avoids imposing "one's model of the food society directly upon a concrete historical situation"; (5) modesty, that is, the recognition of limits to knowledge; (6) intellectual honesty and integrity. The author often seems to apply these criteria arbitrarily. One wonders why a Plato, who believed that "true lovers of wisdom should come to hold political power" and who travelled to Syracuse "to work for the . . . overthrow of a despotism" (Epistle vii). should not be excluded by Germino from the charmed company-all the more so in that in going to Sicily Plato was expressly trying to terion of modesty, but the philosopher who promised with characteristic reticence to answer the question, "What is the ultimate design of the world?" (Introduction, Philosophy of History) is nevertheless acceptable.

After Hegel political theory went into a decline brought about by the impact of Comtean positivism and Marxian ideologism in the nineteenth century and, in the English-speaking world, by the ascendancy of the logical positivists and language analysts. It was at least partly rescued from this state of desuetude. the author believes, by Croce, Bergson, Benda, Scheler and the phenomenologists, and, in general, all those (T. H. Green, Whitehead, Collingwood) who have stood guard at the citadel of metaphysics. Supplementing them have been those writers "who rediscovered the crucial importance of elites in any body politic," notably Mosca, Pareto, and Michels. (This is perplexing. The neo-Machiavellians, as Germino almost parenthetically concedes, were positivists par excellence. Mosca and Pareto explicitly eschewed moral judgments, although in practice they may have been incorrigible moralizers. It would be difficulty to find better exemplars of scientism and what Germino earlier criticizes as "pseudo-objective descriptivism.")

√However, the rescue of political theory remained to be completed and this has been accomplished since World War II by such writers as Oakeshott, Arendt, Jouvenal, Maritain, Leo Strauss, and, in Germino's judgment, the greatest political theorist of them all, Eric Voegelin, whose strong theocratic and elitist bias is shared by the author.

The author closes with a polemic against the behavioralists (e.g. Skinner, Simon, Caswell) whose position entails a closed society because they support the "world-immanent values of the modernizing ethos... to the detriment of the life of the spirit in openness toward transcendence." In its stead he proposes a society inspired by a new or theocentric liberalism and, as such, open to the "experience of transcendence." (In terms of conventional political labels the author turns out to be a liberal rather than a conservative, although conservatives are more likely to be attracted to this as to Vocaselin's kind of approach to political deserves attention even from those who, like this reviewer, are unable to share his commitment to an ontologically grounded theory of politics which fails to reckon with the insights of evolutionary naturalism.

HARRY GIRVETZ University of California, Santa Barbara

Party Systems and Voter Alignments: Cross-National Perspectives. Edited by Seymour Martin Lipset and Stein Rokkan. (New York: The Free Press, 1967. Pp. xvi, 554. $9.95.)

In the sixty-four page essay ("Cleavage Structures, Party Systems, and Voter Alignments") with which they introduce this book, Seymour Martin Lipset and Stein Rokkan have made an impressive and exceptionally important contribution to the comparative study of political parties. Their introduction, perhaps more important than the book itself, synthesizes and systematizes much of what is known about the relations between social stratification and competitive party politics. Variations in the traits of party systems, they show can be traced to variations in social cleavages, as differentially translated into political cleavages. Using Parsonian categories, they present a typology of possible bases for social cleavage, and argue that such cleavages can occur and be located at a range of points on two axes-"periphery-center" and "cross-local functional." They attempt to demonstrate that the Parsonian categories can be adapted for the study not only of consensus, integration, and stability but of cleavage, disruption, and development.

Having identified and mapped the "critical lines of cleavage," Lipset and Rokkan outline a theory to explain the translation of "cleavage structures" into party systems. Here the variables are political, rather than sociocultural. They include: "the traditions of decisionmaking in the polity"; "the channels for the expression and mobilization of protest"; "the opportunities, the payoffs, and the costs of alliances in the system"; and "the possibilities, the implications, and the limitations of majority rule in the system." These constitute four "thresholds," of varying historical height, which, in different combinations, produce, if not a single required pattern of partysystem development, a set of ten party-system types that can be arranged into several patterns of development.

Which social cleavages are translated into party oppositions and which are aggregated within the parties? While admitting that not much is known about variations in the saliency and intensity of cleavages, Lipset and Rokkan suggest as the critical factors the timing and character in each "Western" polity of what they call the National Revolution (against peripheral resistance to nation-building and against the Roman Church) and of the Industrial Revolution. The major variations among "Western" party systems emerge, they argue, in the period before universal suffrage, when the processes of political-cultural and economic mobilization resulted in the formation, in some but not all "Western" (i.e. West European) polities, of religious, regional, and agrarian parties. The authors present an impressive "Model for the Generation of the [West] European Party System," consisting of seven key sets of actors, postulated rules on the formation of alliances, and an eightfold typology of the possible resulting party oppositions. Admittedly the latter typology accommodates some empirical examples much better than others and a host of "special factors" must be adduced to account for the many misfits: vet the model must be accounted an example of historical sociology at its best.

The eleven essays that follow, written without guidance from the Lipset-Rokkan typologies or models, can themselves be located on the functional and territorial axes, some of them stressing class and others stressing regional factors in voting and partisanship.

Class factors are emphasized by Robert R. Alford in excerpts from his Party and Society, dealing with class voting in Anglo-American political systems. Alan D. Robinson applies Alford's concepts, hypotheses, and indices to New Zealand, finding a high rate of class voting in that country a "class polarization," however, that has curiously little impact on policymaking. The "deviant" case of the "workingclass Tories" in England is analyzed by Robert T. McKenzie and Alan Silver, who find that workers who vote for the Tories resemble workers who vote for Labour in social characteristics, while many of the latter share the conservative social and political perspectives of the former. Working-class Tories, they conclude, are not so much deviants from working class political culture as they are normal representatives of a British national political culture, under fewer cross-pressures than their fellow-workers who vote for Labour. Joji Watanuki, in his essay on Japanese voting, also stresses the "deviant" in the relations between stratification and partisanship in Japan. Correlations between class and voting in that country are abnormally low, with large numbers of the poor voting for the Right and large numbers of the better off (the white collar employees) voting for the Left. This is explained by the predominance of what Watanuki calls "cultural politics" over "class politics."

In one of two essays, Juan Linz investigates the "sociology of political consensus," probing the social changes that help to account for the many differences between the party systems of Weimer and Bonn. In a second essay, Linz analyzes in detail the Spanish party systems of 1875-1923 and 1931-1936, and then courageously predicts the shape of the third Spanish party system, yet to come. He uses Italy as a model both for purposes of historical comparison and for the prediction of future development. Mattei Dogan presents a long study on "Political Cleavage and Social Stratification in France and Italy," which surveys and compares the voting behavior of various social groups in those countries. He pays particular attention to "regional polymorphism"-regional diversities in the socio-economic and motivational bases for party support hidden behind nationally uniform partisan cleavages, while Linz explores the diversification within the regionalist politics of Spain. Immanuel Wallerstein shows the rather limited importance of class cleavages in West Africa as compared to ethnic-regional cleavages and broadbased nationalist movements, sometimes themselves only federations of ethnic-regional groups.

Regional factors are stressed even more by the analysts of Finland (Erik Allardt and Pertti Pesonen), of Norway (Stein Rokkan), and of Brazil (Glaucio Ary Dillon Soares). Rokkan sees the Norwegian party system as the result of the superimposition of "functional-economic cleavages" onto an existing set of "territorial-cultural cleavages" by uneven processes of economic development, urbanization, and bureaucratization. Glaucio Ary Dillon Soares explores "the politics of uneven development," using Parsonian concepts to characterize what he calls the two political cultures of Brazil: the culture of the Northeast, with its stress on particularism, ascription, and religion, and a "politics of backwardness," based on traditionalism vs. the culture of the Southeast, with its relatively greater stress on universalism, achievement, and secularism, and a "politics of development," based on class and ideology. The growing emphasis on the "territorial-cultural" axis among political sociologists should prove to be just as fruitful as their previous emphasis on the "functional-economic" axis. It may allow comparative political sociology to spread the scope of its analysis beyond what in comparative politics has almost become the "dark continent" of Europe to include in systematic theory the party systems of a broader variety of polities.

ROBERT C. FRIED University of California, Los Angeles

Strategic Persuasion: Arms Limitations through Dialogue. By JEREMY J. STONE. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967, Pp. xiii, 176. $6.95.)

Prospects for Peacekeeping. By ARTHUR M. Cox. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1967, Pp. xii, 178. $3.95.)

World Order and Local Disorder: The United Nations and Internal Conflicts. By LINDA B. MILLER. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967, Pp. 234. $6.50.)

It is worth observing that while two of the three books under review implicitly or explicitly identify the United Nations as the major instrument of keeping peace in the years ahead, each shares the assumption that the major hope for peace as well as the major threat to peace lies in the relationship of the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union. Despite all the discussion about the end of the Cold War and the end of the bipolar world of the 1940s and 1950s which has preoccupied scholars in the last few years, the roles of the United States and the Soviet Union in or out of the United Nations dominate the pages of these three books. It is true Jeremy Stone alludes to a "growing disinterest in nuclear war"; Linda Miller sees an increasing dependence of both powers upon the United Nations for solutions to international problems they could not handle otherwise; Arthur Cox emphasizes the United States' recognition of the superiority of United Nations action in peacekeeping over the unilateral action and even over the intervention of a regional alliance. Yet it did not require the crisis in the Middle East in 1967 to alert each of the authors to the understanding that neither the internal difficulties of nor the external challenges to the superpowers in 1967 had changed the loci of power in world affairs. 1967 was closer to 1947 than the authors may wish to admit openly.

The continuing Soviet-American confrontation is probably most clearly expressed in Stone's Strategic Persuasion in which the United Nations makes no appearance. Indeed, it is surprising that the author was unable to find any place at all for the United Nations in light of his concern for suitable auspices of the dialogue between the great powers. His approach to the question of arms limitations is the subtle technique of persuasion through dialogue. His essay—and it is essentially a speculative essay—takes for granted that there are no meaningful quantitative methods of reducing the arms stockpile or of slowing the arms race. The key to avoiding a holocaust is communication between the United States and the Soviet Union in such a way that the intentions of both parties are at all times perfectly clear. If this objective could be achieved the tensions generating the arms race would be relaxed. The result would not necessarily be the end of potential war but it might be the atrophying of the destructive nuclear weapons system.

In his discussion he avoids the formal methods of treaty or convention, such as the protracted Geneva discussion of arms control. Such a path with its fixed positions and above all with its bureaucracies talking to themselves or to their constituencies and administrative superiors frequently stimulates rather than ameliorates the problems. If there is a direct approach to arms limitation in which the parties sit across the table from each other, it should be under private auspices, as in the Pugwash conferences and it should be conducted by men with a considerable degree of objectivity about the problems. Stone weighs the merits and defects of scientists as members of the dialogue as compared with economists or politicians. Whatever the composition of the discussants their objective should not be formal treaties but means of improving the continuing dialogues.

But even more satisfactory than a direct confrontation, in the author's opinion, is the indirect approach to arms limitation which requires a sophistication on every level of government that is not apparent at this time. The President or the Congress must be continually aware that a Defense Secretary's report to the Congress or a Cabinet member's article in a journal of public affairs has a Soviet audience, one to which communications can be made. His primary example of how the strategic dialogue can be conducted by indirection are the various ways the United States and the Soviet Union reported the successes of their atomic and hydrogen bomb experiments. They could either produce terror or reduce tension. He to end secrecy in atomic matters and end interest in a nuclear war as a solution to international problems? It seems too optimistic and too simplistic. The role of the United Nations and the new nations which comprise a majority in the organization might have an effect on the strategic debate; and China's role, which is dismissed merely as a factor supporting the decline in Soviet-American rivalry, might be a very different one in the future.

Arthur M. Cox's study of peacekeeping is more monographic in nature than Stone's book. While the United Nations does not appear in the title, the emblem on the jacket makes it clear to the reader that the United Nations is the peacekeeper he has in mind. By peacekeeping he means "the use of soldiers not to fight and win, but to prevent fighting, to maintain cease-fires, and to provide order while negotiations are being conducted." In the first generation of the United Nations the preventive force has been used as observers and fact finders on a disputed border as in Greece or Kashmir, as emergency force maintaining cease fire in the Gaza Strip, or as soldiers helping to suppress secession in Katanga. Inevitably, the use of troops has become a subject of cold war controversy in which the United States and the Soviet Union clashed repeatedly over the years. In the early phase of UN history the United States had been a strong supporter of collective measures, including peacekeeping forces, but as the balance of power changed in the United Nations the United States was increasingly willing to act independently in the Dominican Republic, in the Stanleyville airlift, and in bombing of North Vietnam. Hostility or indifference of the Third World accounted for a large part of American disenchantment with collective action.

The author points out that the Soviet Union was far more opposed to peacekeeping in principle, particularly during the long period in which the United States dominated the UN. But with the rise of the former colonial countries courted by the Soviet Union there has been a shift in practice if not in theory. To win support in the Afro-Asian world the Russians had to temper their attacks on U-Thant and on the Congo operation, and even supported poutral action in the India-Pakistan contro-

States policies, which he feels are in special need of the advantages offered by the peacekeeping services of the United Nations. The Vietnam involvement is brought up infrequently, but is obviously a major reason for urgency in promoting the peacekeeping function of the United Nations. Unilateral intervention is suspect in a neutralist-dominated world, as well as being a tempting invitation to Soviet counter-action. And America's numerous regional military alliances have no better chance of success, since as anticommunist military alliances they inject the Cold War into any area of operation and are incompatible with the impartial role the UN could play. It is in the interest of the United States to maintain peace and if the United Nations can serve this purpose it should be given much more support than has hitherto been the case. He is convinced that American initiative will be followed by Soviet response, if only to win friends among the Afro-Asian bloc.

Cox's mood is optimistic, and such problems as he points out such as authorization by Security Council or General Assembly, financing, staffing are all soluble if the will is there. The author's presentation is pedestrian, frequently repetitious, and brushes aside such questions as the United Nations' failure in the Middle East in 1967. He is vague about the relation of the Vietnam war to the peacekeeping process. Yet his prognosis is convincing: namely, the balance of terror between the superpowers makes the impartial peacekeeping machinery of the United Nations increasingly useful to both, if for different reasons. His proposals for strengthening the present machinery are both modest and sensible.

In Linda Miller's assessment of the United Nations' encounters with internal conflicts the rivalry between the superpowers once again is the dominant feature. Where the Soviet Union and the United States are in rough agreement, whatever the reasons, the United Nations can act with some effectiveness. This was particularly true of colonial conflicts in which Indonesians or Algerians strived for independence with an approving world looking on and beleagured European powers willing to accept the United Nations mediation as a face-saving device for abandoning their empires. Although the United States position as an ally of France or Portugal has made a clearcut stand more difficult than it had been for the irresponsible Soviet Union, seeking to profit from Western embarrassment, American action has served the colonial rebels whenever possible. In cases involving simply the breakdown of domestic order the United Nations role has been more difficult to define. In Cyprus and the Congo United Nations peacekeeping reflected both Cold War tensions and anticolonial feelings. Miss Miller feels that here the United Nations role is a limited one, "creating circumstances favorable to negotiations between parties." The only interest of the United Nations should be in restoration of stability rather than in any particular solution to internal disorder.

Essentially the author suggests that there is no such thing as a local disorder; the world, and the superpowers, are involved or involve themselves. The most dangerous and least amenable to United Nations treatment is the proxy war where charges of internal or external aggression intrude the Cold War directly into a local situation. In the Hungary crisis of 1956 intervention would have been rebuffed by the direct interest of the Soviet Union, or would have touched off a Third World War. Similarly, United States action in Lebanon, Guatemala, or in Vietnam, removed the United Nations from any effective role in those areas. A community of interest among the superpowers is necessary before the United Nations can be heard, beyond serving as a forum for verbal attack. The latter role is not necessarily negligible, as Russia's discomfort in Hungary in 1956 and America's unpopularity over Vietnam revealed ten years later. But Professor Miller is frank in using that adjective to describe the United Nations' influence in conflicts directly involving the United States and the Soviet Union. In this respect she is more pessimistic than the other authors. Her case studies, however, suggest important successes for the United Nations, and offers more hope for the future than she seems willing to concede.

LAWRENCE S. KAPLAN

Kent State University

Cadres, Bureaucracy, and Political Power in Communist China. By A. DOAK BARNETT, with a contribution by Ezra Vogel. (New York and London: Columbia University Press, 1967. Pp. xxix, 563, $12.00.)

This work is an unparalleled account of institutional life in a Chinese ministry, county, commune and production brigade in the late 1950s and early 1960s. But the cases—and they are said to be real, not hypothetical—are presented "without specifically identifying the areas or institutions that are described" (p. xviii). Why? To guarantee the disguise of the three primary informants, each a refugee. Hints and approximations soften the elusive uncertainties of source and object. Nonetheless, the reader walks blindfolded as the author steers him into the Chinese political terrain, describing the fauna and flora in great detail, but refusing to let the reader touch it for himself.

It is fortunate that Mr. Barnett and Mr. Vogel are trusted guides. This is a most important source of vivid images of Chinese political and administrative life. However maddening the repeated references to Ministry M, County X, Commune C and Productive Brigade B, the frustration of dealing with disguised objects can be tolerated. In time it will be possible to judge how representative, and in what ways unrepresentative, these images actually are. My guess is that they will stand up very well; and, in any case, they provide a description against which comparison can be made.

The plan of the work is straightforward. The ministry, county and commune-and-brigade cases are taken up in three separate parts. Each part is self-contained. Except in the case of commune-brigade relations, vertical ties receive scant attention. The discussion is organized around key institutions and topics, especially those involving personnel recruitment and management. In a concluding chapter Mr. Barnett advances generalizations and hypotheses on bureaucracy and politics in China. Ninety-odd pages of glossary are required for Chinese characters which would appear more conveniently beneath the text.

Although structured around institutional forms, the work is sustained throughout by concern for the political functions performed by party and government mechanisms. It is not, of course, rich in the informal politics and internal disputes which doubtless concern leadership; the informants knew structure. personnel, formal responsibilities and customary practices, but more intimate details of political life were presumably not known. Descriptions of the public security apparatus and coercive techniques acknowledge both the bases of apparent stabilities and the sanctions in reserve. County and local economic concerns are approached through relevant institutions. The author has endeavored to place local events in the broader context of concurrent national movements, too, and to record something of the changes of local institutional rôles which preceded his informants' departures from China in 1962 and 1964.

Barnett elects to omit any discussion of the eight bureaus of Ministry M "which were responsible for conducting the bulk of the ministry's substantive work" (p. 95). He argues, first, that he could not do so and still preserve the anonymity of the ministry; and, second, that each was sui generis "rather than typical of organizations found throughout the bureaucracy" (ibid.). At the other extreme are detailed small-scale accounts: a page devoted to the Forestry Bureau and the Meterological Station in County X (pp. 283–284) and four pages given to county-supervised industries, one employing 36 workers (pp. 300–304). The People's Bank of China branch in County X, we are told, employed two bank policemen and a messenger in the manager's administrative section (p. 293). I prefer the detailed account and wonder what scenes were sadly left on the cutting-room floor. Other readers, concerned more with conventional centers of power, may find they are put off by these choices of scale.

Is this a handbook? There are moments in which one is reminded of Brunnert and Hagelstrom's Present Day Political Organization of China, first published in 1910. In fact Barnett's is a very different book. First, it is a set of case studies. Second, since it does not specify the cases, it is not a work of reference. Third, it is far more concerned with relations within and among institutions, especially spatial and control relations. Fourth, it is directed in part to the quality of life enjoyed by cadres in the bureaucracy. Fifth and most important, it responds to current questions about political and social life which—despite some startling parallels—are qualitatively different from those which exercised Brunnert and Hagelstrom.

As a citable source, the volume rests on the reputations of Mr. Barnett and Mr. Vogel. The argument for disguising the identity of the informants is clear enough. Had the informants not been promised anonymity, they would not have talked. But anonymity, as l'affaire Le-Clair recently demonstrated to The New York Times, is not guaranteed merely by hiding names. The threatened institution can put two and two together and, if essential facts are not falsified, stand a good chance of identifying the party who wants to live outside its rules and controls. Punitive action can be taken.

The journalist's imperative—that he protect his sources—is not the scholar's imperative—that the evidential basis of his work be open. But scholarship directed at social systems in change, although it handles data in a manner more systematic and more telling than that of journalism, may be deprived of key data if it does not follow the journalist's canon. We might conclude that a book which must be handled responsibly by the reader is better than none. Is it responsible, then, for a scholar to speculate on the identity of a deliberately disguised "case study"? Without pursuing the puzzle that far, it should be sufficient to note that only five ministries correspond to Bar-nett's description of Ministry M and that County X is even more closely specified to the careful reader. It is tempting to wonder whether the elaborate masque only puzzles the readership and comforts the informants. A party official bent on uncovering an informant's identity would be little hindered by having to examine personnel records in two counties rather than one. Or is there a false scent? One trusts not.

The mystery of Ministry M should not obscure the main thrust of Barnett's conclusions. He judges the Chinese leadership "remarkably successful" in extending the outreach and impact of central decisions and central power (p. 428). He observes that the party has had some success in resisting the rise of parallel bureaucratic structures (p. 430) but has suffered a "seemingly irresistible growth of complex bureaucratic patterns of social stratification" even among party members (p. 433). Such patterns have been one target of the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. Barnett also notes the existence of bureaucratic politics focussing more on allocation of resources and methods of implementing policies than on more fundamental issues (p. 440). And he concludes that "the key issues concerning the political process in Communist China still relate more to the question of how the ruling elite attempts to implement Party-defined programs and impose its will on the population than to the question of how persons outside of the elite may try to exert some minor influence on public policy" (p. 441). The Cultural Revolution has turned our attention back upon the old questions of who constitute the elite and how programs are defined. But it has also highlighted the difficulties of the leadership in "imposing" or inducing acceptance of its will at all levels. The author's attention is well-placed.

BRUCE D. LARKIN University of California, Santa Cruz

Canada's Changing Defense Policy, 1957-1963: The Problems of a Middle Power in Alliance. By Jon B. McLin. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. xii, 251. $8.50)

The Canadian Economy and Disarmament. By Gideon Rosenbluth. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1967. Pp. x, 189. $5.50.)

The politics of arms and armaments is a traditional concern of the student of public policy, but this concern is heightened today with the increasing amounts of public funds spent on modern defense establishments. The above titles provide a useful glimpse into the defense problems of a middle-ranking power, and one which has a unique position in world politics.

Canada's uniqueness derives from its geographical position and its close political ties with the United States, both of which drain the classic concern for national security from Canadian defense thinking. Instead, Canada's defense policy is primarily directed toward securing goals other than national security, such as the preservation of diplomatic influence or the maintenance of multilateral alliances. McLin's book develops the thesis that Canada's postwar defense policy can be separated into three periods: 1946-56, 1957-63 and 1964 to the present. The first and third periods are characterized by widespread consensus on the objectives and instruments of Canadian defense policy. The middle years are viewed as a period of transition, during which the increasing costs of the defense establishment persuaded the government to accept a limited peacekeeping role in lieu of maintaining its relatively strong postwar position within the Atlantic alliance. This middle period was marked by confusion and controversy which ended with the fall of the Diefenbaker government on February 5, 1963.

